
Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman for what he said, and also to emphasize the point he made about the Contras, that less than 2 percent of the total Contra forces ever served in the Nicaraguan National Guard, served under Somoza, and that 42 percent of the Contra middle grade leadership are men who deserted the Sandinista ranks when the Sandinistas betrayed their promise of democracy and freedom in Nicaragua.

So the Contras, most of them were Sandinistas at one time. I think that point should be clearly made here today.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman in the well bringing it up.

Mr. RUDD. I appreciate the gentleman's leadership which he provided on a recent trip.

You know, there are a number of us, and this may be of interest to my friend and colleague from Arizona, who supports the Nicaraguan freedom fighters and oppose it by invoking the memories of Vietnam.

We should reread history.

The Tet offensive was a military victory for the United States and the South Vietnamese forces.

When President Nixon ordered the bombing of Hanoi Ho Chi Minh sent his emissaries to the Paris tables to actually talk peace.

Actually, South Vietnam was not destroyed in that case, but was destroyed by the Case-Church amendment which prohibited the use of air power to enforce the provisions of the Paris accords.

Today a large portion of Southeast Asia is dominated by the Communists under the same circumstances we are facing now in Central America and because of the violent genocide there.

Many of the Nicaraguan freedom figthers helped to oust the government of General Somoza, as we stated before, but they now turned coat on it and are trying to establish the freedom that the Sandinistas promised and never produced.

If we fail to support both the freedom figthers in Nicaragua and the duly elected government in El Salvador of Jose Napoleon Duarte, then Cuba and the Sandinistas under the Soviet direction will export communism everywhere throughout Latin America and in Mexico.

Captured Soviet correspondents obtained in Grenada provides us with compelling evidence that Russia is committed to spreading this revolutionary doctrine throughout the region.

There is an old copybook rule that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. And the freedom fighters are defending the United States and its prinicples in Nicaragua just as surely as they are fighting for their own freedom and for our freedom.

So if those in control of the House of Representatives forbid further assistance to those freedom fighters in Nicaragua, they should be prepared to take the blame for the inevitable consequences that will result.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RUDD. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, people on the other side have made the point that this may be a Gulf of Tonkin resolution. In other words, if we were to approve money for the Contras, that we might have to send troops down there. In fact, this is the reverse, if we do not send money down there, we may have to send troops down there.

Mr. RUDD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1750

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY].

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Chairman, Congress faces an important choice and a test of its will.

The choice is whether we will support a diplomatic resolution of the conflict in Central America and reaffirm our faith in the strength of our diplomacy.

The test of our will involves the issue of maintaining congressional opposition to providing military assistance to the Contra forces who seek the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government.

1. THE STRENGTH OF OUR DIPLOMACY

In the past year, we have seen leaders of the administration continually question the value of our diplomacy by emphasizing the need to rely on military force as a solution to our diplomatic problems. Central America has been the particular focus of this approach.

This approach undercuts our diplomacy and ignores the strength of our diplomatic tradition.

Strength of our diplomacy rests on the strength and power of our diplomatic imagination.

The United States emerged as a diplomatic power in the 19th century, at a time when we were not a military force to be reckoned with.

In fact, in Latin America, where we first staked out a diplomatic position through the much misunderstood and manipulated Monroe Doctrine, we had no military force to back us up.

What we did have was a bold diplomatic imagination and a vision on which we have based our Latin American diplomacy ever since.

In all of our diplomatic succession, what stands out is the fact that we have been clear about the nature of our interests and those of others. The Reagan administration, in practice, seems to have lost sight of this. The tragic outcome of our involvement in Lebanon is generally credited to the fact that no one in the administration could agree on the reason for sending in the Marines. If we are to believe the administration, there is a similar lack of clarity with regard to policy toward Nicaragua.

Initially, we supported the Contras in order to stop the influx of arms to El Salvador. When the administration could not provide convincing proof of this, the policy objective shifted.

The next reason for administration support for the Contras was to press Nicaragua to reduce its relations with the Soviet Union and Cuba. When that seemed to have failed, rather than change the policy—support for the Contras—the administration changed the policy goal.

The latest rationale is to keep pressure on Nicaragua to bring them to the negotiating table and to keep them there. The difficulty with this rationale is that quiet negotiations have been going on and it is the administration which has not stayed at the table; in January, we ended the talks which had been progressing at Manzanillo in Mexico.

What, then, should be the goals of our diplomacy?

Unquestionably, the primary goal should be to deny the Soviets an offensive military base in Central America. There must be no missiles in Nicaragua—on that we are all agreed.

We should also be concerned to promote a peaceful, diplomatic, and political solution to the conflict in Central America.

We must also reaffirm the primacy of diplomacy. We should support actively the Contadora peace process. After all, the Contadora nations are staking quite a bit on their diplomatic skills; our own history shows that a nation does not need to be a military power to make diplomatic history.

Are these goals being served by the administration's proposal to continue aiding the Contras? The answer is no.

Since 1981, the administration has given almost $100 million to the Contras and what do we have to show for it?

A further hardening of the Sandinista's position.

An increase in the intensity of terrorist attacks on the civilian population of Nicaragua.

A series of embarrassing incidents, including the mining of Nicaraguan harbors and the production of a manual for the Contras which advocated terrorist methods.

Our efforts to consolidate opposition to the Sandinistas on a democratic basis have failed.

The Contras have been unwilling or unable to work together and the primary reason is that the democratic groups opposed to the Sandinistas refuse, for good reason, to follow the lead of the FDN forces—the largest single group and the group that the administration seems closest to.

Everyone else involved with Nicaragua recognizes that the FDN is dominated by former members of Somoza's national guard, who have rarely been known for their commitment to democracy.

The irony of the administration's unwillingness to deal diplomatically with the Sandinistas was pointed out by Theodore Sorenson when he noted the welcome extended to Chadli Benjadid, the President of Algeria last week. Mr. Sorenson correctly observed that governments change of their own accord, that not all governments born in revolutionary fervor wind up as hard line opponents of the United States. A great deal depends on our willingness to accept them and deal with them.

2. A TEST OF CONGRESSIONAL WILL

We are engaged in a test of congressional will on this matter. Over the past 3 years the House has repeatedly expressed its opposition to the administration's policy with regard to the Contras.

Through the Boland amendment to the fiscal year 1983 appropriations bill, we prohibited the use of funds to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

In fiscal year 1984, aid to the Contras was capped at $24 million and we stipulated that additional funds could not be spent without congressional authorization.

Last year, Congress denied a request for an additional $21 million for the Contras.

Now, Congress is being asked to approve an additional release of funds for the Contras.

How many times do we have to say no?

We are being offered a compromise that is no compromise at all, a compromise that flies in the face of the experience of the past 3 years. We have been told before that the funds would have a limited use, and we subsequently found out that they were used to mine harbors, produce assassination manuals and support a movement whose true aim was to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. The essence of the administration's compromise is that the money will be used for humanitarian assistance for 60 days, and then it will revert to military assistance. All that this compromise does is to postpone the day when the money will be squandered in pursuit of a wrongheaded and deadly policy in Central America.

We have been clear in the past about our resolve not to fund the Contras. We must remain resolute while we work actively to promote a just peace in Central America—a peace which will be the most effective way to deny the Soviets a foothold in Central America.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Would my friend concede, in the interest of historical accuracy, that you were a little slow on Grenada? Would you concede that much?

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. I will not, but I will be happy to have a dialog with the gentleman a little later.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the $14 million aid request. Mr. Chairman, a group of us from the Armed Services, Veterans' Affairs, and Appropriations Committees visited seven countries in Latin America earlier this month to assess United States, Central, and South American security matters as well as to review the participation of U.S. national guard troops in the Blazing Trails and Ahaus Tara III exercises. We had the opportunity to meet with numerous U.S. diplomatic and military personnel as well as with high-level Latin American military and government leaders—most notably with President José Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador. We encountered a number of recurring security and defense themes on our journey—themes about which there was surprising unanimity of opinion—and I would like to pass along our findings for your consideration. In fact I had been to Central America 12 months ago and then 2 weeks ago and I could see improvement toward democracy.

First, United States and Latin American officials agree that Cuban and Nicaraguan support of leftist insurgents in El Salvador and elsewhere in the region poses the most serious threat to democracy and stability in Central America. There is no doubt that Cuba and Nicaragua are continuing to export their revolution in terms of providing financial support, military hardware, training, and sanctuary to the violent opponents of democratically elected governments.

Second, United States and Latin American officials agree that the United States must continue to provide significant resources to democratic forces in Central America in order to counteract the effects of Cuban and Nicaraguan influence. President Duarte, in particular emphasized that "if the United States cuts off aid to democratic forces in Central America, the United States will ensure a permanent military imbalance in the region and contribute to the victory of totalitarian forces."

Third, the officials with whom we spoke stressed that Latin America views U.S. approval of the $14 million humanitarian assistance request to the Nicaraguan Contras as a "litmus test" of the U.S. commitment to the region. They ask why the United States hesitates to actively export its most precious commodity—democracy—when Cuba and Nicaragua do not hesitate to export their Marxism. They ask why the United States hesitates to support Nicaraguans who are willing to risk their lives to restore freedom and democracy to their country in order that American men need not sacrifice their lives some time in the future.

Fourth, United States and Latin America officials emphasized the importance of constructive U.S. pressure on Nicaragua to move the Sandinistas toward moderation. The record shows that the flow of arms from Nicaragua to leftist insurgents in Central America slows when the United States keeps the pressure on through providing assistance to the freedom fighters or through conducting joint military exercises with regional armed forces. We can only encourage the Sandinistas to participate in meaningful negotiations if we hold their feet to the fire with such constructive pressure.

Mr. Chairman, the Contras have reached a critical juncture in their fight to restore democratic freedoms to Nicaragua. Today, there are more Contras in the field than there ever were Sandinistas during the revolution—and the Sandinistas are vulnerable. Now that success is within reach, the United States must not pull the rug out from under the freedom fighters.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to clarify who the Contras really are. We have heard some Members of Congress argue that the Contras are the same national guardsmen who terrorized the Nicaraguan people under the Somoza regime and that the United States should not support these murderers and torturers. In actuality, less than 2 percent of the total Contra forces ever served in the Nicaraguan National Guard. An even more telling statistic is that 42 percent of all regional commanders are ex-Sandinistas. In other words, 42 percent of the Contra middle-grade leadership are men who deserted the Sandinista ranks when the Sandinistas betrayed their promise of democracy and freedom in Nicaragua.

I say to my colleagues—make no mistake about it—U.S. credibility in Central America is directly at stake in this vote. I urge you to cast a vote for democracy and approve the $14 million humanitarian assistance request.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON].

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, earlier in this debate there was a good deal of discussion about the problem of Nicaragua as a foreign policy matter and as a human rights matter; but I think in the last couple of hours we have come, really, to the basic question. In my judgment, those earlier discussions ignored what the real issue is. It is a question of the national security of the United States. Make no mistake about it; under the Sandinistas Nicaragua has become a military camp. They have by far the largest military force in the Caribbean. They are putting so much money in their own military machine that their own people are short on food and they are short on power, and the Sandinistas, who already have a substantial airport in Managua, are now in the process of building a vast new modern military airport, whose basic objective is clearly to become a base for a Soviet air group. In fact, one individual whom I am not able to identify in this body, and who has never been a strong supporter of the Reagan administration in Nicaragua, said if that happened even he would believe a military attack would be warranted.

Do we really want to see another Cuba in the Western Hemisphere? Remember, Cuba, after all, is only an island. But Nicaragua is part of the main, a part of the continent, and it makes Nicaragua a far greater threat as a Soviet-sponsored military base than Cuba has ever been, even with all of its ballistic missile subbases. Do not let us forget the lessons of Grenada, the vast storehouses of Soviet and Soviet bloc weapons on that island of 111,000 people. Think how many more Soviet weapons can be stored in Nicaragua warehouses, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] has just demonstrated to us very clearly. Think how many can be distributed to other Caribbean countries.

The distinguished gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON] said that what we want most in Nicaragua is peace. But we would have to be whistling Dixie to think that the Sandinista government is really interested in peace. Because it is not any more interested in peace than Hitler was interested in peace.

As a matter of fact, Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick said the other evening the parallel with Nicaragua is Munich. Neville Chamberlain tried diplomacy, as Mr. ALEXANDER and Mr. DOWNEY suggested that we try diplomacy. Neville Chamberlain tried diplomacy with Hitler, and we all know how he turned out.

As a matter of fact, because Nicaragua is a part of our continent, it is very likely and very possible that the Soviet forces there could even drive north to the Rio Grande.

The Armed Services Committee visited Nicaragua last July, and the people in the U.S. Embassy told us that the real value of the Contras is that they provide the only leverage we have in Nicaragua to force the Sandinistas to change their political policy and to stop their growing military machine.

Some people said that this legislation could create another Vietnam. Absolutely not. The problem in Vietnam was that we were using U.S. troops to pursue our objectives while the Soviets were using their clients, the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese Army. But with the Nicaraguan Contras, we have freedom fighters who are willing even eager to carry out our efforts. All that we are being asked to supply with this legislation is some help so that they can carry out those efforts.

If it is OK to aid the Afghanistan freedom fighters; if it is OK to aid the heros of the Solidarity movement in Poland, if it is OK to provide the help that we gave to the Hungarian freedom fighters back in 1957, what is wrong with helping the Nicaraguan freedom fighters, who seek to eradicate a threat to our security. In fact, if it were not for the money that a struggling United States of America got from the French in our American Revolution our great democratic Nation wouldn't be in existence today thank God.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER].

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge the House to reject the President's request to resume the financing of military or paramilitary operations against the Government of Nicaragua.

The President's policy toward the Nicaraguan Government has gone through a number of quick-changes. First, we were told that we had to prevent Nicaragua from providing military assistance to the rebels in El Salvador. Next, our goal became the containment of Communist expansion in Central America. When Congress refused to provide funding for the Nicaraguan Contra forces, Mr. Reagan stripped the camouflage from U.S. support for the Contra forces by declaring his intention to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government if the Sandinista regime didn't cry "uncle." A vote to resume financial aid to the Contras would give congressional approval to the President's desire to continue a war by proxy and to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government.

The Government of Nicaragua, admittedly, does fall short of expectations and I am not going to defend the Sandinista regime in all its actions. But, the people of Nicaragua choose its Government in an election. It is Nicaragua, and not the United States, which is the most clearly threatened nation in the Western Hemisphere. Its harbors have been mined. There are U.S. warships offshore. Large armies are on its borders, and it is fighting against rebel forces. Nicaragua is more threatened than it is threatening.

As for the Contra forces we have been supporting, some do represent groups that would form a government with which we could closely identify. But, there is a substantial number of murderous mercenaries who cannot be called freedom fighters or the moral equivalent of the Founding Fathers. They are nothing more than brutal thugs whose former loyalties are associated with the hated Somoza dictatorship. They would reinstate a reign of terror and a regime that was originally perpetrated by the Somoza family, and a takeover in Managua by the Contras would result in this latter group-seizing control.

The President speaks about being firmly on the side of peace in Central America. Of course, we do not know what the President means by peace since this President is capable of engaging in such pernicious doublethink that he would try to have us believe that going to war would be for the purpose of peace. By supporting insurgents and mercenaries, it can be said that we are already at war with the people of Nicaragua.

Mr. Reagan's indiscreet comments about overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government can only reinforce the suspicion and fear of the United States that runs through the countries of Central America. The President keeps referring to the Marxist-Leninist threat to Central America, but for many people in that region, the real threat comes from the Yanqui from the north. Since the middle of the 19th century, the United States, time after time, has intervened militarily in Central America, and it is the Americans, not the Soviets, who are feared by many in Central America. The President is now reviving the great fear of Yankee imperialism in its worst form.

Mr. Chairman, the President, by pursuing his policies in Central America, is intervening on the wrong side of history. In Central America, we should be on the side of those popular movements which want to attack the oppressive conditions there, and as long as the poverty, the hunger, the illiteracy, and economic exploitation exist, revolutions will continue with or without foreign intervention.

Nicaragua is a small, poor country that on its own cannot threaten the United States. Rather than exercising its military muscle, the United States should be joining the Contadora nations in seeking a long-term commitment to peace and stability in Central America. Such a policy would be far more effective than sponsoring military adventurism.

Mr. Chairman, the President's remodeled proposal to salvage aid to the Contra forces is one born out of desperation. It is a sham. Does anyone really believe that funds managed by the CIA will be used for humanitarian purposes? It makes no moral, political, intellectual, or strategic sense to fund the Contras. Let us defeat this proposal and get on with the business of finding the means to use American power and influence constructively to obtain peace in Central America.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MINETA].

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, I know that everyone here today is committed to democracy and freedom. While some here may disagree, my determined opposition toward U.S. assistance to the Contras, and my efforts to change the failing policies of the United States in Central America, do not contradict my belief that the Sandinista government is failing in some of its commitments to the Nicaraguan people.

So while I am strongly committed to the United States ending its support to the Contras, I am under no illusions about the Sandinistas or the Contras, or for that matter, the Governments of Guatemala, El Salvador, or Costa Rica.

However, my concern today is not with the merits of Sandinista internal policy, but with the lack of wisdom and the illegality of U.S. foreign policy.

I believe the United States is justified in wanting to stop Nicaragua from exporting military equipment and supplies to other parts of Central America. However, I am deeply distressed that our Nation is paying only lipservice to diplomatic methods, and instead is putting all its emphasis on a military solution. That approach is not succeeding. Instead, it is adding to the dangerous instability of the region.

Moreover, the hypocrisy of this indirect, supposedly covert operation seriously damages our credibility at a time when we should be demonstrating our moral leadership and our commitment to open, honest, and democratic government.

Mr. Chairman, in discussing U.S. Central American policy, we must face two fundamental facts.

First, we must comprehend the unchanging, grinding, and brutal poverty in this part of the world that most Central Americans face—year after year, decade after decade, generation after generation. While this poverty is an age-old problem, it is our country's shortsightedness in failing to constructively address it that helps perpetuate the intolerable conditions.

The second fact I wish to point out is that over these past decades, the United States has been the agent of peaceful, evolutionary change toward democracy and economic well-being in Central America. Too often the history of the U.S. Central American policy has been a history of military intervention, diplomatic neglect, and economic control.

By failing to give high priority to thoughtful economic development, and by supporting landed families such as the Somozas, we have placed ourselves on the side of oligarchy, and on the side of right wing military dictatorships. We have failed to use our influence and prestige to encourage the growth of democracy.

Against this backdrop, the Reagan administration remains determined to show that it can be tough with governments such as Nicaragua.

When the U.S. Government first began its covert action in Nicaragua, the rationale given by the administration was twofold, namely to prevent the flow of arms from Nicaragua to other Central American states, and in doing so, force the Government of Nicaragua to become so preoccupied with its own internal problems that it would turn inward and ignore the rest of Central America.

The rationale offered for this position was apparent: Nicaragua can do what it wants within its borders, but stay out of other countries. Most would say that on its face, it was, and is, an acceptable policy for the United States to try and prevent the exportation of a Soviet-Cuban backed Marxist revolution to neighboring countries.

However, it was, and is now, an empty rationale and a smokescreen policy. For while the administration purported to follow the policy of containment, it is now apparent that its true policy from the beginning, was to overthrow the Sandinista government.

And there was Congress, approving the expenditure of significant money to stop the flow of arms, and yet none were ever found. As a member of the Intelligence Committee, I repeatedly asked the CIA and the administration to show me that one round of ammunition, or one pound of high explosives that the so-called arms-interdiction campaign had seized. They did not then, and still have not, produced any.

At the same time, the CIA, contrary to U.S. law, was failing to keep us informed of the extent of its activities.

I learned more from Newsweek than I did from our special briefings. And of course, in the instances of the mining and the manual, the CIA flatly ignored the requirement that it inform the House and the Senate Intelligence Committees of its activities.

In 1984, after Congress limited assistance to the Contras to $24 million, the administration consciously and intentionally violated that ceiling by what can best be called creative accounting. Cost and expenses that should have been counted against the $24 million ceiling were charged to other accounts, or swallowed up in the general cost of intelligence or military operations, or under the guise of U.S. military exercises.

To me, however, this cooking of the books is a direct and intentional circumvention of the law, and, along with my esteemed colleague, Mr. ADDABBO, I asked Defense Secretary Weinberger to formally account for all funds spent on the U.S. military exercises last year, and planned expenditures this year.

I remind my colleagues of this administration's record because it is reported that the administration may ask that great humanitarian organization, the Central Intelligence Agency be allowed to distribute humanitarian aid to the Contras. Assuming that ruse is refused, the administration may retreat to the position that an "interagency group" be in charge of distributing so-called humanitarian aid.

Mr. Chairman, the administration is telegraphing its punches. They will look for any way to get the money to the Contras. This administration has forfeited the right to be trusted with any money involving the Contras. If we want to give humanitarian aid, let us give it to an international organization that we know will distribute it properly and has the track record to show for it.

You and I know the American public generally does not support this adventure. But it seems that the stronger the public opposition gets, the more determined the administration is to persevere.

I would like to believe we have learned by now that no amount of sophisticated military equipment can win a guerrilla war nor repair an unjust society. Without popular support a repressive and undemocratic government has a very hard time resisting a rebellion.

I do not believe we promote democracy by killing more innocent civilians than the other side. Or by withdrawing from the World Court when our actions are less than legal. Let us use our influence not to win this war but to end it. Let us stop giving only lipservice to the Contadora group of nations trying to work out a regional solution and actively support their efforts. Let us step not toward a wider war, but toward a workable peace. Our country stands for honest and peaceful principles of government; let us demonstrate the power of that belief.

I am not suggesting this is an easy task, but it is a necessary one, both morally and politically—for Central America is a strategic region in our country's security. We will not have the luxury of blundering into an unwinnable ground war there and then withdrawing from the region and then trying to erase the experience from our national consciousness.

As usual we are getting candor mixed with hypocrisy from this administration. It is doing its best to lead us into the quagmire of Central America, where once again there is no light at the end of the tunnel. My friends, this week we are hearing those familiar echoes of the past. There is not much difference between, "Just 14 million more dollars ought to do it," from what we heard some 20 years ago, when another President said, "Just 14,000 more troops ought to be enough." Today we hear too many voices willing to spend American dollars in a war-by-proxy. Where will these voices be when we are spending American lives in an unwinnable undeclared war with little if any objectives, and with little if any support of the American people? What will we answer 20 years from now when people ask us, "How did this happen?"

I urge my colleagues to join with me and reject House Joint Resolution 239, and any other proposal which provides funds for the Contras thru the CIA or any other executive branch agencies.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time. Mr. Chairman, nobody in this Chamber has the ability to see the future. Nobody can know for sure what these votes and these words are going to mean to some scholar of the future—or even to our own children.

Nobody knows for sure what sympathies and aspirations lie in the hearts of the Contras, or with Daniel Ortega and the men and women who, with him, govern the actions of Nicaragua.

And so we who cannot see the future have to rely on today and yesterday to guide our words and our actions. We have to determine what we are going to do here today according to the record the Sandinistas have built with their own hands, and according to a reasonabale estimate of what they are likely to do in the future.

Nicaragua is a cancer.

In Central and South America, millions of men, women, and children are being brought the blessings of democracy and freedom. Free elections, free press, free speech. Where there was once a sea of oligarchy and oppression, there is now, thanks in large degree to our own actions in this Chamber, a new tide of free government.

In all of Central America, only Nicaragua is not moving toward freedom and democracy. And in all of Central America, only Nicaragua stands as a threat to the freedoms of others.

Do we have a right to move American force into Nicaragua to force that government to adopt a system like the one that has worked so well in the United States? Of course not.

But do we have a right to apply limited pressures on that government to force it to stop its efforts to undermine neighboring democracies and force millions of Central Americans into Sandinista-type governments, without free press, free labor unions, free elections? Do we have a right to protect democracy not in Nicaragua but in Honduras and Costa Rica and El Salvador, where government and civilian leaders almost with one voice plead with us not to abandon them? Yes. We have that right. And we have that obligation.

Vietnam has a lesson for us alright. It taught us never again to commit American troops to foreign battlefields with neither clear purpose nor clear will. No reasonable American would argue that the United States must remain out of Central America no matter what happens. If, one after another, our friends and allies in Central America are overthrown, and the freedoms of their people stolen, and new alliances formed with potential enemies of the United States, then our national survival will insist that any American President—Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative—step in to prevent the establishment of an enemy base at our feet. How do we prevent that from happening?

We do it by acting now in a timely fashion with a measured response. By applying limited pressure to induce the Sandinista government to stop subsidizing revolutions and murders in neighboring countries.

Mr. Chairman, it is not wrong to try to help democracies remain free. It is wrong to remain neutral between oppression and freedom. It is not wrong to try limited means to prevent the overthrow of free nations. It is wrong to stand by while freedoms are lost and bloody wars are underwritten by men and women who believe in violence, in repression, in murder.

I have no idea whether this aid package will pass or not. I can't see even that far into the future. But I can see this: just as Americans today look back, with the benefit of hindsight, and wonder why we didn't do more, faster, earlier to choke off Hitler before he rained destruction on Europe, or Castro before he began sending Cuban troops to all corners of the world, if we don't do even this little bit—without American troops and at very little expense—to try to force Nicaragua to the peace table, our children will have questions for which we will have no answers.

I support this request for assistance to the Contras, Mr. Chairman; I think conscience demands it.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON].

Mr. SKELTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, this is indeed a very difficult and complex issue which we discuss today. We have heard different points of view, and we have seen some who have painted themselves either into a political corner or into a philosophical corner.

Sometimes, in listening to the debate, I often wonder if those corners had not been painted not based upon the facts. Mr. Chairman, I think what we seek is a reasonable position. I too say that a reasonable position that we take in this body should be based upon the facts, and I would like to report that I was recently in Central America, and I would like to talk of the facts that I found there.

First and foremost I must say that the bright spot in Central America is El Salvador. Democracy is alive; democracy is breathing; it is on first base, and this Congress should be proud of the fact that we have supported the Duarte government in El Salvador.

As bright as the picture is in El Salvador, however, it is just as bleak in Nicaragua. The civil war is increasing and more people are fleeing the authoritarian government and the draft there is unpopular. While internal opposition does exist, a case can be made that it is ineffective. Meanwhile, the economy continues to decline and it reduces the Nicaraguan standard of living.

The civil war and the needs of the draft are increasing problems for the national government there. The Contras have continued their attacks even though U.S. funding has ceased. One Contra leader stated his organization raised $5 million since the congressional fund cutoff last spring.

An opposition leader estimated 15,000 Nicaraguans have died in the civil war in the last 3 years.

To increase its military force the Sandinistas resorted to a draft last year. This has proven to be very unpopular and has forced many draft age youths to leave the country, others are deserting after induction or failing to register. With over 50 percent of the Nicaraguan population under 21, the draft affects a large percentage of the population.

Internal opposition to the Sandinista government is divided. The major opposition is led by the church which has been very outspoken. The church had called for a national dialog and offered to mediate among the varying factions, but this has not occurred.

In talking to the opposition leaders several key points were made:

There is no doubt this is a Communist government with international leftist support.

The Sandinista government allowed an invasion of arms and advisers—especially from Cuba—that took over the apparatus of government.

Nicaragua is a stepping stone to the domination of other Central American countries.

The government has repressed the political opposition, reducing its size and access to the communications media. The opposition has very little political power.

While the Contras actively create problems for the opposition, it also allows them some flexibility to negotiate with the government.

It is obvious aid in some form to the Contras is needed to show U.S. resolve in the region.

Private enterprise is being taken over by the government.

The educational system is being subverted and children brainwashed by the government.

The government is censoring the media and acquiring a monopoly over what is being broadcast on radio and television.

In the absence of a political dialog, the civil war will continue.

Overall, Mr. Chairman I found a very dark picture in Nicaragua. The Sandinista government continues to repress the people and subvert the revolution. They do not appear willing to enter into a dialog with opposition leaders, even though the opposition continues to grow.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, there is a problem with the Contras. Evidence of a strong influence of former Somosistas is there, evidence that causes one to question their leadership and the harshness with which they attempt to achieve their goals is there. They would not exactly be, as we would term it, Mr. Chairman, in the category of Sunday school boys. It is too bad that we have the narrow choices that we have before us today. I did not favor the rule that established this. In view of the conflicts that we have today, I wish to point out that there is a middle ground.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SKELTON] has expired.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I propose a compromise, whether it be on this floor at a later time or whether it come from the other body. The compromise I offer is as follows:

First, keeping the Boland amendment.

Second, providing $14 million in humanitarian aid to the Contras to be split evenly or otherwise between the International Red Cross and U.S. Government channels, preferably through AID.

Third, cleaning up the Contras, which means eliminating former Somosistas and developing a positive political program which would include a type of Bill of Rights and humanitarian reforms.

Let me explain in more detail.

First, there is a political requirement for keeping the Boland amendment. Most Americans believe it wrong to be involved in efforts to overthrow a government with which we have diplomatic relations.

Second, by splitting the humanitarian aid request between the International Red Cross and the U.S. Government, the United States would be underscoring its concern for the legitimate needs of refugees who have fled Nicaragua and who are now living in Costa Rica and Honduras. Money for the Contras would be stretched out over 18 months, once again for humanitarian purposes to aid Nicaraguan refugees but tied to efforts to put together a program to clean out former Somosistas and establish a liberal, in the classic sense, democratic program.

And third, I stress the importance of transforming the Contras into a legitimate alternative to the present government. We have to change the perceptions of the American public and international opinion toward the Contras. This means that we have to support Arturo Cruz in the Nicaraguan situation in much the same way we supported Napoleon Duarte in El Salvador.

Just a few years ago the situation in El Salvador was pretty grim—death squads on the right and Communist guerrillas on the left. Democratic liberals in Congress helped change the situation by strengthening Duarte's hand. President Duarte, a true democrat, was able to convince the military that without a curb in death squad activity the change of continued U.S. aid were slight. Progress has been made in El Salvador against both the extreme left and right.

In the Nicaraguan situation, Arturo Cruz is the same kind of individual as Napoleon Duarte. He fought against Somoza, and was arrested on two different occasions. He also served as a member of the present Sandinista government until he reluctantly came to the conclusion that they had no intention of honoring promises made to the OAS in 1979. He is a respected political leader and a true democrat. He and others like him are the kind of individuals whom we need to support and who deserve our support.

As part of the effort to make the Contras a truly legitimate alternative, they need to put together a positive political program. Such a program should include: an explanation of the proposed economic structure with a detailed account of positions on land reform, market guarantees, business safeguards; a commitment to a pluralistic political system; guarantees ensuring that the military would be controlled; policies concerning taxation, education, freedom of speech, press, and religion. The program should also openly accept gains made by the Sandinistas in health and education. It should reject the Sandinista authoritarian apparatus: neighborhood defense committees, mass control organizations, and ideologically oriented education.

As part of this process toward legitimizing the Contras the effort should be made to open up the movement to international organizations—Red Cross, Amnesty International—church groups, and news media observes in order to secure the kind of international acclaim and support attained by the Sandinistas in 1978–79.

This is how we should proceed.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

Mr. SHUMWAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today to support the resumption of United States assistance to the anti-Sandinista rebels in Nicaragua. The social, economic, and political problems that continue to plague Nicaragua and to promote tragic violence there concern us all, and it is because of that concern that I urge my colleagues to lift their prohibitions on aid to the Contras and allow the United States to once again support those who are fighting for peace and democracy in the region.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to this debate during the course of the day today and I have some concerns about many of the statements that were made on this floor. I am concerned about what has appeared to be partisan posturing with reference to position in this debate.

I certainly believe in the two-party system and I think there are many topics that we discuss here in the Chamber of the House of Representatives that lend themselves very well to that kind of partisan debate, but the significance of this issue far transcends those partisan loyalties that might otherwise prevail. It was, therefore, very reassuring to me to hear the gentleman from New York a few moments ago, Mr. STRATTON, stand and take a position which obviously is not one held by a majority of the members of his party.

I think as we consider this issue today and this evening, and again tomorrow, we have to be realistic in how we look at it. I think, realistically, as has been said here, the Contras may not be totally attractive. Maybe they do have warts on their skin and on their performance. But I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if the Contras are deemed to have warts, then the Sandinistas who are presently the leaders in Nicaragua must be deemed to have cancerous lesions. Their shortcomings, their taint, I think, are far greater than anything that we might attribute to the Contras.

I believe if we are going to be realistic about viewing what is there today, we have to see that the only element of that Nicaraguan society actively pursuing the ideals that we as Americans have long cherished and believe in and announce to the world, are the Contras. If it is fair for us to characterize them as a ragtag bunch of undisciplined fighters, perhaps that may be so. But perhaps it may be so because they have not received the kind of assistance that today we are debating. They have not received the kind of training or help from us that might give them a more respectable appearance and skill in what they are trying to accomplish.

Again trying to be realistic about this issue, I think we have to consider fully the alternatives. There is a government now in Nicaragua which I believe closely parallels the Government of Cuba. We have known over the years of experience with the Cuban Government that they have spread their poisoned doctrine and their subversive forces throughout the world. They have caused us great problems in terms of our own international policies and in terms of our own good neighbor relationships.

Again realistically, I think we have to concede the fact that the Sandinista leadership means problems for Nicaragua and the citizens of that country. I believe if we examine that aspect of this issue carefully we must concede that the Nicaraguans will not be content over a long period of time with the kind of limits that are now imposed, the kinds of lines that must be formed to obtain basic supplies, the kinds of shortages they have encountered, and certainly the suppression of rights that has followed the Sandinista leadership.

Just today, the front page of the Los Angeles Times newspaper had a picture showing a very dimly lighted medical facility somewhere in Nicaragua, showing mothers with their children waiting for medical treatment and saying that the status of medical care in that country has declined. Malaria is now a problem. I am suggesting, realistically again, that the message of the Sandinistas and their kind of leadership is going to spell trouble for those good people in Nicaragua over a longer period of time.

Third, I think there will be problems for Central America. There are some in this Chamber who perhaps may say that the cause of those problems is our own foreign policy. With reference to that, Mr. Chairman, I would simply like to cite a statement which was made back in 1969, a statement of goals which was formulated by the founders of the Sandinista liberation philosophy, Carlos Fonseca and Tomas Borge.

They said in paragraph 14 of that statement, and I quote:

> We struggle for a true union of Central American people within one country, beginning with support for national liberation movements in neighboring states.

More recently, Tomas Borge, the Minister of the Interior, said, and again I quote:

> This revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist from the moment Sandino fought in La Segovia.

I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the root of these problems is not U.S. foreign policy. The Sandinistas were committed to territorial domination and the cause of Marxism—Leninism far before 1979. What we see now is not simply reactionary posturing, but a public display of deep-seated support for Communist ideology.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this additional time to me.

I would suggest in closing, Mr. Chairman, that if we refuse this small effort to aid those who are fighting to instill freedom in Nicaragua, we are going to see massive discontent on the part of those people, we are going to see a mass exodus of humanity from that country to this country, and we are going to see the Sandinista-Marxist-Leninist philosophy gain a foothold in Central America.

Mr. Chairman, certainly history will be the judge of our actions, and I hope that that history will not say that a majority of this House had been victimized by deceit and by a shrewd propaganda effort on behalf of the Sandinistas, but that a majority of this House will go on record in support of freedom and liberty for this hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today to support the resumption of U.S. assistance to the anti-Sandinista rebels in Nicaragua. The social, economic, and political problems that continue to plague Nicaragua and to promote tragic violence there concern us all. It is because of that concern that I urge my colleagues to lift the prohibitions on aid to the Contras and allow the United States to once again support those fighting for peace and democracy in the region.

No one would deny that we have an interest in encouraging democratic development in Central America; the proximity of these countries to our own compels us to recognize the stake we have in their progress. During the last decade, this progress toward democracy has been impressive—where Costa Rica once stood as the only Central American nation with a democratically elected civilian government, it has now been joined by Panama, Honduras, and El Salvador, and in Guatemala, elections are scheduled for October. Efforts are going forward in these countries to address the problems of economic injustice and arbitrary exercise of power that have historically afflicted their people.

While this movement toward democracy has been notable and steady, it is still fragile and its future is clearly threatened by the persistent militarization occurring in Nicaragua under the Sandinista regime. When the Sandinistas in 1979 led the overthrow of General Somoza and claimed the establishment of a new, democratic government in Nicaragua, we supported their efforts by providing over $120 million in direct economic assistance, and by helping the new regime to secure $262 million from multilateral lending institutions. Nevertheless, our hope, and the hope of the Nicaraguan people, was soon betrayed by the Sandinistas as they imposed a new dictatorship governed by the tenets of Marxism-Leninism and upheld with military assistance from the Soviet Union and Cuba.

Today, there is little question that the Sandinistas have betrayed the principles of the Organization of American States to which they pledged adherence in 1979. They have denied Nicaraguans a pluralistic political system, a mixed economy, freedom of expression, and a fair, responsible judicial system. Evidence of the repression and brutality characteristic of this regime was once again demonstrated in a recent Washington Times article which reported the discovery of a mass grave in Nicaragua containing 50 to 60 bodies believed to have been political prisoners executed by the Sandinista government.

Mr. Chairman, we must be critical of internal policies in any nation that creates horrors such as this, but our concern in the case of Nicaragua is heightened by the grave consequences that these domestic developments hold for the region. The Sandinistas' inward repression has been matched by an outward aggression—indeed, they openly declare their expansionist intentions in statements such as that of Tomas Borge, Nicaragua's Minister of the Interior, who claimed: "This Revolution goes beyond our borders. Our revolution was always internationalist from the moment Sandino fought in La Segovia."

This is not mere rhetoric; Sandinista words have been consistently translated into action: the regime has provided logistical and military assistance to the leftist guerrillas in El Salvador, maintained links with a variety of terrorist organizations including the PLO, and built up an active duty military force that exceeds by five times the size of Somoza's national guard at its peak. Furthermore, the number of Cuban military personnel now in Nicaragua has escalated to 2,500-3,500, a force that is bolstered by thousands more Cuban civilians, at least 200 Soviet and East European military advisers, and about 50 advisers from Libya and the PLO.

Nicaraguan and Cuban-supported subversive activities which seek to destablize the region and which violate the borders and sovereignty of neighboring countries ultimately threaten our security as much as the security of our southern neighbors. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the United States has an interest and a responsibility to support those countries in the region, such as El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica, which are dedicated to the democratic process and which have requested our assistance in countering the external threat posed by Nicaragua.

There are, of course, a variety of means by which the United States can try to address the clear threat posed by Nicaragua—through support of the negotiations of the Contadora group, through direct negotiations with the Nicaraguan regime as were initiated at Manzanilla last year, through the application of economic pressures, and through support for the democratic resistance movement struggling for change from within. All of these approaches are important and useful and each, including assistance to the anti-Sandinista rebels, should be available to the President and U.S. policy makers as they craft American relations with Nicaragua. To prohibit the use of funds for support of the rebels would serve to unilaterally restrict our Nation's ability to deal with the threat to peace and stability in Central America. If the United States has a responsibility to support those countries in the region which are threatened by the Sandinista's export of revolution—and I believe it certainly does—then this responsibility should be served through any and all means available.

We should support the Contras not only because this support offers a positive and effective means of pressuring the Sandinista government to moderate its actions. Popular support for the resistance has increased significantly in the past few years as the number of fighters has grown from 2,000-5,000 in 1982 to some 12,000-18,000 in 1984. As their numbers grow, the anti-Sandinistas' ability to pressure the government has reportedly begun to distribute land to individuals, rather than to cooperatives, in response to efforts by the Contras to recruit dissatisfied peasants into their forces. The presence of an active and growing armed resistance has also exerted pressure on the Sandinista government to negotiate with its neighbors, the United States and the Contadora group. While Sandinista concessions in these talks have not yet been satisfactory to meet the concerns of those threatened by Nicaraguan aggression and subversion, without the pressure of the U.S.-supported resistance, the Sandinistas would have little incentive to negotiate at all.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is critical that the United States resume its support for the anti-Sandinista rebels in their struggle to achieve the same democratic freedom for Nicaraguans that Americans have long enjoyed. They are fighting for goals that we share; we have a responsibility to support them together with those nations in the region dedicated to the democratic process, all of which are threatened by a totalitarian minority. As long as the Sandinista Government continues to restrict the rights of its citizens, civil war will rage and Nicaraguans will flee to the United States and other countries of the region. In the interest of establishing lasting peace and stability on its southern border, the United States must demonstrate its willingness to employ all available policy options, including covert assistance to the rebels.

The resistance forces need our assistance now to combat the Soviet supplied Nicaraguan armed forces—if we deny that support today, we may not have another chance to act on behalf of democracy in Central America. Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the President's request for $14 million to assist the anti-Sandinista rebels in Nicaragua.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, as in the past, today's debate centers around what remains the best possible policy alternative by which to achieve the long-term national security interests of the United States in Central America, specifically with respect to U.S. relations with Nicaragua. What are those interests? Clearly, they are twofold. First, to deter and blunt Soviet, Cuban, and Eastern bloc influence in Nicaragua and Central America and, second, to provide a policy path by which the peoples of Central America are not subjected to the tyrannies of either the political left or right. Thus, our long-term national security interests in Central America today remain what they have been in the past—to promote economic development and stability, social reform and the cause of democracy throughout the nations of this strategic basin.

Each of us today must determine whether President Reagan's strategies toward Central America and Nicaragua are fulfilling these objectives. In my view, they are not. Indeed, in my view, if we continue to follow the President's course, we shall ensure the absolute failure of our policy objectives in Central America, as well as create a climate there through which Soviet, Cuban, and Eastern bloc influence will grow rather than recede in Nicaragua, as well as other Central American nations.

Let us examine the success of the President's not-so-secret war against Nicaragua. The Contras control no indigenous territory within Nicaragua, nor do they appear to enjoy the support of any groups within Nicaragua. Indeed, many of their ranks are filled with former Somozan national guardsmen who were so thoroughly despised by the majority of the people that the people of Nicaragua turned to the Sandinistas en masse. The original stated purpose of our support for the Contras—the interdiction of illegal arms shipments from Nicaragua into El Salvador—have been refuted by the Contras themselves as they claim their purpose is the outright overthrow of the Sandinista government in Managua.

The CIA's illegal mining of Nicaraguan ports resulted in the condemnation of the United States at the World Court. We should also recall that in response to this illegal act, both the Soviet Union and our allies—England and France—volunteered to sweep Nicaraguan waters clear of these devices. Thus, the actions of the CIA actually served to enhance Soviet influence and prestige within Nicaragua.

Our stated support for the Contadora peace initiative rings hollow as we reject out of hand any proposal that is offered to enhance the prospects of success of the Contadora initiative and leave both our friends and allies questioning the integrity of the U.S. commitment to this valuable initiative.

It seems to me that the President's policy has been conceived in a vacuum. Its architects have failed to examine the histories of past failures such as the Bay of Pigs where anti-Castro rebels were crushed. It seems to me that the architects of this policy remain convinced that the best solution to the socioeconomic problems confronting Central America rests in the application of military might. I thought we realized the overall ineffectiveness of such policies in both Vietnam and Iran.

In my view, our policy path must serve long-term U.S. national security interests. To do this, I believe we must move away from reliance upon a bankrupt policy that emphasizes a military solution which retains no indigenous support in Nicaragua and toward a policy that recognizes U.S. interests in being a true and honest partner in the Contadora peace process. This alternative policy is best achieved through support of the Hamilton substitute which allows the United States to provide humanitarian assistance under the supervision of the Red Cross and the United Nations High Commissioner on Refugees—not the Contras—while the regional peace efforts of the Contadora group are truly permitted to go forward.

The Hamilton substitute is not an endorsement of the Sandinista regime or its internal practices. The Hamilton substitute does not play into the hands of the Soviet Union, Cuba, or the Eastern bloc. The Hamilton substitute is not a renouncement of U.S. interests in seeing a restoration of the democratic process in Nicaragua. But, the Hamilton substitute is in the best interests of the United States and our hemispheric neighbors in Central America. It spurs the Contadora process and keeps pressure on the Sandinista government through its recognition that our future decisions with respect to Central America will be predicated upon the internal behavior of the Sandinista government. Thus, American interests in promoting economic stability, social reform, and democratic pluralism are preserved, and Soviet, Cuban, and Eastern bloc influence is minimized.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCURDY].

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, Americans are confused. On one hand, they hear many critics of President Reagan referring to the Contras as Fascist thugs, and to the Sandinistas simply as Nationalists with Socialist leanings. On the other hand, we hear the President rhetorically referring to the Contras as the "moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers."

I cannot equate the Sandinistas with misguided Socialists, nor the Contras with Thomas Jefferson and James Madison. Somewhere between these extremes of rhetoric is a policy that is slightly gray, but which advances U.S. interests and can possibly gain public support.

I was disturbed during my recent trip to Nicaragua by evidence of growing Sandinista repression, censorship, and duplicity, and by the escalation of their military forces. Democratic changes are underway, however precariously, throughout Central America, except in Nicaragua. I believe, as I did 2 years ago, that the Sandinista government poses a clear threat to the security of its neighbors and that it must abide by the promises it made to the OAS in 1979.

What we desperately need—what we have needed all along—is a clear-cut, realistic policy.

As the chairman of the Intelligence Committee in the other body, Senator DURENBERGER, has stated, because we have no policy, we appear to be reacting to events, rather than carrying out a strategy with goals by which to measure progress.

Americans are confused by strong administration rhetoric and lack of administration action; by congressional procrastination and debate. They are looking for coherence and a sense of vision. If we oppose the Sandinistas, why do we buy Nicaraguan beef and bananas when Honduras could use our trade? Why do they still enjoy most-favored-nation status? If the regime is illegitimate, and its overthrow a goal of U.S. policy, why do we continue diplomatic relations? If we are serious about meeting the Marxist challenge in Central America, it is time to begin shaping a long-term, affirmative policy, and stop confusing intentions with accomplishments.

We must ask ourselves what is really happening in Central America, what we would like to see happen, and what we can do about it. In the past, we fought change; now, we must decide whether to ignore it or support it. Unfortunately, too many Americans have visited this region with open eyes and closed minds—looking not at what is happening, but only at what is happening that would support their strongly held views.

Both in committee and on this floor, I have voted against covert aid to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. But having recently returned from the region, I believe more strongly than ever that there is a compelling case for continued American involvement in Central America.

The Sandinista regime is an obstacle to the growth of democracy. It is also a dictatorship that is doomed to fail unless it is kept alive by outside help. There is growing internal opposition to the economic and militaristic policies of the Sandinistas. Nicaraguans are increasingly dissatisfied and frustrated with their Government, but it is equally obvious that the Contras do not have the political persona or identity to advance their cause.

In my opinion, to relieve the outside pressure on the Sandinistas would be a mistake. But the American people must believe that all channels of diplomatic, economic, and political pressure have been exhausted before there can be any support for paramilitary or military options.

The $14 million that has been the focus of so much debate can have little practical effect. No one who has been there or who looks at the record believes that the Contras can overthrow the Government of Nicaragua, with or without these funds. But this money can be a symbol of bipartisan determination to stand firm for democracy in Central America.

I will vote for the Hamilton substitute. It provides no funds for military or paramilitary operations, although I do not believe these options should be ruled out. It seeks to impose multinational pressures on Nicaragua, including the possibility of trade sanctions, and it supports the regional peace process. I believe the substitute could have gone further. For example, it could have provided a trigger-date and congressional observers to further encourage a cease-fire and peace negotiations. But the substitute as it stands is better than the alternatives.

We can no longer afford to view the problems of Central America in black and white terms. Foreign policy requires military strength; it also requires skillful use of diplomacy and economic tools. The substitute allows for rapid action on any further requests for Contra aid. If no peace agreement is reached by October, we will be able to judge which side is responsible for the lack of progress and act accordingly. I urge its adoption.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROYHILL].

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BROYHILL was allowed to speak out of order.)

ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE DEATH OF THE HONORABLE SAM J. ERVIN, JR., OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, it is my sad duty as the senior Member from our State of North Carolina to announce the passing of former Senator Sam Ervin of Morganton, NC.

Sam Ervin, of course, had a long and distinguished career in the Senate and prior to that served one term in this body. He called himself a country lawyer, but he was anything but that. He was an outstanding expert on the Constitution, second to none.

Funeral plans are incomplete, but the funeral will be held later this week in Morganton, NC. Those who would like more information, please call my office.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WORTLEY].

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WORTLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 239.

First, millions of illegal aliens already cross our border seeking economic opportunity.

Second, Vietnam, Cuba, Berlin Wall show that Communist conquest causes millions to flee.

About 10 percent of the population of Vietnam has fled. About the same percentage of Nicaraguans is already living in Costa Rica, not counting those in Honduras, United States, and elsewhere.

Third, Nicaragua is fast becoming communist.

Sandinista rhetoric, actions, and allies demonstrate that Sandinista goal is a traditional Communist state.

Fourth, Nicaraguan neighbors cannot house influx of refugees.

Their economy won't support it; political traditions do not encourage it.

Fifth, conclusion: If the Communists consolidate their position in Central America, the United States will experience a new, huge wave of illegal immigration.

I submit the following document to substantiate this conclusion:

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION: 20 MILLION WITHOUT A COUNTRY

(By Laura Ingraham)

Over 100 million people live between the Rio Grande and Panama. Communist instigated political turmoil coupled with acute economic stagnation continue to plague that region. As a result, millions of refugees and displaced persons will soon make their way to the United States in search of freedom and security. How many people can our country expect? To which cities are they likely to migrate? What impact will this influx have on our society and economy? What is our moral obligation in this grim situation?

The time to face these distressing questions is long overdue. Already since 1970, the number of illegal aliens in the U.S. has risen dramatically—from about 600,000 to between 6 and 12 million. From New York to Miami, Los Angeles to Dallas, city and county governments are already hard-pressed by problems resulting from rapidly expanding communities of illegal Latin American aliens.

Soon literally tens of millions of refugees will be flooding across our borders. A minimum of three or four million people illegally enter our country each year. The Los Angeles county supervisor estimates that between 1.1 and 1.7 million illegal Latin Americans live there. That figure could increase by 3.2 million if the crisis in Central America is not stopped. Conservative figures for New York City place its illegal population at between 500,000 and 750,000. Soon, 3.4 million more Central Americans may be in New York. Miami may find itself inundated by 1.4 million more refugees, Chicago by another 1.1 million and San Francisco by another 1.9 million (see Appendix). Moral solution must be quickly found.

As the Sandinista regime expands its "revolution without borders" to all of Central America, staggering numbers of refugees will flee to the United States. Both El Salvador and Guatemala have been battling guerrillas trained and armed by Nicaragua and Cuba. Nicaragua, El Salvador and Guatemala are, according to the U.N. High Commissioner of Refugees, the major refugee-generating countries in Central America.

I

As communist revolution seizes Central America, eventually destabilizing even Mexico, how many refugees can we expect in the United States? History shows that Communist takeovers consistently generate large numbers of refugees. After the fall of Cuba and Vietnam an estimated 10 percent of the population fled each country, often at the price of incredible risks and even death.

It is unrealistic, however, to expect only 10 percent of the Central Americans to flee to the United States! It is much easier to get from Guatemala or El Salvador to the United States than from Vietnam. At worst, one has only to walk northward. Many more persons will become "feet people" than become boat people. Now the cultural gulf is far less severe for Latin Americans. In Los Angeles, Miami, Washington D.C. and other major urban centers, complete Hispanic communities allow illegal aliens to live and work without even speaking English. Finally, many Mexicans and Central Americans already have friends or relatives living here.

CIA interviews with the Mariel boat people report that at least another 10 percent of the present Cuban population (for a total of 20 percent) would leave if they could. Because it is easier for Central Americans and Mexicans to come here, between 10–20 percent of the population will do so. In fact, more than 10 percent of the Salvadoran population is here already.

Country	Current population	10 percent refugees	15 percent refugees	20 percent refugees
Costa Rica	2,600,000	260,000	390,000	520,000
El Salvador	4,700,000	470,000	705,000	940,000
Guatemala	7,700,000	770,000	1,155,000	1,540,000
Honduras	4,300,000	430,000	645,000	860,000
Nicaragua	2,800,000	280,000	420,000	560,000
Panama	2,000,000	200,000	300,000	400,000
Mexico	75,700,000	7,570,000	11,355,000	15,140,000
Total	99,800,000	9,980,000	14,970,000	19,960,000

Note.—Rounded figures.

We can then expect that between 10 and 20 million refugees and displaced persons will breach our southern border as the turmoil escalates. This almost equals 10 percent of the current U.S. population, or the equivalent to the 10 largest cities in the U.S. Twenty million refugees is 39 times the population of Vermont or 33 times the population of Delaware. It is also three times the combined populations of Alaska, Wyoming, Vermont, Delaware, District of Columbia, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Nevada and New Hampshire.

What impact will these millions of illegal aliens have on the United States? This question concerns all Americans because contrary to the casual assumption, most illegal aliens do not stay in the southern United States. In search of anonymity and jobs, new arrivals follow the beaten path to every major urban area. Cities as diverse as Miami, Dallas, Los Angeles, Chicago and New York have extremely high numbers of illegal residents.

It is difficult to measure the distribution of the illegal alien population. Some maintain that illegals hide in areas where they are not likely to be apprehended by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS). Yet many, including the INS, argue that overall the illegal alien population is distributed in generally the same pattern as the legal alien population. This is because illegal aliens, especially once they bring their immediate families here, tend to become legal aliens.

To predict the illegal alien distribution in 1983, the INS surveyed the legal alien distribution in this country. The totals, printed in the Appendix, showed that in fiscal year 1982, 29.3 percent of all legal aliens (and illegal as well) lived in the western region of the U.S., 20.5 percent in the southern region, 34.8 percent in the eastern region and 15.4 percent in the northern region. The study also broke down the percentages by selected cities in each region. From these it is possible to predict the number of illegal aliens from Central America and Mexico who will migrate to each city.

For example, 17.1 percent of the aliens were living in New York City. So, if 20 percent of the population between the Rio Grande and the Panama Canal become refugees, 3.4 million of them will inundate New York. Los Angeles, with a distribution of 15.8 percent, can expect at least 3.15 million additional refugees, Baltimore another 400,000 and even Portland, Oregon another 140,000.

The one qualification is that for major cities such as Los Angeles, Dallas, Houston, Miami, Washington D.C. and New York, which already have a high ratio of illegal Latin Americans, the figures are quite low. For example, based on current legal alien distribution, if 20 percent of El Salvador's population fled, 27,260 would be expected to arrive in Washington D.C. However, almost 60,000 Salvadorans are estimated to be in the nation's Capital already. Still the figures are valuable as a low-end projection of expected refugees.

II

In the past, people have (both legally and illegally) migrated to the United States from Mexico and Central America for socio-economic reasons. The traditional migrant left his homeland because of poverty, high unemployment, inadequate education and a general lack of opportunities for personal advancement. Today, some, expecially Mexican, still come for these reasons.

After decades of socialist policies, Mexico has begun a downward spiral towards a virtual economic collapse. In 1983, inflation was between 80 to 100 percent and the foreign debt approached $100 billion. Unemployment and underemployment now total 45–50 percent of the labor force; on top of this, Mexico needs to create over 850,000 new jobs every year just to keep pace with its population growth.

Senate experts predict that should the Mexican economy collapse completely, disorder and perhaps civil war are a likely result. This would cause 7–14 million Mexicans to flee over the Rio Grande. Yet, there are more serious repercussions. Such a situation would provide the opportunity for Cuban-Soviet destabilization and subversion. As the economic crisis worsens monthly, such opportunities are growing.

Already, Cuban-Soviet sponsored revolution has dramatically increased the numbers of refugees heading for the United States. However, many can still find asylum in more stable Central American countries such as Honduras or Costa Rica. The UN High Commissioner on Refugees (UNHCR), which oversees all refugee camps within Central America, reports that as of December 1983 over 300,000 refugees had fled to neighboring countries. The Costa Rican government estimates that 200,000 additional undocumented refugees are in Costa Rica. Also, the U.S. Department of State estimates that 400,000 citizens are displaced within El Salvador and between 100,000–500,000 are displaced within Guatemala. The local refugee crisis is so severe that UNHCR assistance in Central America and Mexico has doubled since 1981 from $12.5 million to $25 million, 40 percent of which is funded by the United States.

If communist aggression remains unchecked in Central America it will engulf successive refugee campsites and cause an explosion of "feet people" who will walk north to the United States. President Reagan, in his May 9, 1984 speech on Central American policy, stated that concerns about "refugees fleeing communist oppression" and seeking "entry into our country" are "well founded." He warned that Central America "has become the state for a bold attempt by the Soviet Union, Cuba and Nicaragua to install communism by force throughout the hemisphere . . . weapons, supplies and funds are shipped from the Soviet bloc to Cuba, from Cuba to Nicaragua, from Nicaragua to the Salvadoran guerrillas." Furthermore, the President noted that the Kissinger Commission report agrees that we could soon be facing "a Communist Central America with additional Communist military bases on the mainland of this hemisphere and Communist subversion spreading southward and northward. This Communist subversion poses the threat that the 100 million people from Panama to the open border on our South could come under the control of pro-Soviet regimes." Twenty million of those people will legally or illegally cross that "open border on our South."

Some newly arrived Salvadorans in this country came to find employment. They are being called economic migrants rather than political refugees. However, their economic problems stem directly from the Marxist guerrilla war now being waged in El Salvador. Never before have we faced such huge numbers of refugee aliens from Central America and their numbers will only continue to swell unless the communist threat that drives them from their homelands is stopped.

III

Of greater concern to many Americans is the economic impact of illegal immigration. In June 1982, the Supreme Court ruled that under equal enforcement of the law and in the absence of alternate Congressional intent, the various states must provide free public schooling for illegal aliens. This, coupled with statistics such as 64 percent of all births at UCLA's hospital are by illegal alien mothers, kindles the fear that illegals represent a great financial burden to Americans.

Defenders of immigration are quick to point out that, surprisingly, taxes paid equal benefits received by illegals. This is true, but is not the whole story. It doesn't take in account the cost of job displacement. Rice University Professor Donald L. Huddle estimates that every ten illegal workers displace six Americans. Once a single firm hires illegals, there is a cost incentive for all its competitors to do likewise. The ripple effect of this practice is clear in key service and construction sectors in the southwest whose employees are almost exclusively illegal aliens.

Displacement also affects all income levels of American workers. It is a major myth that most illegal aliens take only low paying jobs that Americans do not want. The 1982 nationwide apprehension figures by INS investigators, including Border Patrol apprehensions which focus on farms and ranches, reveal that only 11 percent make less than minimum wage; 27 percent were paid $5.25 or above, and 9 percent were paid $7.25 or above.

Further, the estimated costs of job displacement are enormous. The Congressional Budget Office reports that each unemployed American costs $7,000 annually in transfer payments such as unemployment benefits and public assistance. Estimates from the U.S. Department of Labor place overall costs for displaced American workers at $1,113 billion annually per one million illegal aliens. CIS's December 1983 West Watch cited annual U.S. public costs per one million illegal aliens as follows:

U.S public costs per million illegal immigrants

Job displacement	$1,113,000,000
Unemployment	181,400,000
Education	367,200,000
Health care	92,900,000
Welfare	130,900,000
Justice and law enforcement—local	62,300,000
Justice and law enforcement—Federal	29,300,000
Subtotal	1,977,000,000
Taxes paid (minus)	−995,000,000

Should we experience massive illegal immigration as high as 20 million people, we would face annual public expenses of almost $20 billion.

In fact, $20 billion a year is a conservative projection of illegal alien costs. Currently, taxes paid cover transfer payments received by illegals because many still fit the traditional profile of young, single males in search of temporary employment. These men generally work hard, pay taxes and accept little welfare, education or unemployment benefits. However, as the political situation in Central America becomes increasingly volatile many more women and children are seeking permanent resettlement. Some men send their families to America for safety; others who are already here bring up their extended family instead of returning home to them. This dramatic increase in the number of families crossing our southern border will destroy the taxes-benefits balance. Many of these new public costs will have to be borne by state and local governments, as cities with large illegal alien populations have already discovered. Education costs will skyrocket, especially because of the Supreme Court decision requiring all public schools to admit illegal alien children. Special tutoring counseling and bilingual programs are being developed to facilitate these children's integration into American schools.

Health care costs also are expanding as many of these political refugees arrive with diseases ranging from malnutrition to tuberculosis and internal parasites. Frequent cases of these diseases are found among Nicaraguans in Honduran refugee camps. As more of them flee the highly overcrowded and often dangerous conditions of these camps, we can expect to encounter many more such cases in our public hospitals. As noted above, 64–80 percent of all current births in the Los Angeles public hospitals are to illegal alien mothers. These children are automatically U.S. citizens and upon attaining the age of 21 will be able to petition for their immediate relatives.

Other transfer payments will escalate as well, especially welfare benefits such as food stamps and AFDC (Aid to Families With Dependent Children). Since dependent children born in the U.S. are citizens they are eligible for all welfare programs. In 1980, 17.5 percent of benefits paid by all county operated public assistance programs in Los Angeles went to illegal aliens. This figure can only rise as more "feet people" arrive in the U.S.

With aliens increasingly reluctant to return to their native countries unemployment insurance payments are also growing. An experimental screening of unemployment insurance recipients for March 1982 in Illinois revealed that 51 percent of them were illegal aliens. In another study, 49 percent of the selected alien population in California had received unemployment benefits between 1975 and 1980.

Ironically, should the U.S. Government change its present policy and recognize the growing political nature of immigration from Central America by giving these people legal refugee status, public assistance expenses would soar even higher. Now, some illegal aliens do not apply for public assistance out of fear of being detected and deported. But if the government provides legal status, it also will have to provide huge assistance and resettlement programs.

IV

The current debate over U.S. immigration law reform highlights a critical consideration: illegal immigration must be halted now; the greater the crisis. Although Congress has been slow to realize this, the American public has not. Since 1977, public opposition to immigration has risen dramatically. A March 1977 Gallup poll showed 42 percent of the respondents favored decreased immigration, an increase of 9 percent from a Gallup poll taken twelve years earlier. By August 1981, 65 percent of the public favored decreased immigration in a similarly worded NBC poll. This shows a 23 percent increase in opposition to immigration in only four years.

The INS, like the American public, strongly supports immigration reform through increasing border control. They are dangerously understaffed to stop the current number of illegal crossings, let alone handling dramatic increases. While some improvement is necessary, the number of new officers needed is highly debated. Closing the border is virtually impossible; a fortified southern border manned by 50,000 guards would be necessary to keep everyone out. Yet, currently the Border Patrol normally has 450 men on any given eight-hour shift covering the 1,900 mile long U.S.-Mexican border. Clearly, there is a crying need for increased INS staffing levels.

The spectre of the Mexican-U.S. border bristling with guns raises a terrible moral dilemma for the United States. This country was founded by men and women fleeing governmental oppression of basic religious liberties and ever since has been the promised land for all people suffering economic, civil and religious oppression. Can we now in good conscience close our borders to families seeking the very freedoms which brought our own forebearers here? Internal reform of our immigration law ignores the only permanent and just solution—halting the causes of the massive flow of illegal aliens from Mexico and Central America.

The threat we now face is a direct consequence of our neglect of economics and national security south of the Rio Grande. For over half a century, Mexico has been ruled by the oligarchic PRI, the Institutional Revolutionary Party. Although the PRI represents itself as a "progressive democratic" party, no other party has won the presidency or a majority in Congress in all that time. The PRI's corruption, combined with its socialist economic policy, limits Mexico's ability to solve many of its pressing problems. Only a commitment to open government and massive reprivatization of the economy will stop the northward flow of refugees from becoming a flood.

Former Costa Rican Foreign Minister Gonzolo Facio has stated "The object of the current communist offensive in Central America is Mexico and its vast oil riches and its geographical proximity to the United States." He could well have added, and the strategically important Caribbean Sea lanes (The April 4, 1984 issue of the White House Digest explains that "nearly half our total exports and imports, representing over two-thirds of our seaborne foreign trade, pass through the vital commercial arteries of the Panama Canal, the Caribbean or the Gulf of Mexico.") A revolutionary pipeline has been built from the Soviet Union and Eastern Bloc countries through Cuba to Panama, Nicaragua and El Salvador, with extensions reaching into Guatemala and Honduras. Economic prosperity will never come to the region until that pipeline is dismantled.

Three to four million Latin Americans come into this country illegally every year. They come seeking the American dream: economic prosperity and political liberty. As long as their own countries are burdened with inefficient state-controlled economics and Marxist guerrilla warfare, that dream will be unrealizable at home. As those problems race unchecked toward a violent climax, we face the real possibility of 20 million people pouring into this country very shortly. Once this great northern trek begins it will be impossible to stop it. The only hope for the 100 million people between the Rio Grande and Panama lies in resolute action of both their and our governments.

Notes.—Figures are rounded.

Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Chairman, today's vote on aid to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters is a vote about the freedom of the Nicaraguan people. If we vote "yes" on aid to the freedom fighters, we will be voting for giving freedom and democracy a chance in Nicaragua. If we vote "no," we will be condemning the people of Nicaragua to the terror and repression that are inherent in Communist states.

Some people may claim this is an overstatement. It is not. It is a statement of fact.

Before going any further, let's clarify some of the terms of this debate. First, "Sandinista" is inaccurately reserved for the ruling regime in Managua, which has perverted and twisted Sandinismo until Sandino himself would not recognize it. Many of the armed opposition, on the other hand, are Sandinistas who have remained true to the goals of Sandino.

The term "Contra" has been used incorrectly to designate the Nicaraguan freedom fighters. "Contra" is short for counterrevolutionaries, but the freedom fighters are not counterrevolutionaries—they are revolutionaries. They are continuing the revolution in which so many of them participated against Somoza. They are still fighting for freedom and democratic pluralism. The goals of the revolution have not changed—the dictatorship they are fighting has.

The Sandinista regime is a self-proclaimed "Marxist-Leninist" regime, yet when some of us talk about communism in Central America, some people start shaking their heads. Marxism-Leninism is communism.

Now let's clear up; just who is involved in the conflict in Nicaragua. Some people seem to have the idea that this is a conflict between the United States and Nicaragua, an imperialistic view that gives the United States a much larger role than it actually plays. The Nicaraguan conflict is not between the United States and Nicaragua; it is not between the United States and the Soviet Union; it is a conflict between Nicaraguans, some of whom adhere to communism, others to freedom and pluralistic democracy. The Soviet Union has weighed in heavily, both directly and indirectly, on the side of the Marxist-Leninist Sandinista National Liberation Front. The United States has weighed in much less convincingly on the side of the democratic groups.

And what about the nature of the Nicaraguan regime? It has received hundreds of millions of dollars worth of military support from Cuba, the Soviet Union, East-bloc countries, and Libya to build the largest and best equipped army in Central America. It has instituted censorship of the press; it practices religious repression of Catholics, Jews, Moravians, and Evangelicals; it has forcefully relocated whole communities; it does not allow free labor unions; it has more political prisoners that Somaza ever had; it promotes indoctrination rather than education

I could go on, but I think you get the general idea. And if you think freedom and democracy are a fading dream now, it's nothing compared to what it will be if the Nicaraguan regime is given the chance to consolidate its position and power. The ramifications of such a consolidation for all of Central America, Mexico, and the United States must not be underestimated.

To vote against aid will be voting to consign our Nicaraguan neighbors to communism and the Central American region to subversion and destabilization. The hour is late. The choice is clear. A vote for aid is a vote for freedom.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WORTLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of aid for the freedom fighters.

Mr. Chairman, the question that we are now debating—whether or not to give $14 million in aid to the democratic freedom fighters in Nicaragua—revolves around two principal points.

The first point is whether this Nation, the United States of America, is going to abandon its history, its values, and its commitment to the expansion of freedom, liberty, and justice in the world. Our Nation was made free by the blood and sweat of our forefathers and by the help of European countries and individuals in our struggle against the foreign domination of Great Britain. Now there is a large and growing force of people in Nicaragua who are trying to bring our principles of liberty and democratic government to that most unfortunate land.

The freedom fighters, their families, and their less vocal supporters only want the opportunity to participate in an honest and open political process to determine the future of Nicaragua and the revolution that brought them so much hope in 1979. That revolution has been subverted and stolen by a relatively small group of dedicated Communists. If the friends of the American Revolution had abandoned us when the going got tough, how do you think America might have turned out? I am thankful that we never had to find out.

If we in this Congress turn our backs on people whose only goal is freedom and the right to chose their own destiny, then I would tell you that we have turned our backs on our morality and our history as a nation and as a people.

The second point to this debate goes beyond support for our principles to our security. We need only look at similar debates in history for this lesson. There were Members of this body who stood right here in this well and warned America that Adolph Hitler was a dangerous madman. Others scoffed and said that Hitler's rearmament program would only put Germany back to its rightful place and that Hitler was just a reformer. America and the West did nothing until after the world had been plunged into the deadliest war in history.

We were warned that Mao-tse-Tung was a ruthless, bloodthirsty Communist who would threaten the world with his fanatical adherence to Marxism. Others scoffed and said that Mao was just an agrarian reformer who would be good for China and the world. America and the West did nothing and had to watch as 60 million Chinese were murdered and starved to death because they lacked "purity of the spirit" in adhering to Mao's Marxism.

There were those who stood here and warned America that Fidel Castro was a Communist revolutionary who would not improve the life of the Cuban people, but that he would threaten America and the world with his adherence to Marxism. Others scoffed at this and said that Castro was "just a popular reformer" who had nothing but the welfare of his people at heart. So America and the West acquiesced to Castro and now there are 20,000 Cuban combat troops in Angola, 5,000 Cuban combat troops in Ethiopia, 10,000 Cubans in Nicaragua. There were 800 Cuban "construction workers" in Grenada who shot Americans in 1983.

There were those who stood here and warned of the Marxism of Augustino Neto in Angola and Robert Mugabe in Zimbabwe and how they would be a threat to human rights and freedom in those nations if we abandoned the democratic groups seeking to promote freedom and not totalitarianism. Others scoffed at that and said that these were honorable men who wanted pluralism and nonalignment. So America cut off support from UNITA and helped Mr. Mugabe share power in Zimbabwe. Now the Cubans protect what is left to the Marxist government of Angola because UNITA has survived despite us and is gaining support as it progresses throughout the country. In Zimbabwe there is no pluralism as the Marxists have driven out their opponents and have seized control of the Government and the army.

When I and others stand in this well and warn America that the Sandinista Marxists in Nicaragua desire nothing less than the conquest of Central America there will be those who scoff and say that there is no immediate threat to us and that the Sandinistas are nice people who are being pushed into being bad by America. These naysayers need only open their history books to see the fate of Central America if we do not help our democratic brethren in Nicaragua.

I support freedom, dignity, liberty, and democracy. I will not abandon others who also believe in these things.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution. I rise to speak against the expenditure of $14 million of the American taxpayers' money to fund an illegal military intervention to overthrow the legitimate Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to most of the debate, the very long debate today, and I know that at this point no speaker can hope to add very much or to say very much that is new; however, I think it is important that certain things are reemphasized at this point in the debate.

I think it is important to reemphasize the fact that since we are concerned about the containment of communism or the stopping of the spread of communism in Latin America, we should consider those speakers who have argued again and again that military intervention is the least effective, the least efficient way to contain communism in Latin America and Central America.

Military intervention did not stop communism in Southeast Asia. Several speakers have drawn parallels with the war in Vietnam and I think those parallels were appropriate. I fully agree with those who have said that the lessons of history that were taught by Vietnam should not be forgotten. We lost about 58,000 American lives in Vietnam and many more were mutilated, wounded; many more bear psychological scars as a result of our assumption that the domino theory should govern our actions in Vietnam.

We assumed that if Vietnam fell, all of Southeast Asia would go behind Vietnam and we had to take a stand in Vietnam. History has shown that this was not true.

The New York Times and several other publications in the last 2 weeks pointed out the fact that Southeast Asia is booming and prosperous at this point. The only governments, the only nations in Southeast Asia that are not prosperous, that are not booming, are the nations of Vietnam and Cambodia, the two areas of conflict, the two areas of violence and military intervention.

The economies are strong in countries that we thought would go under if we lost in Vietnam—and we did lose in Vietnam. And yet the domino theory is not occurring. It appears that the domino theory is acting in reverse in favor of the United States and against the Soviet Union, since not only in Southeast Asia but following the end of the war in Vietnam capitalism has begun to flourish even in the largest Communist nation in the world, the nation of China. China has the largest land mass of communism and the largest number of people under communism, and yet capitalism is flourishing and being applauded in China.

We should learn the lessons of history and understand that if we want to stop communism in Latin America, in South America, and Central America, perhaps we should take a new tack. Perhaps we should weave together some of these more creative and imaginative programs, the peaceful programs that have succeeded.

The Marshall plan succeeded. Why not a Marshall plan for Central America and South America and Latin America? The Peace Corps, although it was only an experiment and quite small in scope, succeeded.

The Alliance for Progress succeeded partially. It only failed because the same forces that are causing problems in Latin America now were intransigent, refused to budge, resisted President Kennedy's attempt to change peacefully the economies of Latin America in favor of giving more to the masses who suffer in Latin America.

The people of Latin America, like the people in the rest of the world, the ordinary people are fed up with ideology. They want food, clothing, shelter. They want educational opportunities for their children. They want decent health care. They are not interested in ideology.

In Poland the people who work in private factories, private enterprises that recently have been introduced in the Communist state of Poland; those people are looking at their paychecks and they like the paychecks they get from private enterprise. I am sure private enterprise in China is not worrying the people who are profiting from that.

All over, ideologies must take a bow to actual performance, especially in this hemisphere in which we claim to have the dominant influence. We have the leadership here. Most of the people in the hemisphere look to us for leadership. Why do we not provide more aggressive leadership in terms of creative and imaginative programs which will provide that improvement in the quality of life for the numerous people out there who only want decent food, clothing, shelter, health care and an educational opportunity for their children.

We can do this. We can start with the $14 million by using it in a humanitarian way. Spend it through channels to help all the refugees, refugees anywhere in Central America. Let us let some objective body, like the International Red Cross or the U.N. committee on refugees distribute this $14 million as a symobolic gesture, a beginning gesture for a new policy in Latin America, a new policy which would be made up of past programs, a tapestry which would be woven from some of the things that have succeeded in the past.

Why not a Marshall plan? Why not more Peace Corps? We can go forward and contain communism and do what is best for all of the people of this hemisphere. We can do it with peaceful initiatives.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HUTTO].

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, having previously visited in Central America, as many other Members of this body have, I feel that I should rise in support of the efforts of the Contras to bring about some changes in the repressive Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. What a shame that the revolution which overthrew the dictatorship of Anastasio Somoza took the wrong turn.

I remember very well that in 1979 we tried to assist the fledgling new regime. I remember even more clearly hearing the late chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Clement Zablocki, at the end of a long debate on whether or not we should vote $75 million to the new government in Nicaragua, say, "it is the least we can do. It's a chance we have to take in trying to bring democracy to this country." I voted for the $75 million and took a lot of flack for doing so.

Sadly, our attempts to work with the Sandinistas have not been successful. The Sandinista regime turned its back on us—turned its back on freedom—turned its back on a pluralistic form of government and the hopes and aspirations of the revolution. I think there is no argument that the Sandinista government is Marxist-Leninist—that the people are suffering under a Communist regime.

Unfortunately, we do not have the luxury of not being involved in Central America. In view of what the Soviets, Cubans, and others are doing worldwide—in Afghanistan, Poland, Nicaragua, and elsewhere—we must do what we can to prevent the spread of their type of activity. This is especially true at our doorstep in Latin America.

Because of our involvement and because of our support we are greatly encouraged by the progress that is being made in El Salvador. It is good to see that the people have expressed themselves freely at the ballot box by electing President Duarte, who appears to be making good strides in curbing the death squads and bringing about some reforms to help the plight of his people.

Frankly, one of the great concerns of the people in Florida and other gulf coast States is a further flood of refugees into the United States. If people can live in peace and freedom with hope for the future in their own country, they will not seek to escape to another nation. If we can help to democratize the countries to the south, then we can better maintain jobs here for our own people, and also avoid costly programs in helping refugees to settle here.

The Contras can keep the pressure on Nicaragua, and slow or stop the spread of Sandinista-like regimes to other countries. The Contras can keep the pressure on the Sandinistas to change their way of life—to quit being oppressive to the people and the church—to allow freedom of expression and freedom of the press. Without this kind of pressure, don't expect any changes in what's going on in Nicaragua. Do not expect any lessening of activity by the Soviets and Cubans.

Yes, we should support aid to the Contras. We should not and have no intentions of sending American troops to fight in Central America. Our adversaries have good success in using proxies. Why can't we do the same? Let's help the Contras in keeping the pressure on a very repressive regime in Nicaragua.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN].

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the central issue in the debate on aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua is whether the United States seeks peace and democracy through diplomacy or subversion. Put another way, does our policy in Central America use military force as a last resort or as a first resort.

The White House has poured some new wine into its old Central American policy wineskins. It claims that its new peace proposals cinch the argument in favor of aid to the anti-government Contras in Nicaragua. But I have grave doubts.

I welcome any movement by the President away from military aid to the Contras and toward a negotiated end to the conflict in Nicaragua. The Reagan administration apparently wants a plan which offers $14 million in nonmilitary aid to the Contras and the option of military aid if peace talks, mediated by the Catholic Church, should fail.

But has the leopard really changed its spots? On its face, the administration calls the aid "humanitarian." But money is fungible: Giving the Contras $14 million in humanitarian aid assuredly frees up other Contra funds for guns and bullets. And peace talks or not, the Reagan plan still would permit the administration to renew aid to the Contras as part of a reported effort to expand the Contra forces from about 20,000 to 35,000 soldiers. Not surprisingly, the Sandinista government has dismissed the Reagan proposal.

PEACE TALKS: A FIRST RESORT

The chairman of the Select Intelligence Committee, Mr. HAMILTON, and the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Western Hemisphere Subcommittee, Mr. BARNES have drafted a strong bipartisan alternative that meets three important goals: it uses the good offices of the Organization of American States or the Contadora group to set up peace talks between the Contras and Sandinistas without preconditions. The Contadora nations of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela have already won the respect of both sides and their mediation—not the club of more U.S. Contra aid—is more likely to produce a solution; it indefinitely bans military aid to the Contras until Congress specifically approves such aid; it reinforces a constructive U.S. role in the area by providing $10 million to the International Red Cross or the United Nations for aid to any Nicaraguan refugees outside of their homeland.

I don't favor a cut-and-run approach, and I'm no fan of the Sandinistas. I don't want to see Nicaragua in a fixed orbit around the Soviets and Cubans. And, I don't approve of Nicaragua's inept efforts to export arms to Salvadoran rebels or its heavyhanded press censorship.

But the fact is that Contra aid and the mining of Nicaragua's harbors have undercut our national interest instead of advancing it. The Contras are not close to knocking the Sandinistas from power and $14 million more won't do the job either. Nor has CIA mischief-making won us any new friends south of the border; just the reverse. As a result, the American people have voiced overwhelming opposition to the administration's policy. Without public support, any policy is doomed to fail.

More than anything else, I remain convinced that what we are trying to do in Nicaragua is wrong. Shipping arms to the Contras, who are clearly intent on overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government, violates our own laws and flaunts our best traditions. It should not be the province of the United States of America to abet the overthrow of a foreign government we don't like. If we don't want the Sandinistas to export unrest and terror, then we can't wink at our sponsorship or subversion.

If we want to stop the reach of Cuba and the Soviet Union in our own backyard, then let us first use the policy tools which work: Food, medicine, and education—not the weapons which too often fail—guns, bribes, and mines. Only as a last resort, let us consider appropriate military options.

Our best bet is exerting strong diplomatic pressure on the Sandinistas through a concerted multinational effort with the Contadora nations. Waging peace, not war, offers the clearest hope for a workable pact in Nicaragua and stronger U.S. ties with all of Latin America. I urge the Administration to take the next step forward and rise in support of the Barnes-Hamilton-Fish bipartisan peace plan.

I include for the record an article by my colleague, Mr. BARNES, which makes a convincing case for a strong U.S. humanitarian and diplomatic role in Central America and an equally sound argument against any direct aid to the Contras.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 21, 1985]

AN ALTERNATIVE THAT PUTS PRESSURE ON BOTH SIDES

(By Michael D. Barnes)

The objectives of U.S. policy toward Nicaragua should be to enhance the security and stability of Central America by achieving reciprocal and verifiable security arrangements with Nicaragua and by promoting political pluralism and the observance of human rights in Nicaragua.

There is now a consensus in Congress that current policies are not achieving—and hold no real prospect of achieving—these objectives. In recognition of that growing consensus, President Reagan has dropped his proposal that Congress release an additional $14 million for military aid for the contras. This week, Congress will consider alternative approaches.

Along with my Democratic colleagues Lee H. Hamilton and James R. Jones, and my Republican colleagues Hamilton Fish Jr., Jim Leach, Ed Zschau and Willis D. Gradison Jr., I have prepared a bipartisan alternative that I believe can, and will, command broad support in Congress and among the American people. Our alternative is designed to support regional peace efforts and give diplomacy a chance to work, while at the same time maintaining pressure on the Sandinistas to change policies that we feel destabilize the region.

The policy set forth in our resolution is to seek peace in Nicaragua and Central America through the Contadora process, which provides an appropriate 21-point framework for achieving U.S. objectives. As part of a regional settlement, it should be U.S. policy to encourage a cease-fire and peace talks among the combatants in Nicaragua.

Our resolution points out that there are disturbing trends in Nicaragua's foreign and domestic policies, including restrictions on individual and press freedoms, the subordination of government functions to party control, close Soviet-Cuban ties and a military buildup, and efforts by the Sandinistas to export their influence and ideology. There are also serious human rights violations by both the Nicaraguan government and the contras.

We believe that Congress should monitor events in Nicaragua carefully, and that progress in reversing these trends should be a key element in future congressional decisions with respect to Nicaragua and Central America as a whole. Actions by the Sandinista government and its opponents will weigh heavily in determining those decisions. If progress is made, the United States should consider improving ties with Nicaragua, including expanded trade relations and the provision of technical and economic assistance.

Our alternative continues in effect the existing prohibition on funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua until such time as Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing that prohibition. Meanwhile, our resolution provides $10 million for humanitarian assistance for refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether or not they are associated with the contras. The assistance could not be used for provisioning combat units. To ensure that the assistance is not misused in that or any other way, we provide that it be channeled through one of the two recognized international relief agencies with experience in the area: the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees or the International Committee of the Red Cross. As a sign of our commitment to the Contadora process, we also provide that $4 million will be available for the costs of implementing a Contadora agreement.

Our alternative requires the president to continue to report periodically to Congress on the situation in Nicaragua, and it gives the president another opportunity, after the beginning of the new fiscal year on Oct. 1, to request further action by Congress. The resolution would bind Congress to give any such request expedited consideration, just as it is now doing with respect to the president's request for $14 million in military aid for the contras.

We believe that this alternative serves U.S. peace and security interests in several important ways. It gives a strong impetus to the Contadora process, which will make an agreement much more likely than if a plan is "made in the U.S.A." It puts pressure on both side in the Nicaraguan conflict to enter into a dialogue leading to reconciliation and an opening of the political system, because after Oct. 1 the president can force Congress to reconsider the situation, and neither side will want to be held responsible for lack of progress. The alternative offers incentives for those on both sides of the conflict who desire such a dialogue and reconciliation to get together. It criticizes both the Sandinistas and their opponents where criticism is due.

Our alternative makes eventual U.S. intervention in Nicaragua less likely. It combines restraint with the engagement of our diplomatic, political and economic resources squarely on behalf of our interests. Equally important, it provides a way out of our own domestic impasse, and the deep divisions that current policy toward Nicaragua have engendered.

SUMMARY OF THE BIPARTISAN ALTERNATIVE NICARAGUA PROPOSAL OF REPRESENTATIVES MICHAEL D. BARNES, LEE H. HAMILTON, JAMES R. JONES, HAMILTON FISH, JR., JIM LEACH, AND ED ZSCHAU

I. The resolution contains the following findings and declarations:

(1) The United States desires peace in Nicaragua and throughout Central America, and U.S. policy toward Nicaragua should encourage a cease fire and peace negotiations among the combatants as part of a regional settlement through the Contadora process or the OAS.

(2) The Contadora 21 principles provide an appropriate framework for achieving peace and security in the region.

(3) There are disturbing trends in Nicaragua's foreign and domestic policies in the areas of individual and press freedoms, dominance of the party, Soviet/Cuban ties and the military buildup, and efforts to export Sandinista influence and ideology.

(4) Congress will carefully monitor the situation, and progress in curtailing these trends will be a key element in future congressional decisions.

(5) If Congress determines that progress is being made toward peace and democracy in Nicaragua, consideration will be given to initiating economic and development programs in such areas as trade and technical assistance.

(6) In assessing progress, Congress will expect, within the context of a regional settlement, the removal of foreign military advisers from Nicaragua, an end to Sandinista support for insurgencies in the region, restoration of freedoms, and progress in conducting free and fair elections.

II. The resolution continues in effect the prohibition on funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua without regard to fiscal year until Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing that prohibition.

III. The resolution provides the following assistance:

(1) $4 million for expenses arising from the implementation of a Contadora agreement, such as expenses for peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems.

(2) $10 million for humanitarian assistance for refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they are associated with the contras. This assistance may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees upon the determination of such organization that the assistance is necessary for humanitarian purposes, and may not be provided for provisioning combat units.

IV. The resolution provides that the President must report to Congress every three months on progress made in achieving the objectives of the resolution and on any expenditure of funds under the resolution, and may, any time after October 1, 1985, request further action by the Congress. Such request would be considered under expedited procedures similar to those being employed for the current request.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the very patient gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, one of the most puzzling questions about this debate is how two great political parties and their leaders assembled in this chamber can read the evidence and come to diametrically opposed conclusions. I have wrestled with this question time and again when attempting to resolve how I am going to vote and why it is we have this difference. And the only analysis that makes sense that I have been able to figure out is that essentially we have a different perception on revolutions taking place in the world today and those that have taken place in the past.

There is a line of thought which says that what is going on in Central America is really a revolution. We Americans, at least in North America, are a revolutionary people, we should be on the side of revolution in the world to preserve and advance the cause of social justice, and therefore it is inappropriate for the Government of the United States to be against the revolution going on in Central America.

That has a ring of truth to it but it has a fatal defect in it because all revolutions are not created equal. The American revolution was fought 200 years ago for political, economic, and religious reasons but it had at its foundation a respect for private property, the preseravation of private property.

The revolution going on in Central America is ostensibly for purposes of religious, economic, and political freedom but it has achieved none of those things and yet at the same time it is destroying private property.

It takes property from one class of people with a gun and distributes it to another class of people all in the name of pursuing social justice.

That is the difference in perception. When you believe, erroneously as I believe, that the revolution going on in Central America is a continuation of the American Revolution, you can come to the point where you can offer this body something tonight or tomorrow a proposal that is contained in the Barnes-Hamilton plan whereby we can offer assistance, but nonmilitary assistance only.

Now I would like to believe that we can live in the world of today without arms, without strife and without struggle. It would be a wonderful world if that were the case. But for those who believe that is the way of the world is, I feel sorry for them because history does not teach us that.

I reluctantly conclude that the only way to deal with a Marxist government is to tell, very clearly, that if they choose to pursue what they call the war of liberation by internal subversion which is going on in Nicaragua today, that they are going to face a force of arms from some other source to resist that revolution which definitely is not in the interest of those people.

That is why this Member from California has concluded that it is in the interests of this body to support the President's request and vote in favor of House Joint Resolution 239.

Another question the American taxpayers can ask is why should I be concerned with what is going on in Central America? What difference does it make to me? It is no threat to me.

Well, the evidence is that the Italian members of the Red Brigades, the German adherents to the Baader-Meinhof gang, the Basque ETA separatists, Honduran Cinchoneros, the Peruvian Shining Path militants, the Argentine Montoneros, the Uruguayan Tupamaros, and a host of others have taken up residence in Nicaragua.

My friends, they did not come there just as tourists, they did not come there to work on the airfield that is large enough to receive every aircraft in the Soviet arsenal. They have come there to use Nicaragua as a mounting place for terrorism in Central America and in their view, hopefully, to bring that terrorism to North America.

I think it is appropriate for us to recognize what we are facing in Central America, that it is a revolution that is destructive of private property, that those people mean business in terms of seizing power through the force of a gun and we should commend the people in Nicaragua who are willing to, at this point in our history, maintain a struggle that is our struggle, namely the pursuit of freedom and the protection of private property.

There is a correlation between the current situation in Central America and the Russian revolution in 1917. Seeking political and economic freedom from the oppression of czarist rule, revolutionaries of various stripes joined forces to overthrow the government. Once in power, however, the Bolsheviks stole the revolution from the more moderate Mensheviks. As a result, Russia became a Communist country with no opportunity to develop into a moderate socialist state, a democracy, or some other variation of self-government.

A similar comparison can be made with Cuba. In the late 1950's, Castro successfully stole a people's revolution. While his democratic allies in the fight against the Batista government were occupied in formal institutions like the Council of State and various ministries, Castro and an inner band of trusted guerrillas built and consolidated control over the real instruments of power—the army, the secret police, revolutionary tribunals, and other organizations.

Today in Nicaragua, we again see Communists—the Sandinista directorate—stealing a revolution from the people. The democratic opposition to Somoza established a broad coalition which included the Sandinistas. Cuba provided the Sandinistas with about 500 tons of weapons and other military supplies as well as advisers which made them an extremely powerful ally for the true democratic opposition.

Due to the non-Communist democratic elements of this broad coalition, many Western governments failed to recognize the real character of the Sandinistas. After this coalition had succeeded in bringing down the Somoza regime, the Sandinistas followed Castro's example: An inner core was formed headed by the Sandinista National Liberation Front [FSLN], a nine-person directorate. They established a new army, an internal security apparatus, and a variety of controlled organizations like neighborhood defense committees, trade unions, professional groups, and media organs.

By encouraging their democratic allies to participate in the executive branch institutions of the new government, the Sandinistas were able to maintain their credibility and receive substantial ($1.6 billion) western aid through 1982.

Late in 1979, shortly after the Sandinista victory, a plan was launched to isolate and bring under Sandinista control the various democratic groups, including political parties, labor unions, and the media. The Sandinistas acknowledged that these groups had to be allowed to exist because of international opinion, but they planned to gain control of them from within.

And what of the promises made during the revolution to replace the Somoza dictatorship with new social, political, and economic systems based upon the principles of pluralism, free elections, a mixed economy, and observance of human rights?

Special tribunals, outside the judicial system, were established to try the cases of suspected counterrevolutionaries, thus denying them legal protection afforded by the regular courts.

Using both the powers of government and the capacity for intimidation of Sandinista organizations, the Nicaraguan Government continues to harass opposition political parties, independent labor confederations, the private sector, the Catholic Church, and the independent media.

There is no free press. Censorship of print and electronic media continues. The editors of La Prensa, the only independent source of news in Nicaragua, claim that between January and October 1983, the government censored over 50 percent of their stories on current national and international events.

The various Sandinista organizations, particularly the Sandinista defense committees, seek out dissidents and coerce people into participating in Sandinista-sponsored activities.

Through both legal and extra-legal means, the government seized the private property of several prominent citizens; it warned that neutrality in the struggle against armed opposition forces might be punishable by confiscation.

In December of 1981, the Sandinistas began destroying more than 40 villages of Protestant, English-speaking indians in northeastern Nicaragua. About 15,000 escaped into Honduras. The remaining indians were either killed by the FSLN or forcibly relocated to detention camps. The proof of these atrocities is undeniable.

The Cuban and Nicaraguan revolutions demonstrate a historical method of operation for a communist takeover of a revolution:

First, unification of the extreme left;

Second, establishment of a broad coalition, led by the extreme left but including some non-Communist or democratic elements, which makes direct or ambiguous promises of a broad-based government after victory;

Third, use of the broad coalition, systematic propaganda, and political action techniques to obtain non-Communist international support and isolate the target government from Western political and material assistance; and Fourth, providing Soviet bloc, Cuban, and other anti-Western military support as an incentive for extreme left unity.

The correlation between Communist strategy and events in Central America is obvious. And while there is certainly room for reasonable men to differ on exactly how our Nation should conduct its foreign policy, we should be able to agree on the fundamentals of a system of government which we must oppose:

First, the goal of communism is world domination;

Second, the Communists do not negotiate for purposes of achieving peace unless they are forced to do so by the realization that they cannot profit from further conflict;

Third, communism cannot coexist with capitalism;

Fourth, there are no absolute moral imperatives in Communist philosophy; morality is relative: that which enhances the state is moral; and Fifth, communism cannot coexist with any religion that acknowledges a being superior to the state.

Sadly, we don't seem to be able to agree on these fundamentals. We maintain that if only we constrain our inordinate fear of communism, if only we would refrain from building this or that weapons system, if only we would negotiate with this or that terrorist/revolutionary force—we could be at peace with the Communists.

This is naive and dangerous thinking. There is no historical basis for this line of reasoning. The Communist definition of peace is not the same as the American definition. Peace talks and negotiations are a tactic to be engaged in only to the extent that they may further the goal of world domination.

We do our Nation a profound disservice if we fail to realize that Communists have gone to great lengths to understand the American mindset. Not only do they understand how we think, but they are masters at using our compassion, integrity, and sense of justice and fair play against us.

On the matter of this social and moral conscience, many U.S. religious and political groups opposed to assisting the Contras repeatedly point to purported violence and terrorism which the Contras inflict on their own countrymen.

I invite those moral arbiters who seem to show compassion only for the victims of rightwing tyranny—but, oh, perish the thought, never from the left—to examine the record of brutality, deceit, inhumanity, and vicious oppression which the Sandinista regime has accumulated in the past 5 years.

Among the several of my colleagues who have taken an interest in and spoken out on the situation in Nicaragua, my friend BOB LIVINGSTON from Louisiana has given us a truly stark and horrible glimpse into the ghastly atrocities perpetrated by the Sandinistas on those considered to be opponents of the government. His statement reciting the litany of horrors is printed in the April 4 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In addition, one of the original Sandinista leaders of the 1979 revolt, Arturo Cruz, has recently concluded that the revolution has been betrayed by President Ortega and his ruling junta. Echoing the sentiments of the inter-American Human Rights Commission, he charges that the Sandinistas have consolidated power at the expense of freedom and democratic principles. The Contras have emerged as the only viable internal force which can combat this evil. In his words, "they have gone from being an instrument of U.S. policy to a social movement."

Another facet not be overlooked is the undeniable connection between the Sandinistas and world terrorism. Scores of leftwing militants have settled in Nicaragua, where they plan their next ventures and plot destruction with the less-than-benign acquiescence of the Sandinista government.

Italian members of the Red Brigades, German adherents to the Baader-Meinhof Gang, Basque ETA separatists, Honduran Cinchoneros, Peruvian Shining Path militants, Argentine Montoneros, Uruguayan Tuparmaros, and a host of others inhabit the ranks of these terrorists. And, not insignificantly, the Palestine Liberation Organization, Iran's Khomeini, and Libya's Qadhafi also figure prominently. From their Nicaraguan base, these terrorists export violence to their respective homelands and throughout the world.

In order to blunt justified criticism of their outrageous policies, the Sandinistas have sought closer ties to the political left here in the United States as well as worldwide. These open-minded liberals are reminded of the excesses of the Samoza regime and are fed the obligatory rhetoric about human rights, sympathy for revolutionary ideals, and compassion for the Earth's downtrodden masses. Aid to counterrevolutionaries like the Contras would be a dastardly exhibition of U.S. imperialism.

One can only wonder what it takes to convince these people that tyranny of the left is no less an evil than that of the right. It is astonishing, distressing, and sickening to see the American left (though not all of it) defend the Sandinistas, perhaps not directly, but certainly by their denying assistance to those who wish to preserve the democratic ideals of the 1979 revolution.

By their words, they represent themselves as world humanitarians. By their actions, they reveal themselves to be no better than the tyrannical despots who enslave peoples and annihilate freedoms.

"Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour."—1 Peter, 5:8

Mr. Chairman, I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Chairman, I think it is not the question of $14 million that we are talking about here; $14 million in today's economy, especially in this administration, will probably be enough to buy a couple of pliers and maybe a few hammers.

The fact of the matter is that we are talking about a difference of basic philosophy in terms of policy in Central America.

For those of us who understand the culture of the people of South America, we can only say to those who stand here today asking us to send money to the Contras so that a Garcia can continue shooting at a Rodriguez, a Rodriguez can continue shooting at a Gonzalez, a Gonzalez can continue shooting at an Ortega. The bottom line to all of this, for those of us who understand, is that for many, many decades the United States has continued to intervene in Central America.

When you go to Nicaragua, what is the first thing they say to you? They talk about the exploitation of the large companies in the twenties and the thirties, who came into Nicaragua.

Today, we go, and what do they talk about? They talk about, once again, intervention.

Look, I do not believe there is a person on this floor who is happy with Daniel Ortega. Those of us who have had opportunity to meet with him to talk with him, we all, I think, agree that the people of Nicaragua could do a heck of a lot better.

But let me say to my colleagues I believe it is absolutely essential that what takes place in Central America be decided by the people of Central America.

We sit in this Chamber and we decide what other countries are going to do with their own country. I believe that it is their country, it is their part of the world and they are entitled to make those decisions whether they are wrong or right.

For those of us who have participated in a shooting war, and I think there are Members on both sides of the aisle who have participated in a shooting war, we know that war is hell and we stand on this floor and we pontificate and talk about who is more macho than the other.

The bottom line is that people are getting killed. The only way we are going to solve the Central American problem is by getting those persons who are truly interested, bringing democracy there, to get together.

Let us say, for example, we send half a billion dollars into Central America tomorrow, especially into Nicaragua and, let us say, that we were able to beat back every Sandinista, that war will continue. The only way we are going to stop that war is having those people and the neighboring countries get together and decide what is best for them.

I think the time has come for this Congress and this country called America to let people decide their own fate.

Please, I think we have had enough of the Garcias and the Rodriguezes shooting and killing each other. We are talking now about a part of the world that has been dominated by, first, oligarchy, and now it has shifted over to the other extreme.

I say to my colleagues, to all of you here, that there is no perfect solution to what is going on in Nicaragua, but I would say to each and every one of you that whatever the solution is it should be decided upon by the people who live in that part of the world.

The President's policy with regard to Nicaragua is an excellent example of the contradiction between morality and perceived strategic interest. The Kissinger Commission on Central America stated that a primary goal of our policy toward the region should be: "To preserve the moral authority of the United States."

Does aiding the Contras contradict this goal? I think so. Certainly the World Court believes so, as do many of our European allies. Even Margaret Thatcher protested the mining of Managua's harbors last year.

This is not to say that a totalitarian regime in Nicaragua wouldn't threaten our security interests in the region. Perhaps, but the arguments that the Reagan administration has put forth in favor of aiding the Contras are based on the premise that force is the only way to handle the Sandinistas.

Certainly force can be very persuasive, but the Contras, as they are presently constituted, are not a credible bargaining chip.

They are factionalized. Many within their ranks are heirs to the worst excesses of the Somoza regime. Their human rights record reflects this. They may not all be mercenaries, but they are certainly not all freedom fighters. More importantly, they have no chance of taking control of Managua—even with massive amounts of aid.

Without the Contras how do we bring about change in Nicaragua? We start by working through Contadora. We gain nothing by ignoring the Sandinistas. I don't like the Chilean Government, but I would never suggest that we stop talking to Santiago. It is my belief that with patience and the right amount of pressure, Managua—that is the Sandinistas—may be forced to institute changes that are more democratic.

It is important that we understand that even a full scale invasion by the United States will not put an end to the Sandinistas. Yet, such an invasion would succeed in tearing our country apart. That is something none of us can afford.

The President's supporters have said that we should support the Contras so that American troops won't have to go to Nicaragua. That's faulty reasoning. My concern is that by supporting the Contras we will only serve to fan the flames in Nicaragua, in Honduras, in Costa Rica, and finally back at the White House, leading us into an unnecessary conflict that will, in the end, do notning to help the people of Central America or to protect our security interests.

There is no more telling statement of how devastating an unpopular war can be than a recent picture published in Time magazine showing President Lyndon Johnson leaning over his desk in anguish as he listens to a tape recording from his son-in-law, Chuck Robb, describing the loss of his men in battle in Vietnam. Even our military commanders do not want to see a reoccurrence of this in Nicaragua or elsewhere in Central America, and there isn't support from the people of this Nation for a war. There doesn't seem to be a great deal of support for even a covert war.

It is my feeling that the people of this Nation would like to see a negotiated end to this conflict, to our problems with Nicaragua. I believe that the American people are counting on us to come up with a better plan to settle our differences with the Sandinistas, than mining their harbors, and waging war by proxy.

We've got to continue to pressure the Sandinistas diplomatically and economically. There is no argument about that. The argument stems from what our tactics should be. I do not believe for a moment that we will be able to break the backs of the Sandinistas—and that is what the President seems to want—by intimidating them militarily. We can win this conflict peacefully because we are the better Nation, because our system is the better system. It will prevail.

We can't hang the threat of military intervention over the heads of the Sandinistas and expect them to cry uncle. They won't. The President had the right idea on how to handle our problems with the Sandinistas when he sent Ambassador Schkaudman to Manzanillo to talk to the Nicaraguan Deputy Foreign Minister. What the President must do is to continue with this line of thinking without holding out the threat of armed conflict. There can be no effective negotiations if we hold a gun to the head of the Sandinistas.

The President's plan must be defeated so that we can send a clear signal to all the people of the world who truly support democracy that we believe that we can solve our differences through negotiations, that our system will prevail because it is a better system. The nations of Latin America, in particular, are waiting for a sign from us, showing that we will try to settle this with their help off the battlefield and at the negotiating table.

I would like to leave you with a quote from the Kissinger Commission Report on Central America that I believe should serve as a guiding principle in our dealings with Nicaragua and all the nations of the region: "It is a common failing to see other nations as caricatures rather than as portraits, exaggerating one or two characteristics and losing sight of the subtler nuances on which so much of human experience centers as we have studied these nations; we have become sharply aware of how great a mistake it would be to view them in one-dimensional terms. An exceptionally complex interplay of forces has shaped their history and continues to define their identities and affect their destinies."

I'm afraid the President has chosen to look at Nicaragua and its experience with this Nation in one-dimensional terms. He has chosen to ignore the complex interplay of forces shaping the destiny of that nation. It's time he listens to the lessons on history.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER].

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Chairman, there he goes again. In the 11th hour—just before the crucial vote we will take today—Commadante Ortega has offered up a "peace" plan that will end civil strife in Nicaragua. Trouble is, it would also spell the beginning of the end for freedom and democracy in Nicaragua.

We were conned by the Sandinistas in 1979, and they're at it again in 1985. When will we learn our lesson. Time and time again—in its eagerness to dispose of an issue—Congress embraces the best case scenario, in which all the people of the world, including our sworn enemies, share common goals, good will and a desire for peace. Well, folks, this happy ending rarely comes about.

What will come about is an increase in instability and terrorism throughout Central America. And very soon afterwards we will witness a flood of refugees into the United States. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, a rising tide lifts all boats. And when we speak of the rising tide of communism in Central America, we can expect a massive exodus that will inevitably crash on our shores and across our borders. I take little comfort in knowing that 10 percent of the Cuban population left Cuba after Castro came to power. Can we afford to open the gates to 10 percent or more of the over 100 million people now living in Central America and Mexico?

If we truly want to see the evolution of a democratic process in Nicaragua, then we must continue to pressure the Sandinista government to recognize a legitimate opposition. This pressure has to be applied through a resumption of aid to the freedom fighters. To give hope to neighboring countries struggling to erect a democratic system of government, U.S. aid is necessary to combat the Sandinista's attempts to export their revolution.

This is a real danger, which must be understood by the American people. Tomas Borge, the Nicaraguan Interior Minister, was once asked the question: "Will the revolution be exported to El Salvador, then Guatemala, then Honduras, then Mexico?" His response: "That is one historical prophecy of Ronald Reagan's that is absolutely true."

Mr. Chairman, we must not turn our backs on those who constitute the first line of democratic resistance to the Communist aggression in our own back yard. If we fail now, then the Communists will be able to consolidate their gains and continue the exportation of their revolution with Mexico as their ultimate target.

The Contras are the first line of resistance. We must support the freedom fighters of Nicaragua, and I urge you to vote for House Joint Resolution 239.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the military aid demanded by the President.

The President has requested $14 million from the American people to wage a war that has not been declared, a war that will be waged by mercenaries and substantially led by former members of the Somoza dictatorship, a war that the American people do not want and will not support.

This is not the first time the President has come to this Congress to ask for help in waging this war. The logic of his first request was to stop the flow of arms to El Salvador. When this was found to be spurious, a new argument for funding the Contras was found; the Sandinistas needed to be pressured by the Contras if they were going to negotiate.

And this too did not work because, much to the consternation of the Reagan administration, the Sandinistas did negotiate and even accepted the treaty worked out by the Contadora nations.

With last year's election safely behind him the President recently unveiled his newest and most revealing rationale. The Sandinistas must surrender or face war.

In other words the President of the United States, during peace time and with diplomatic relations with Nicaragua, was asking the Congress to fund a war whose object was the overthrow of a Western Hemisphere government.

The public outrage at such a shortsighted policy has led the White House public relations team to heights of ingenuity. Now the aid is humanitarian as long as the Sandinistas do as Ronald Reagan dictates. Should they actually wish to have some say in their own country's affairs the so-called humanitarian aid would revert to the President's original purpose, the provision of arms to the Contras.

The administration's intentions are clear despite such novel approaches in dealing fairly with the American people.

The President wants to wage war by proxy.

And who are these proxies the President has called the "moral equal of our Founding Fathers"?

Virtually the entire military apparatus of the Contras, 46 of the top 48 posts, are former members of the infamous national guard of the Somoza regime. It should hardly be mentioned that when they wore the uniform of the national guard these henchmen were not known as ardent supporters of democracy or human rights. They have committed unspeakable crimes of terror perhaps the most famous of which was the execution of an entire wedding party.

Are these the actions of the moral equivalent George Washington and Thomas Jefferson?

If they are I have read very different history books than the President. As I understand it Washington never committed acts of cruelty and terror, and Jefferson never advocated the use of political assassination. The Contras have much more in common with the Waffen SS troops buried at Bitburg than with those giants buried in Virginia.

We have no illusions about the Sandinistas and their form of government. We do not advocate it for the people of Nicaragua or any of the other nations in Central America. They have not kept faith with their revolution and must reverse their antidemocratic policies if we are to develop a positive future with them.

The irony of the President's policy is that it has not led, nor will it, to a democratic Nicaragua. From the day he has taken office the President has laid seige to the Managua regime. He has mined their harbors, aided terrorists, and intimidated them with countless military exercises on their border. Can anyone really wonder if the Sandinistas do not take this President at his word?

It is time to strike out in a bold new direction—a direction that emphasizes negotiations, that reduces conflict rather than escalates it, that constructs incentives for meaningful peace rather than brandishing threats that propel the Sandinistas down a path no one wants.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, few Americans and, I am sure, no Members of this House, want to see a Communist regime in Nicaragua. Most Americans and, I hope and believe, most Members of this House would, however, not jump straight to the conclusion that we must, therefore, support military force to establish our kind of regime in Nicaragua. That would be a fatal error. We learned that in Vietnam, I think. Yet that is the error that President Reagan seems determined to repeat in Nicaragua.

The same sort of overblown rhetoric, the dire predictions of a "domino effect," the escalation of U.S. military advisers, and, above all, confusion of goals and repeated deception of Congress and the American public—all tell us that this administration has not only failed to learn the lessons of Vietnam, but is bent on going the military route in Nicaragua, regardless of the objections or desires of the overwhelming majority of the American people.

A recent article by James McCartney of Knight-Ridder Newspapers, printed in the Akron Beacon Journal of April 14, 1985, concludes that in the administration's efforts to popularize military solutions to the problems of Central America, the Administration has simply ignored the lessons of Vietnam. Worse yet, as McCartney puts it, "The political mindset that led the nation down the garden path into the war in Vietnam, where more than 55,000 Americans needlessly died, remains the mindset of many in positions of power to this day."

Influenced by the far rightwing, who dominate this administration, policy is being based on the myth that we might have won the Vietnam war if we had gone all out and used all of our available military power. As McCartney notes, those who hold this revisionist view "still have not learned the central lesson of Vietnam. That lesson was that a great and powerful nation cannot necessarily solve political problems with raw military power." McCartney also notes that it is the military men who have learned the lessons of Vietnam best, as he says, "They know that Vietnam was a mistake and a lost cause and it is they, along with a good many smart Congressmen, who have been providing the brakes on further military involvement in Central America."

Mr. Chairman, it is not too late for the United States to deescalate the tensions in Central America. We should make it clear, and I believe we have made it clear, to the Sandinista government that we will not tolerate any attempt to use force to export Marxist revolution to our allies in the region, nor will we tolerate the establishment of Cuban or Soviet military bases in Nicaragua. If the Sandinistas understand anything, I am sure they understand that. At the same time, we must offer the carrot of economic assistance and the stick of economic sanctions, depending on whether the Sandinista regime is or is not willing to recognize basic human and political rights. Such assistance would, in the end, be far more productive and far less costly than support of the Contras or other forms of military action.

The kind of approach we ought to be following was well expressed recently by Senator SAM NUNN in a speech to the Coalition for a Democratic Majority on April 17. An excerpt from his speech was printed on the editorial page in today's Washington Post and deserves to be quoted again. Senator NUNN said:

> The challenge is to move the military option to the back burner while keeping it on the stove and honoring our commitment to the democratic forces in Nicaragua. This means resuming an adequate amount of humanitarian aid both now and for the foreseeable future with no arbitrary termination dates . . .
> While resuming humanitarian aid, I suggest that the diplomatic and economic options be moved to the front burner. I agree with President Reagan's call on the Nicaraguan government to accept the recent proposal of the democratic resistance to agree to an immediate cease-fire in place and commencement of a national dialog.
> Further, I believe the United States should call on the Nicaraguan government to suspend its state of emergency, thereby lifting press restrictions and allowing for full freedom of association and assembly. If the Sandinistas agree to a cease-fire, open a dialog and suspend the state of emergency, the United States should suspend military maneuvers in Honduras and off Nicaragua's coasts. The United States should call on the Nicaraguan armed opposition to purge from its ranks all those responsible for serious human rights abuses. Congress must be convinced that we are supporting the true democrats, men like Arturo Cruz.
> I do not believe this diplomatic approach will work without some form of pressure on the Sandinistas . . . . [T]he President should make every effort to enlist the nations of the region in a coordinated effort to bring maximum economic pressure on the Sandinista government. One option that should be considered immediately is an economic embargo, enlisting our other allies throughout the world to the extent possible.

Mr. Chairman, today we have an opportunity to make a fresh start in Nicaragua. We can do this, first, by rejecting the President's request for $14 million in aid to the Contras and, second, by adopting the bipartisan Hamilton substitute.

The full text of James McCartney's article from which I have quoted appears elsewhere in the RECORD under my name.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I cannot help but be outraged over the administration's policies in Central America, and I rise today to address the issue.

President Reagan is once again asking this body to approve further funding for the Contra groups that are—and our Government freely acknowledges this fact—attempting to overthrow the elected Government of Nicaragua. Let no one misunderstand this fact: Our Government, the United States of America, is using our tax dollars to deliberately overthrow a foreign government.

This is not, of course, a new policy for the Reagan administration. Since 1981, the Reagan administration has spent between $70 and $100 million to help the Contra rebels "destabilize" the Nicaraguan Government and to "neutralize" any opposition. With the direct approval of the present administration, our Central Intelligence Agency has carried out a deliberate policy of providing training, equipment, and logistical support to the Contras—the so-called freedom fighters. Our CIA has engaged in a massive military buildup in that troubled and unstable region, and has tried in any way it possibly can to intimidate the Sandinista government, including encouraging private groups to fund the Contras.

At first, we were told that the United States had to pursue this covert policy in order to prevent the flow of arms from Nicaragua to the guerrillas in El Salvador. But that excuse just did not hold up, so the administration tried a new tack.

We need the covert war, the administration then claimed, to pressure Nicaragua to reduce its ties to the Soviet Union and Cuba. But we all know that the administration's support of the Contras only pushed the Sandinistas closer to the Soviet Union and Cuba. So, the administration needed a new argument.

Now, President Reagan insists that we support the Contras in order to change the "present structure" of the Nicaraguan Government. It did not take long to realize that the President was admitting that the United States was footing the bill for an overthrow of the Sandinistas.

And what is it, exactly, that we are paying for? President Reagan say we are paying for removal of the "totalitarian communism" practiced by the Sandinistas. He also says that we are paying to prevent the communist menace from moving into America's backyard. But where is our money really going?

To be perfectly frank, our money is supporting and encouraging a group of individuals who use rape, pillaging, kidnaping, torture, and the cold-blooded murder of innocent civilians as common instruments of war. Only recently, the Contra forces massacred a wedding party in Nicaragua—no one in the party was armed, and most of the guests were women. Three months ago, Contra forces kidnaped 18-year-old Tomas Lopez, the son of two religious leaders. His body was found 3 days later; his toes and fingers had been broken, his shoulders had been pierced by bayonets, and acid had been poured in his face. Lopez was a civilian.

Last July, Contra rebels attacked two trucks full of civilians. Seven were killed, including a 3-year-old and pregnant mother. Thirty-five others were injured.

I could stand here for hours recounting the horrible details of countless, crimes perpetrated by the Contra rebels—a group of mercenaries our President has compared to our own Fore Fathers—crimes committed by a groups financed and trained by the U.S. CIA. Let no one doubt the goal of our President and the methods of those he supports; we are, in effect, paying for state-supported terrorism.

In an effort to maintain the illusion of having taken the high road, the President has proposed a new peace plan for Nicaragua. Under this plan, $14 million in previously appropriated funds would be released by Congress to provide humanitarian aid to the Contras. Military aid, under the plan, would be withheld for a period of 60 days during which the Nicaraguan Government has an opportunity to make progress at solving problems that have taken years to develop. But is our Government truly committed to a peaceful settlement in that country, I do not think so.

Despite repeated attempts by the Sandinista government to discuss the Central American situation, the Reagan administration has shown little, if any, interest in such dialog. Only 3 months ago, this administration broke off talks that had been going on since last summer—talks that were aimed at providing a peaceful solution to the trauma engulfing Nicaragua. If the administration was serious about working things out in Nicaragua, then why did our Government pull out of one of the primary forums of dialog?

I do not believe for 1 minute that his administration seeks, or, for that matter, wants a peaceful solution in Nicaragua unless it involves the achievement of its immediate aim—the ousting of the Sandinista regime. Instead, I am convinced that talk of peace proposals is, in effect, a smokescreen enabling the President to push through aid to the Contras now, and convert that aid to military aid at the end of the 60-day period. We have an opportunity today to prevent that policy from being carried out, by refusing to release any funds for the provisions of aid to Nicaragua.

There has been a great deal of talk in recent days about several compromise packages that would allow aid to go to Nicaraguan refugees, or through agencies other than the CIA. But I have my doubts about whether there is any sure way to prevent money from reaching the Contras short of withholding it completely.

I am convinced that the administration is charting the wrong course in our relations with Nicaragua, and, indeed, much of Central America. And by charting this course of aggression and military assistance, the President is predetermining the outcome. I need not remind any of my colleagues that military solutions breed military responses—and the outcome is bloodshed, and loss of innocent life, and little is accomplished.

Instead, our Government ought to faithfully pursue the course chartered by the Contadora group. These nations, which have acted in the most courageous and honorable manner, have attempted to provide a forum for meeting political, social, and economic problems with peaceful solutions. Their presentation of the Contadora Act for Peace and Cooperation in Central America provides a framework for peaceful coexistence and democratic development in Central America.

I am firm in my conviction that we ought to promote peace in Nicaragua, and throughout Central America, by supporting the Contadora Peace Initiative. For that reason, earlier in this session I introduced H.R. 1335, which would:

First, provide for direct consultations between the United States and the participants of the Contadora process in order to develop a common policy for promoting peace in Central America. Under this legislation, the United States would work actively to persuade other governments involved in the region to join in observing the conditions for peace established by the Contadora process;

Second, provide for a resumption of direct, bilateral negotiations between the United States and Nicaragua; and Third, suspend temporarily all U.S. support for, or participation in, military or paramilitary activities in Central America. Under this legislation, there would be a 90-day freeze on military assistance and construction programs, military training exercises, and reconnaissance flights on behalf of other nations.

Having traveled to Central America myself, last autumn, I know that the Contadora group alone cannot solve the vast problems of that region. The United States has a tremendous opportunity to support this process for peace, and put an end to the violence and loss of life that now defines Nicaragua.

The answer to that region's problems does not lie in the allocation of money for military aid, nor does it lie in the perpetuation of falsehoods and smokescreens which seek to obscure the real issues. The answer, instead, lies in good-faith negotiations and military cease-fire. I, therefore, strongly encourage my colleagues to refuse to provide aid to the Contras in Nicaragua, and to commit themselves to pursuing the peaceful course of the Contadora nations.

There is an old Chinese proverb that says that "a journey of 1,000 miles begins with the first step." That first step is always the hardest, but the Contadora group has already taken it. I implore my colleagues not to cause those steps to falter. Let us instead join the Contadora group, and walk side-by-side with them in the common pursuit of peace.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BILIRAKIS].

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Chairman, last week, one of my constituents called my office to express his strong opposition to any aid to the Nicaraguan freedom fighters. He stressed his knowledge of the issue, as a political science professor and a Latin affairs scholar, and was quite emphatic in his belief that such a policy was immoral, illegal, and tantamount to supporting terrorists.

Although support among my constituents for President Reagan's Central American policy is running nearly 2 to 1 in favor, I was frustrated by this particular expression of opposition. While I was impressed with my constituent's sincerity, I was quite frankly, shocked at his assessment of U.S. policy in Central America. I felt that the reports he gave credence to told only half of the story, and that he was unaware or chose to ignore so many facts that are essential to a full understanding of the conflict in Nicaragua. So, as I speak today, my colleagues, I am speaking not just to you but to those of my constituents and your constituents who have not recognized the seriousness of the Communist threat in Central America, nor the importance of a strong American response to that threat.

The first area of misunderstanding, as I see it, is the character of the Sandinista regime itself. I honestly don't know why there is any misunderstanding on this point because the facts are quite clear. The Sandinistas openly espouse Marxist-Leninist means and goals. They are closely allied with Cuba and the Soviet Union, who have steadily supplied them with arms, advisers, strategy, and technology since the Sandinistas assumed power in 1979. In fact, there are roughly 10,000 Soviet, Cuban, Eastern bloc, Libyan, and Palestinian forces in Nicaragua, who serve not only as military advisers but as teachers, and Government personnel as well. It is essential that this foreign influence be viewed in the context of the expressed goal of communism, which is quite simply a worldwide communist revolution. Ironically, nearly three-quarters of the M-16 rifles captured from the guerrillas in El Salvador can be traced to American weapons left behind in Vietnam.

Today, Nicaragua's total armed forces exceed 110,000, including some 60,000 active duty troops. This is five times the size of Somoza's national guard and larger than all other armies in Central America combined. Those who want to explain this massive and unprecedented military buildup as a defensive reaction to American meddling are dead wrong, and they must know it. The buildup began immediately when the Sandinistas took power, at a time when the United States was leading the world in providing economic assistance to the new regime. But our $118 million and our good intentions could not persuade the Sandinistas to keep their promises to the Organization of American States or to their own people—promises of political pluralism, economic revitalization, human rights, and neutrality. They turned immediately to the Communist bloc and prepared to export their revolution to their neighbors in Central America through the use of force if necessary.

The Sandinistas have given arms, advice, and sanctuary to the Salvadoran rebels, an act of aggression that has not gone unnoticed by the struggling democracies in the region. Those who think the United States is the only country concerned about the spread of communism in Central America have not been listening to our neighbors in Latin America, who are looking to us for assurance that we do care about what happens in our hemisphere. I think it is significant that a Democratic American President who based his foreign policy on the principle of human rights stopped American assistance to Nicaragua when it became apparent that the Sandinistas were abandoning the democratic aspirations of the Nicaraguan people.

And it is precisely this abandonment of democratic ideals and processes that has resulted in the formation and growth of the democratic resistance. The Contras are not former Somocistas terrorizing the Nicaraguan people as some would have us believe. This is the second major area of misunderstanding. While some are indeed former members of Somoza's national guard, many more are former Sandinistas, including some very high ranking Sandinistas, as well as simple workers and peasants. All are disillusioned by the Sandinistas' broken promises. Press censorship, religious persecution, rationing, economic turmoil, restrictions on assembly, political repression, government threats and human rights abuses—these are the totalitarian controls that the Contras are fighting against. They do not specifically desire to overthrow the government. But they are willing to risk their lives to drive their country back toward moderation and democracy.

The third area of misunderstanding stems from the first two. Those who misunderstand the true nature of the Sandinistas and of the freedom fighters who oppose them cannot help but fail to understand American policy in the region. Far from my constituent's claim that supporting the Contras is immoral, I feel strongly that failing to support them is the immoral position for the United States to take. Our refusal to provide aid to those who struggle for freedom against a heavily armed and foreign-supported regime is inconsistent with our own history.

George Will has appropriately pointed out that President Reagan's policy is the Truman doctine after 38 years of Communist advance. I would make another comparison as well for the benefit of those who feel the United States is illegally interferring in the internal affairs of another nation. How many German Jews could have been saved if other countries had the courage and foresight to meddle in the internal affairs of Nazi Germany? Let's face it. Sometimes, what goes on behind the borders of another country is our business. And when that country seeks to force its repressive system on its neighbors, who happen to be our neighbors as well, then we are fully justified in supporting those who are willing to risk their lives to preserve freedom and democracy in our hemisphere. Far from moving the United States closer to commitment of American troops, providing aid to the Contras is a way of avoiding such a commitment. History has shown time and time again that aggression must be stopped sooner or later, and that the later we act, the higher the cost.

Americans have developed a tendency in the last 40 years of wanting to bury our heads in the sand. We don't want to make tough foreign policy choices. We don't want to get involved. We take our own freedom and security so much for granted that we look skeptically at claims that they are threatened.

This tendency has been strengthened by what is popularly known as the lessons of Vietnam. But I would propose that we are only learning selective lessons when we fail to read the final chapters of the Vietnam lesson book. In this 10th anniversary year of the fall of South Vietnam, we should also be reminded of what happens when we abandon those who struggle against Communist tyranny. We must assume some of the responsibility for the hundreds of thousands of Southeast Asians who have suffered and died at the hands of one of the world's most repressive regimes, and for the thousands more who have flooded foreign shores as refugees.

Some say we will have another Vietnam if we support the Contras. I think it is much more likely that we will have another Vietnam if we don't support them. The President's plan to keep the pressure on the Sandinistas by assisting the Contras while working for a cease-fire, serious negotiations, and free elections, is a good one.

I urge my colleagues, my constituents, and the American people to have the courage to make the difficult decisions now and to firmly establish the American commitment to supporting those who are fighting for freedom in Nicaragua. They are fighting for our freedom as well.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TORRICELLI].

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Chairman, America's policies in Nicaragua have been evaluated many ways. Some have spoken of other options available to our country, some of values, some of America's image in the world. There is another consideration. This policy needs to be evaluated also on its own terms.

Three years after the Contra invasion began, it has yet to liberate its first town, win its first province, or even claim a single military victory.

Four years ago the administration claimed that there were 900 tons a year of Soviet military equipment going to Nicaragua. This year it is 18,000.

Four years ago they spoke of a few Cuban advisers. Now they speak of thousands.

No longer helicopters. Now they warn of planes.

This policy has radicalized the Nicaraguan regime. It has become a pretense for Soviet military involvement. It is, beyond all other failures, a military failure. It needs to be ended tonight so tomorrow we can begin to construct, to build a new policy that will genuinely meet the threats in the region.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this resolution because it reflects a policy based on deceit, misrepresentations, and coverup; it is a policy which is wrong in the first place, which is not in our long-term interests, and, as such, is ultimately doomed to fail.

The President's oft-stated charge against the Nicaraguan Government is that it is a "totalitarian Marxist dungeon", unconcerned with human rights and bent on militarily subverting the hemisphere. This is a propaganda campaign of the worst kind for it is creating a set of false beliefs that will lead us into a losing policy.

Let us be quite clear about the falsehoods of the President's statements on this matter.

In Nicaragua there are no death squads. In U.S.-supported El Salvador, the right wing death squads have been responsible for the vast majority of the more than 40,000 civilian murders over the past 5 years.

In Nicaragua, the press has occasionally been censored. In El Salvador, opposition journalists have been murdered and their newspapers have been bombed into silence. Until Nicaragua has death squads like those of El Salvador, our claim to be fighting to restoring civil rights in Nicaragua is fatuous.

Nicaragua is not totalitarian. In the internationally monitored elections last November, 80 percent of the population turned out to vote—as compared to 53 percent in the United States—for seven different political parties who now hold seats in the National Assembly. In Nicaragua these parties were given public financing and free television and radio time but there were, regrettably occasional restrictions. In El Salvador, by contrast, opposition leaders are often tortured and murdered and in its last election, voting was mandatory and the ballots were placed in transparent ballot box and monitored by the El Salvadoran military.

With 60 percent of the Nicaraguan economy in private hands, it is not a Marxist economy, albeit further to the left than our own. But neither God nor the last U.S. election gives us the right to kill our neighbors if they do not copy our economy.

In the past 5 years, the Nicaraguan Government has brought down illiteracy from 55 percent to 13 percent and, by nearly every objective measure of human rights, has demonstrated that it is much more concerned with the welfare of its people than are the governments of El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras.

The charge that Nicaragua is bent on militarily subverting the region is also without factual basis. After 4 years of spending over $100 million to fund the Contras for the alleged purpose of interdicting arms, not one single cache of weapons has been interdicted. Furthermore, Nicaragua has agreed through the Contadora process to meet every stated security concern of the administration's including a withdrawal of all foreign military advisers and support if the administration would stop the undeclared war against Nicaragua. Yet, the administration blocked this Contadora process giving no intelligible reason as to why.

Finally, if we ever really have a legitimate security threat, we have the most effective military tool to deal with it: we have control over the seas.

Every premise about the need for a war against Nicaragua is based on lies and deceptions which provide a pretext for imposing the type of government that the administration wants to see in Nicaragua. It is wrong, it won't work and I am tired of the deception, my constitutents are tired of the deception and the American people, by at least 70 percent, are tired of the deception.

For over 132 years, we have opposed in Central America every move for social reform. Here again we are trying to impose our kind of government in Nicaragua for dubious reasons. Let us not fool ourselves as to what funding for the Contras really is: it is imperialism. Only now we are doing it by illegally mining harbors, distributing manuals of death and by funding former Somoza national guardsmen who make up 46 of the 48 leadership positions within the Contras.

It is time to stop the rhetoric, cut off the hired army for good, practice what we preach and butt out. It serves our military, economic, and human interests to make friends among our neighbors. A good place to start is to stop attacking them. Better if they say "amigo" than "uncle."

The administration's proposal to resume funding to the Contras epitomizes everything that is wrong with our Nicaraguan policy. The Contras have been a tragedy for the Nicaraguan people, who, according to every independent human rights group, have been systematically brutalized and murdered by the Contras. Moreover, the Contras will not be able to succeed in imposing a different government in Nicaragua, a point which is now conceded even by our own commanders, including General Gorman. Finally, it will backfire in terms of isolating us from the Contadora countries who oppose the Contra funding. It will also confirm in the minds of the Nicaraguan people their beliefs about U.S. imperialism making possibilities for the future friendship between our two peoples less likely.

Until there is a peaceful settlement, any aid will only prolong the murder and mayhem. Once there is a ceasefire and negotiations begin, then we should be dealing with the question of refugee resettlement. First, however, we must stop contributing, directly or indirectly, to the creation of these refugees.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces that the time remaining to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROOMFIELD] is 58 minutes and the time remaining to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] is 53½ minutes.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Certainly. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to make a couple of comments on speeches that I have heard.

Negotiation. Ambassador Shlaudeman has had nine meetings with the Sandinistas and gets nowhere. He talks himself blue in the face. They will not move. They are intransigent. They continue to refuse to negotiate with their internal opposition, the only people that can settle this problem.

Second, poverty is the enemy, but the gentleman on the other side talk as if they never heard of the Kissinger Commission, which proposed $8 billion for Central America over a 5-year period. Trying to get that passed is quite a task.

In addition, Honduras is the poorest country in Central America. They do not have a major Communist insurgency. So while poverty is a problem down there, it has not led to a serious Communist insurgency.

And last, I ask my friends, who is going to invest in Central America in an area of guaranteed instability when the Communists take over, as they surely will.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. I thank the gentleman from Arizona for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to lend my voice to those who have already risen in support of aid and also in support of House Joint Resolution 239.

Before I begin to explain why I support the aid, I would like to just for a moment address the issue of public sentiment on the President's Central American policy. If it was solely up to the opponents of the administration's policy, one could not help but be led to believe that there is little or no public support for the President's efforts in Central America. I want to inform my colleagues that in the State of New Hampshire this is not the case. I want to let my colleagues know that the New Hampshire House of Representatives recently voted overwhelmingly in favor of a reduction in support of the President's Central American policy. Indeed, I believe once people become aware of the facts about Central America, they cannot help but agree with the need to stop Communist aggression.

Unfortunately, Central America has been subject to a massive misinformation campaign by the left.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I include in the RECORD the resolution passed by the New Hampshire House, as well as a letter from the Clerk of the New Hampshire House.

The letter and resolution follow:

H.R. 17—STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Whereas, throughout the annals of history, the United States of America, under presidents both republican and democrat, has pursued in the western hemisphere diplomatic and military policies predicated upon preserving maximum national security for our people from real or potential aggressors; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives:

That the honorable house of representatives of the sovereign state of New Hampshire supports the United States policy of resisting Communist aggression in Cental America.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Concord, March 20, 1985.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
President of the United States,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives, on February 26, 1985 in session convened, adopted House Resolution

Number 17, relative to South America, by a roll call vote of Yeas 289—Nays 111.

Sincerely,

CARL A. PETERSON,
House Clerk.

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. The threshold question is: Are we willing to accept a Soviet Communist Marxist state in Central America? Are we willing to accept another Cuba in Nicaragua and in Central America? I say we cannot afford to do that.

To not support aid to friendly nations in Central America is to risk national security problems for future generations of Americans and to risk oppression for millions in our neighbors south of the border.

In conclusion, in response to a remark made by my colleague on the other side of the aisle a few minutes ago, talking about the real situation; the real situation in comparison to Vietnam. Along with many of my colleagues here, I spent some time in Vietnam. Let us take a look at what happened in Vietnam after we left. Let us take a look at the oppression that took place afterwards. Read Parade magazine center section in the Sunday edition of the Washington Post. Take a good look at that and find out what communism does and find out who violates human rights, my colleagues.

Let us talk about human rights violations. Let us read. Let us read facts that are not just coming from one source but are coming from many sources. There will be human rights violations all right, and they are going to be on the part of the Communist Sandinistas.

I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN] an esteemed member of the Subcommittee on Defense.

Mr. AUCOIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, over the past 3 years Congress and the White House have been engaged in an emotional tug-of-war over U.S. policy in Nicaragua. What began as a consensus that U.S. covert aid would be used solely to intercept illegal arms traffic has evolved into a policy of military aid to the 5,000 so-called "Contras" seeking to overthrow the Sandinista government.

Along the way the administration has engaged in a lot of rhetoric. A little negotiation, and some disturbing sideshows such as a walkout at the World Court which I think embarrassed Americans, and the mining of Nicaraguan harbors, which shocked most Americans.

Now, 3 years and some $80 million worth of forceful "persuasion" later, the Sandinista government shows no signs of crying "uncle." A close look at our policy tells why. The covert war simply doesn't pose a direct threat to the security of Nicaragua. As Gen. Paul Gorman, former head of United States forces in Central America admitted earlier this year, the Contras, right now, have no hope of overthrowing the Sandinista government. Can the Contras do enough damage to make the Sandinistas see the light as the administration would want it to? According to General Gorman, that would take "years."

Mr. Chairman, there are serious problems with both the structure and the policies of the Sandinista government. We've known that since at least 1980 when President Carter made the decision to suspend U.S. assistance to Nicaragua. But, instead of pursuing a policy of forceful diplomacy, the Republican administration created a mercenary army to make war against the Sandinistas, providing them an excuse to continue their own "State of Emergency"—weakening the judicial system, cracking down on freedom of religion, imposing broad censorship, and silencing free labor groups. That is what happens when a government is under siege.

Instead of a realistic assessment of the Nicaraguan military, we in this country and in this Congress have gotten a lot of scare tactics and innuendo, including the idea that Nicaragua, with virtually no air force or navy, poses a threat to U.S. shipping lanes. We have gotten descriptions of the Contras as modern Thomas Jeffersons and fighters for freedoms. These are people who have killed civilians and even attacked wedding parties in Nicaragua.

And just last week, instead of an innovative new peace plan that we were all promised in the Congress, Congress instead received a report from the administration that calls for a doubling of the Contra forces. Increasing the size and efficiency of the Contras is not going to destroy the Sandinistas or suddenly create American-style democracy and free markets in Nicaragua that all of us would like to see.

By the way, the CIA told me in the Defense Committee just last week that the private sector makes up 60 percent of the economy in Nicaragua. That is something my friends on the other side of the aisle seem to misunderstand in their exaggerations and incendiary comments in this debate tonight.

Instead, what increasing the number of Contras will do is to increase the potential for a clash with neighboring Honduras and widening the conflict and increasing the risk of involvement of the United States military.

Mr. Chairman, a vote against convert aid is not a ticket to the Sandinista fan club. It is a call to end the current stalemate and pursue policies that have a realistic chance of insuring our interests and the interests of our allies in Central America.

The United States has yet to explore all options for developing a regional peace plan under the auspices of the Contadora group. Instead, we have seen an all-too-familiar pattern of deception of Congress and shifting rationalizations of our policy as the months have unfolded.

The Sandinistas do not rule Nicaragua because the people of that country are committed to Marxism-Leninism. They rule because the Sandinistas were an alternative to a neo-Fascist government led by a man named Somoza.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN] has expired.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN].

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I have not heard anyone on the Republican side of the aisle criticize Somoza, and it was a neo-Fascist regime that he ran. It was a regime of terror. It was a regime that this country supported simply because he was clever enough to say he was anti-Communist. Well, Hitler was anti-Communist, too, and I think there ought to be a better standard set than simply saying some country must be anti-Communist before that country warrants our aid.

When will our administration and our Republican allies learn about root causes of insurrection? If you want to stop left-wing uprisings, stand up against neo-Fascism first, stand up against Pinochet, against Marcos, against the racists of South Africa, and against the Somozas of the world.

I heard one of my colleagues say that the Democrats are not concerned about communism. That is a cheap smear. It would be more accurate to say tonight that the root problem is that that gentleman who made that statement and his allies are not sufficiently concerned about fascism, which causes the roots of insurrection which all of us deplore.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. IRELAND].

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

I want to say, first, that 50 years ago, in 1935, Winston Churchill spoke these words:

> Want of foresight, unwillingness to act when action would be simple and effective, lack of clear thinking, confusion until the emergency comes, until self-preservation strikes its jarring gong, these are the features which constitute the endless repetition of history.

With these words, Churchill attempted to warn his countrymen of the impending danger posed by the rearming of Germany and of the urgent need for Great Britain to take action. Churchill was a minority in a nation that desperately wanted peace and blinded itself to the danger of war. The prevailing British attitude permitted a deteriorated military posture and an unfavorable shift in the balance of power that allowed for the rise of Hitler's Germany, as the gentleman before me just said, and led to the very war that all in Britain wanted to avoid.

Churchill's observations on the inability to learn from history are as relevant today as they were in 1935. Just like Britain in that earlier era, I hear from the President's critics in the debate today the same smooth-sounding platitudes that dominated Britain in the 1930's. I see the same inability to come to grips with the unpleasant facts of Soviet aggression and a similar failure to accept reality when it departs from the hopes of our idealism. Too many American leaders, many of them here today, and others in every walk of American life are opting for popular positions, no matter how distant they may be from the real needs of this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. IRELAND has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SILJANDER].

Mr. SILJANDER. Mr. Chairman, the Sandinista's overthrow of the Somoza dictatorship in Nicaragua was originally welcomed by most of the international community with optimistic enthusiasm. The United States, in fact gave the now Sandinista regime over $130 million grant to sustain the Nicaraguan Government in the first 2 years, including an $8 million grant to sustain the Nicaraguan Government in the first hours of the revolution. This optimism faded, however, into a cruel nightmare for the Nicaraguan Jews and Christians as well as the neighboring nations of El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica. The reason: The Sandinista's selling of their country to radical Marxist elements, most notably, the Cubans and the Palestine Liberation Organization [PLO].

In a recent speech in London, Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn stated:

> Within the philisophical system of Marx and Lenin and at the heart of their psychology, hatred of God is the principal driving force, more fundamental than all their political and economic pretensions. Militant atheism is not merely incidental or marginal to Communist policy; it is not a side effect, but the Central pivot. To achieve its diabolical ends, Communism needs to control a population devoid of religious and national feeling, and this entails the destruction of faith and nationhood.[1]

Nicaraguan leadership by proclaiming itself a revolution without borders and by declaring itself in solidarity with Yasser Arafat in the world revolution and by its harsh persecution of religious groups has set itself up as a model example of Solzhenitsyn's analysis. Most likely because of the Sandinista's link to the PLO, the Jews have been the most thoroughly oppressed religious group in Nicaragua, if not in numbers than certainly in the completeness to which their exile and cultural genocide took place.

The PLO desire to overthrow the Somoza regime had nothing to do with the legitimate revoluton of Nicaraguan citizens against the dictatorship. It had historical roots of its own. Just why Nicaragua is of concern to the PLO is best explained in the autobiography of Jerusalem's Mayor Teddy Kollek, entitled "For Jerusalem." He revealed that Nicaragua played a major role in obtaining arms for Israel during the crucial period of its creation in 1948. Kollek met the older General Somoza in Nicaragua to plead Isreal's case.

According to Kolleck:

> Somoza as well as the Nicaraguan foreign minister cooperated because of their strong basic sympathy with our cause. Our agreement included the understanding that Nicaragua would vote for Israel in the United Nations whenever the occasion arose, a point to which they pledged themselves out of genuine conviction.

Prior to the 1979 Sandinista revolution, Nicaragua had consistently supported Israel in the United Nations and was one of the very few nations that voted against the resolution condemning Zionism as racism.[2]

Clearly, the PLO had a vested interested in overthrowing the Somoza regime in Nicaragua. The results of the alliance between the Sandinistas and the PLO are evident upon Nicaragua society. This paper will examine the PLO-Sandinista link and attempt to demonstrate the existence of the religious persecution in Nicaragua and other Central American countries, particularly against the Jewish community.

ARAB INVOLVEMENT IN LATIN AMERICA

Latin America has always been an important source of support to Israel in the United Nations. In Israel's first 25 years of existence Latin American nations provided more than half of the U.N. votes supportive of Israel. During the 1967 war, Latin America was more supportive of Israel than any other bloc of countries. However, by the seventies their support has weakened as Latin American nations began to split into political factions. Still today, Israel and Arab nations perceive Latin America to be important politically to the survival of Israel.

In a visit to Mexico in 1975, Egypt's Vice Chancellor Gamal Mansour expressed the importance of Latin American U.N. votes.

> For the Arabs, the support of Latin American countries is essential because they hope to obtain a majority for a resolution in the next Assembly of the United Nations . . . recognizing the right of the Palestinians to convert themselves into a political entity; to permit the Arabs to recuperate the territories occupied in the war of 1967 and confirm the principle that no country can acquire territories of another by force.

Gamal Mansour's visit was only one of many such Arab missions in the Arab League campaign to sway Latin America toward a pro-Arab stance. The Latin American governments resisted Arab efforts; however, the 1973 quadrupling of oil prices put new pressures upon their economics and international policies.

The Arabs began to use petrodollars and vitally needed oil to pressure the Latin American nations into the Arab camp. Fouad Naffah, who was the Lebanese Foreign Minister and acting as a representative to the Arab League in 1973, traveled to seven Latin American nations. In his tour, he informed the governments that "no underdeveloped country that backs the just cause of the Arab world will suffer from an energy shortage." In addition to a guaranteed oil supply, Naffah also made promises of Arab investments to strengthen the suffering Latin American economies.

In 1981, Arab representatives met in Tunis and decided to focus on gaining the support of Latin America in an effort to oust the Israelis. In conjunction with this decision:

> They decided to unleash an anti-Semitic campaign designed to undermine the status of Jews in Latin America to nullify the political and economic support which the Latin American Jewish communities provide Israel.[3]

The Palestine Liberation Organization was selected as the primary instrument of the campaign in Latin America:

> Arab ambassadors, other high ranking emissaries and representatives of the PLO have been crisscrossing the region in a coordinated, heavily financed effort to secure authorization to establish an official PLO office in every Latin American capital.[4]

The PLO has made limited progress during the past 3 years in its attempt to open offices in Latin American capitals. So far, the PLO has established offices in Cuba, Ecuador, Nicaragua, Peru, and Mexico. Brazil and Venezuela were thought to be prime candidates for the PLO; however, they have resisted the heavy Arab economic and political pressures. The main obstacle the PLO faces is the fact that it is an international terrorist network; and to allow the PLO to legitimatize themselves in the region by opening an office would endanger the security of Latin American nations and help promote anti-Semitism in our hemisphere.

CRIMES AGAINST RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

The Sandinista government has been responsible for many abuses against the right to freedom of religion in Nicaragua. The Jews, so far, have been the most intensely targeted group for persecution. The government began its campaign of persecution in the quasi-official government newspaper Nuevo Diario. On July 15 and 17, 1982, the paper carried articles that were not only anti-Zionist but also anti-Semitic. Jews were blamed for the crucifixion of Christ, using the "myth" of the chosen people to massacre Palestinians, and using financial power to gain political control of the United States. The articles referred also to "Synagogues of Satan," and rehearsed old canards that "world money, the banks and finance are in the hands of descendants of Jews, the eternal protectors of Zion." [5]

Although resident in Nicaragua for more than a century, the Jewish community has always been exceedingly small. The 1972 population of about 200 shrank to about 80 after the earthquake. After the overthrow of Anastasio Somoza in 1979, many Jews fled into exile, along with others close to the regime. Today, there are about 8 to 10 Jews living in Nicaragua, and only a few Jewish-owned firms. These individuals and businesses exist under the suppressive conditions of the Sandinista regime.[6]

The main reason for the departure of Nicaraguan Jews is the manner in which the revolutionary government treated them. Their properties were among the first to be confiscated. Jews who owned factories and stores were ejected from their homes and places of business. Their properties were turned over to Arabs and local workers. Many accusations were made against them without proof. Often, their individual safety was threatened.[7] The foregoing took place in an environment politically and emotionally charged. Jews were accused of support for the Somoza government and blamed for Israeli assistance to the Somoza government.[8]

The final blow against the Jewish community came when Sandinista supporters scorched the doors of the only synagogue in Managua while worship services were in progress. The Sandinistas then seized the synagogue, destroying all religious items and putting pro-government posters over all religious symbols. The synagogue then became "an elite social club for the children of high-ranking Sandinista officials." [9] Since then, Jews have tried to regain their property and return to their homes, but the Nicaraguan Government has directed the courts not to act on any request by a Jew seeking to return to Nicaragua.[10]

On a number of occasions there have been attacks against religious leaders which have, at times, become violent. These attacks are not only specifically aimed at the Jewish religion, but also at the Christians, most notably the Catholics and the fundamental Moravian Church. The uneasy situation is caused by the fact that most Nicaraguan citizens are professed Catholics. These attacks have been sponsored by so-called divine mobs or confrontation groups of the Sandinista Front for the Liberation of Nicaragua [FSLN].[11] Harassment has also been extended to Pope John Paul II who in March of 1982 visited Nicaragua and was subjected to inexcusable abuse. The Pontiff was forced to speak from a platform that had revolutionary billboards as a backdrop. Also during his homily, the Pope was barely audible to the large crowd because the Sandinista government provided him with a poor sound system which could not compete with the shouting of pro-government slogans by the "devine mob."[12]

In addition, the government banned from publication letters from Pope Paul II which criticized the governments effort to create a Marxist "peoples" church.[13] The leaders of this "peoples" church have insulated the Catholic Church by trying to change the Christian doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. The offensive reinterpretation depicts Mary, the mother of Jesus, as in fact not the mother of Jesus, but the "Mother of the Revolutionary."[14] The government has also gone so far as to discredit the divinity of Jesus and instead label him "the First Sandinista." [15]

The government actively discriminates between those clergy who share its political viewpoints and those who are indifferent or critical.[16] An example of this was seen when the regular church sponsored televising of the Mass was replaced with broadcasts of priests who took a pro-government position.[17]

Of the east coast Indians and Creole natives in Nicaragua, 80 percent are members of the Protestant Moravian Church. The government has repeatedly described the Moravian Church as a center of counterrevolutionary sentiment. As a result, the Sandinistas have reportedly burned more than 50 churches, confiscated church property, harassed church leaders, and taken other actions to undermine the traditional role of the church. In addition, government groups had stepped up attacks on Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, and Seventh Day Adventists, accusing the sects of having direct links to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency.[18]

The anti-semitic curtain that has descended over Nicaragua, and any other place where Sandinista inspired revolutions have spread to, is one of serious repercussions for all Jews. To emphasize, one of the first moves taken by the Sandinistas government when it took control was to cut off all diplomatic ties to Israel.[19] Obviously, this is consistent with the Sandinistas' stated intention to root "Zionism" out of Central America. In fact, a block of Salvadorans based in Washington, DC, and loyal to the Sandinistas were asked to provide:

> . . . a condemnation of the Zionist state of Israel, because of its participation in maintaining the deplorable conditions under which the Peoples of Palestine, El Salvador and South Africa are forced to live.[20]

The ideological union between the PLO and the Sandinistas begins to be exposed with this statement of direct anti-Semitic attitudes toward Israel.

THE PLO, THE SANDINISTAS AND THE SALVADORAN GUERRILLAS

On January 12, 1983, Daniel Ortega Saavedra, the commander of the revolution and a member of the FSLN delivered a speech to a special ministerial meeting of the coordinating bureau of the nonaligned Countries on Latin America and the Caribbean. In this speech he labeled Israel's policies towards the Palestinians as being irresponsible and that criminal actions were being taken against "the herioc Palestinian people" by Israel.[21] As the Palestinians were being praised and exhorted by the Sandinistas, the Jewish citizens of Nicaragua were being essentially expelled from their own country. The Nicaraguan Jews blame the loss of their jobs, homes and businesses along with the general persecution on the presence of the PLO.[22]

Late in 1979, 1,000 delegates from Arab and Latin American nations met in Caracas, Venezuela. These delegates formed two organizations. The first is known as the Pan-American Institute of Arab Culture headquartered in Buenos Aires, and the second organization is the Arab-American Information, Publicity, and Communications Center based in Santiago, Chile. One of the basic initiatives of these two organizations is made clear in a communique published by the delegates saying that they would:

> . . . work for the free self-determination of the Palestinians and their right to a homeland . . . we consider the PLO the legitimate representative of that people . . .[23]

Victor Ananias of Chile, president of the federation, was quoted in Agence France Presse, October 6, 1979, as stating:

> The solution we propose for the Middle East is the disappearance of Israel to make way for a secular, democratic Palestinian state.[24]

Other delegates were asked whether the PLO was a terrorist organization? Their reply was that the PLO armed activity was "legitimate defense." [25]

The PLC's involvement in covert operations with the Sandinistas is not a recent occurrence. Active cooperation between these two revolutionary groups has existed as early as 1969 when Bonito Escobar of the Sandinistas met with three high ranking PLO officials in Mexico City. As a result of this meeting, 50 Sandinistas were sent to training camps at PLO facilities in Tyre, Lebanon. Not only did they accept training, but they fought side by side with the PLO against King Hussein of Jordon in 1970. Patrick Arguello Ryan, a Sandinista trained in the Middle East, was Leila Khased's partner in an abortive attack on an El Al airliner just outside of Amsterdam—Ryan was killed in the attack.[26] The ties between the two groups has continued for 15 years without interruption.

As a result of this relationship, not much attention was given when the PLO announced a grant of $12 million to Nicaragua for economic aid.[27] The PLO also has helped the Sandinistas to gain support from other radical Arab countries such as Mu'ammar Qadhafi's Libya which has given $100 million under an "agricultural appropriation."[28] Qadhafi has in the past aided many other terrorist organizations such as the Montoneros in Argentina and the Revolutionary Coordinating Junta founded in 1974 as the first bridge between Latin America and Cuba. From January 25 to February 1, 1981, Libya sponsored a meeting with the Sandinistas, PLO, Montoneros, the JLR plus two other Marxist groups from Chile—the United Popular Action Movement and the Movement of the Revolutionary Left. The stated reason for the meeting was "* * * to draw up a unified plan of struggle against all types of fascism and imperialism in America."[29]

In addition to money, the PLO has been sending massive shipments of armaments to Nicaragua and El Salvador. U.S. News & World Report stated that there had been an interception of a plane load of weapons in Tunis which was sent to the Sandinistas by the PLO.[30] Weapons are always in abundance and training is also being provided for leftist forces in Central America.[31] The PLO cadres who have infiltrated into Nicaragua and El Salvador are providing this training.[32] Yasser Arafat has himself admitted that Sandinistas had received training in PLO camps.[33] The PLO stated in 1982 that it was fighting alongside of the Sandinista guerrillas. These were actual PLO troops participating in combat in both El Salvador and Nicaragua.[34]

According to the Washinton Post of July 12, 1979, there were Sandinista fighters training in PLO camps located in Algiers. The activity of the PLO was best summed up by this statement by Jorge Mandi, FSLN spokesman to the Kuwaiti newspaper Al Watan.

He said:

> . . . there is a longstanding blood unity between us and the Palestinian Revolution. Many of the units belonging to the Sandinista movement were at Palestinian Revolutionary bases in Jordan . . . it is natural that in our war against Somoza we received Palestinian aid for our revolution in various forms.[35]

These various forms included PLO pilots sent to Nicaragua and PLO "freedom fighters" sent to El Salvador.[36] Also a plane load of weapons in route to Nicaragua from the PLO labeled as medical supplies, just as the recent Libyan shipment, was intercepted in Brazil.[37] Those are suspected to be just two of many such shipments. In May 1982, the PLO gave a Boeing 707 jet to Nicaragua presumably for the purpose of transporting arms.[38] In addition, there is a Belgian Air-Charter Service that is wholly owned by the PLO that is used to transport arms to the insurgents in El Salvador, through Nicaragua.[39]

Diplomatic relations between the Sandinistas and the PLO started with a similar ideological base and has expanded to their commitments to overthrow governments that are contrary to their vision. In a letter from a group of Salvadorans based in Washington, DC, and loyal to the Sandinistas, they stated, "* * * Our situation is very much the same as the Palestinan freedom fighters."[40] Because of the unity between the FSLN and the PLO, Nicaragua cut off diplomatic relations with Israel and granted diplomatic status to the PLO on July 22, 1980. The office representing the PLO was officially opened in Managua with a staff of 70. The PLO's presence in Managua was accepted warmly as evidenced by the hero's welcome Arafat received when he visited Nicaragua on the first anniversary of the Sandinista takeover.[41] In his speech, Arafat praised the "strategic and militant ties between the Sandinista and Palestinian revolutions."[42]

Tomas Bouge Martinez, the Interior Minister of Nicaragua, stated to Yasser Arafat: "We say to our brother Arafat, that Nicaragua is his land and the PLO cause is the cause of the Sandinistas." In response to this statement of goodwill Arafat replied: "The links between us are not new. Your comrades did not come to our country just to train, but also to fight. Your enemies are our enemies."[43] Of course, the enemies of the PLO are the Jews, particularly those living in Israel. To demonstrate the joint efforts of the PLO and the Sandinistas against Israel, a bomb exploded in the Israeli Embassy in San Salvador. The People's Revolutionary Army claimed responsibility and said the bombing was in "solidarity with the Palestinian people."[44]

THE PLO AND MEXICO

In 1975, Mexican President Luis Echeverria met with Yasser Arafat and gave the PLO permission to open an office in Mexico. The succeeding President of Mexico, Lopez Portillo, reluctantly honored his pedecessor's commitment, and allowed the opening of a PLO office. However, the office was limited to a staff of one person without diplomatic status. In cooperation with the Association Mexicana de Amistad con el Pueblo Palestino [AMAPP], the PLO office has used cultural events to spead its message. In addition, the office has recruited exiled leftists and revolutionaries living in Mexico to work for their cause. Examples of the PLO activities in Mexico include anti-Israeli advertisements, publications, and demonstrations attacking "Zionism as Racism."

THE PLO AND COSTA RICA

On May 8, 1982, President Luis Alberto Monge announced an extensive policy of internal security in order to combat the increasing terrorist activity in Costa Rica. In his speech he specifically expressed concern about the PLO and Libyan threat. The National Security Agency [ASN] of Costa Rica confirmed that Libya has been training young Costa Ricans as terrorists. The ASN has also linked Libya to the secret terrorist training camps operating in Costa Rica.

Many citizens of Costa Rica were alarmed with former President Rodrigo Carazo Odio's embrace of the Arab cause. It was reported that the Arabs had offered financial assistance to the President's pet project, the University of Peace, in exchange for permission to open a PLO office. Ambassador Yamuni of Costa Rica increased the controversy when he announced to reporters that the government had officially recognized the PLO. However, Foreign Minister Bernard Neibaus quickly denied the statement with good reason since Costa Rica has been struggling with high oil prices and terrorist activity.

THE PLO AND PANAMA

The Panamanian-Arab League of Solidarity with the Palestinian People and the PLO [LIGASOPOLP] have been working to gain support among the people of Panama. Carlos Perez Herrera, cousin of the late Gen. Omar Torrijos, was the first Secretary General of LIGASOPOLP. Torrijos was a commander of the Panamanian National Guard and the eminence gris of Panamanian politics. After the death of Torrijos in 1981, there has been a decrease in governmental support for the PLO. However, PLO activity and propaganda directed against the Panamanian Jewish community has been disruptive. LIGASOPOLP will continue to function in Panama with Libya as its main financial sponsor. The Panamanian Government has kept it promise to prevent the opening of an official PLO office, and there are no indications that they will break this promise.

CONCLUSION

PLO activity in Central America has been increasing, and there are no indications that their involvement will diminish. In 1981, Yasser Arafat, expressing the commitment of the PLO in that region of the world, stated:

We are a great revolution that can never be intimidated. We have connections with all the revolutionary movements throughout the world, in El Salvador, in Nicaragua—and I reiterate Salvador—and elsewhere in the world.[45]

"The way to Jerusalem leads through Managua," was more than just an empty statement made by Yasser Arafat on July 27, 1980. Arafat clearly intends to have Nicaraguan and Salvadoran support in his effort to destroy Israel and establish a Marxist regime.

The PLO, combined with the Soviet and Cuban presence, poses a serious threat to the security of the vulnerable Central American governments. The United States must take into consideration the Soviet-Cuban-PLO dimension, along with the PLO threat to the Jewish community, in order to have an effective American policy which protects our interests as well as Central American democracies and religious freedom.

As anti-Semitism grows in this hemisphere, as was stated last week during the Holocaust memorial, never again.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, the issue we are considering today involves much more than $14 million. How we spend this money, or whether we spend it at all, will decide how we approach Central America and its problems. When you cut through all of the rhetoric and partisan hyperbole, the issue boils down to a simple choice—peace or war?

Historically, the American people have been peaceloving, but have not shrunk from war when there was no other alternative. As the major power in the Western Hemisphere, we have a wide range of political, economic and cultural resources to shape events in Central America without bankrolling a war. The American people know this instinctively and overwhelmingly oppose any further aid to the Contras. We should heed this grassroots wisdom and develop a policy that goes to our strength, while leaving us with a range of options short of war. Even more than taxes, war should be a last resort; not the first thing you think of.

We must have no illusions about the nature of the Sandinista government. Nor should we ignore our vital interests in the region. We all oppose censorship. We are all offended by Sandinista rudeness to the Pope. We reject arbitrary arrest. We all agree that it is not in our interests for Nicaragua to become firmly fixed along a Soviet-Cuban axis.

By the same token, we should have no illusions about the Contras. Most of their leaders are the same people who were ousted in a popular revolution. The Contra effort in Nicaragua has been characterized by bloody human rights violations. Most of the victims have been civilians. What is more, top U.S. military officials concede that the Contras lack the strength or popularity to shoot their way to power. Providing this group with military of humanitarian aid will not serve our policy objectives. Instead, approval of the $14 million to aid the Contras would violate the spirit of F.D.R.'s Good Neighbor policy and bring back the ugly American who drives his Latin American neighbors away from us.

What we seem to have with this administration is $14 million in search of a policy. Initially, the administration argued that aid to Contras was needed to interdict arms shipments to the rebels in El Salvador. When no evidence could be produced to support that claim, the administration goal became to get the Government of Nicaragua to cry uncle, whatever that means. Even the President agrees, though, that it should not mean we are trying to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. He knows, just as we all do, that under international law it is illegal to make war or commit acts of war without a declaration of war. Yet by providing the Contras with the means to wage war against a government that we officially and publicly recognize, we would be making war without admitting it openly and officially. The administration acknowledged as much when it refused to defend its policy before the World Court.

What is lacking in the administration approach is a sense of proportion. Forgetting that Nicaragua is a small country of 3 million people with a per capita income of less than $900, the administration has raised the stakes to try to turn this issue into a showdown between East and West. There has been no convincing evidence, however, of any major aid to the rebels in neighboring El Salvador or anywhere else. Administration claims that Soviet crates contained Soviet Mig fighters turned out to be no more accurate that the claim that the Pope endorses military aid to the Contras. The President's comparison of the Contras to Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Franklin, and the other giants of the American Revolution is an offense that would not be worth mentioning were it not for the fact that this is the kind of crude exaggeration that has been the basic justification for the administration's policy.

Let us support a more rational, less hysterical approach. First, let us recognize that we have interests in Central America that are worth promoting and, if necessary, worth defending. Then let us recognize that we have ample resources short of war to promote a responsible policy in Nicaragua and the rest of Central America.

We should not begrudge $14 million to promote our interests in Central America. Nicaragua's neighbors who have organized the Contadora process have vital interests at stake that are no less compelling than our own. Since they share borders and cultural affinity with Nicaragua, they are well positioned to promote peace. The International Red Cross has long had a reputation for its humanitarian work. Let us provide the funds to these two entities and begin to chart a new course in Central America. With our enormous resources, we can help to shape a better future for Central America and develop a better approach that serves the interests of our region.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW].

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Some years ago during the period of time when Somoza was in charge in Nicaragua, I traveled to Nicaragua. Some 3 years ago on a kodel that was headed by the majority leader, JIM WRIGHT, I went back to a Nicaragua that was headed up by the Sandinistas.

I must say that I found a much more oppressive government under the Sandinistas. We found an economy that was in shambles, and we found human rights that were absolutely disregarded.

We even had a situation where army officers stormed into the hotel that we were staying in order to confiscate film that was taken from the hotel window.

You can only find this type of oppression in a Communist-type of government; but yet we found a glimmer of hope. We found it from some of the population statements, such as, "Don't give up on Nicaragua."

I regret to inform my colleagues that was 3 years ago. Since then those who have told us not to give up on Nicaragua have served time in jail, some of them still in jail. Some of them have shown up in south Florida in Miami as refugees.

I would ask the Members of this House to watch the Members from Florida and how they vote on this issue.

We have had personal contact with these people who have been disenfranchised and have lost their country. They are people that their revolution has betrayed and they are coming by the tens of thousands, let there be no doubt about it.

Being an area of the country in south Florida that is the destination for a large part of these people from not only Nicaragua, but from the other countries to which they are exporting their revolution, I say to you, let us look at what has happened in Nicaragua. We do bear a responsibility for the corrupt regime that has developed there because we gave it much assistance in its beginning and we were largely responsible, it not totally responsible, for Somoza leaving that part of the world.

Our goals were high and I do not fault anyone for that decision, but we were not to know that the corrupt form of government that was to follow and anybody that thinks that we can bring about a correction of that big mistake by simply leaving them alone or giving them aid other than the aid of the rebellious overthrow of that government, does not know history.

We have heard today in great detail as to the goals of communism throughout the world and anybody that cannot read that I would say we have a choice before us this evening. We can do it with Nicaraguans today or later with Americans.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the administration request before this body.

Mr. Chairman, today this House is debating and deciding whether the cornerstone of our foreign policy in Nicaragua and Central America will be one based on a commitment to negotiation and diplomacy or whether it will be based upon an escalation of military conflict. There can be no doubt that the United States is vitally interested and conerned about the future of Nicaragua and the other nations of Central America. We share a common concern with the people of Central America for the advancement of democratic social and economic reforms which will lead to the establishment of just societies. The real question which we must face today, however, is not one of goals but of the U.S. policy path we follow to achieve these goals.

During the past 4 years, the Reagan administration policy toward Nicaragua has increasingly emphasized conflict and confrontation over negotiation and diplomacy. The President's initial 1985 appropriation request proposed that Congress provide $14 million in military aid for the Contras seeking to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. At the 11th hour, however, when it became abundantly clear that there were significant doubts among many Members on both sides of the aisle about the wisdom of the administration's policy, the President announced that he would support a compromise by providing for humanitarian aid; a sharp change of course for one so committed to military action against the Sandinistas.

Originally, the Reagan administration supported and participated in talks with the Sandinistas to discuss democratic political reforms. On another track, the administration gave at least rhetorical support to the Contadora process which has been and still is the only regional multilateral effort to solve the outstanding issues between the Sandinistas and their political opponents. But somewhere in the course of this process, the administration lost interest and stayingpower for negotiation and diplomacy. The administration walked out of the Manzanillo talks with the Sandinistas which were occurring in Mexico over 6 months ago and has steadfastly refused to return to the bargaining table. The administration then renounced its support for a proposed agreement worked out by the Contadora nations and Nicaragua because it could not support every element of the proposed settlement. In short, the administration has been willing to lend rhetorical support to the Contadora process which is halfhearted and when some limited progress or agreement was attained, the administration, rather than encouraging continued dialog, discredited and heaped scorn on the participants. The President's policy incorrectly assumes that the United States has veto power over all policy and agreements in Central America. We have not exhausted U.S. diplomatic skills and options. The end result of this bad faith U.S. policy has been to relegate negotiation and diplomacy to the back burner and insure an ever-escalating military confrontation with the Sandinistas by intensive support for the Nicaraguan rebels, the Contras.

Clearly U.S. policy must be such that we are not working in isolation, alone unilaterally as is the case today. We should not seek to superimpose our policy on any Central American nation but rather should be working with other nations in the area and with our Western allies within a multilateral framework. Within the longstanding provisions of treaties and international law, the Contadora initiatives provides a positive basis for such U.S. cooperation.

Did anyone in the Reagan administration seriously doubt that the outstanding political and philosophical differences between the United States and the Nicaraguan Sandinista government would be significant? Did anyone doubt that serious political negotiations with the Sandinistas would be lengthy and would test our resolve to promote democratic reforms? Isn't it the responsibility of this administration to pursue the diplomatic process that promises a peaceful settlement for the people of Nicaragua?

The Reagan policy toward Nicaragua and Central America stems from tunnel vision; a view of history which contends that Marxism is the root of all evil in Nicaragua and Central America. In reality, however, the many political, social, and economic problems which face this region predate the existence of the Sandinistas and the existence of Marxism. Centuries-old policies which consolidated the control of land and wealth have created a long legacy of injustice and abuse across Central America. Other real enemies which we face and more immediate problems, in Nicaragua and Central America today are disease, hunger, and poverty. These are the elements that destabilize societies and create the political conditions in which repression occurs. We do not serve the needs of the people of Nicaragua or any other nation by pursuing policies which add more fuel to the fire and which foment an escalation of civil war. Previous American administrations recognized this reality. That is why we have a Peace Corps and why we created a Food for Peace Program. That is why we had a Good Neighbor policy under the Roosevelt administration which was designed to help the political and economic development of the nations of Central and South America. These are the bright spots in our historic relationship with the nations of that region which counterbalance our historic unilateral intervention and occupation of the region to serve our other interests.

I urge my colleagues to defeat this resolution and to send the Reagan administration's a message that we must support a peaceful and sensible course in our relations with Nicaragua and all of the nations in Central America. To do otherwise risks a catastrophe for the people of Central America and for our own country.

Mr. GEJDENSON. The issue that must be addressed here is what the ramification will be if we accept the President's policy, a policy that began with misrepresentation to this Congress and the American people as simply an opportunity to interdict arms headed for the rebels in El Salvador. Not many Members in this Chamber nor many Members in the other body, or people around this country believe for 1 minute that the administration initially wanted simply to interdict arms. It was clear from the beginning an attempt to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

If we take a look at how this process has developed to date we find that our own intelligence agencies, our own military have assessed the situation and have responded with a conclusion that says the President's policy, if continued, will fail. It will fail to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. It will fail to create the kind of change in Nicaragua that we are seeking.

But it will accomplish certain goals. It will certainly accomplish the goal of pushing the Nicaraguans deeper and deeper into the Soviet orbit. It will push the Nicaraguans more into the debt of the Cubans.

My parents fled the Soviet Union in 1946. They came to the United States because this country represents a difference. It represented a different standard of behavior than what the Soviets had shown in Eastern Europe when they found client states not following their policy such as when the Soviet Union moved in on Hungary and Czechoslovakia. If there was any sort of divided thought in any of those countries, the Soviets came down hard.

Here we are given an even worse choice. We are put in a position where the President asks us to support a policy that will neither bring change to Nicaragua nor will it bring the Nicaraguan Government and its people closer to America's position in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEJDENSON. If we examine the options that are put before us by the committee, they take account of realistic alternatives.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEJDENSON. Not until I have finished.

They give the Congress and the President an opportunity to attempt to utilize economic pressures, economic pressures that have a far greater opportunity to be successful than the present failed policy.

The 8,000 to 15,000 Contras who now exist on Nicaragua's northern border are not going to bring the Sandinista government down. To the contrary, they will give the Sandinistas the excuse for every failure of their revolution. Each time that a crop does not come in in the planned amount, every time that their society experiences censorship or other forms of Government control, they can easily point to the United States as the cause.

Here a small country in Central America is the focus of the largest military might in the world. It is a great argument to bring back to our own people. We would like to have free press, they can tell them, except for the Americans that are on our northern border. We would like to open up the political process further but the Americans are on the northern border.

It might be worth that kind of cost if there was some chance for success. There is clearly no chance for success. There is only an opportunity to find more violence against Nicaraguan citizens, the kind of horror stories that we have seen before our committee where innocent civilians, mothers and children and grandmothers are tortured and raped by the Contras.

This Congress and the American people cannot afford to continue such a failed policy. It is the same sort of failed assessment that was used in designing the Bay of Pigs, the hope that half the Cuban Army would divert once the rebels had landed at the Bay of Pigs. The hope that the population would create a simultaneous uprising in support of the rebels.

Mr. SHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEJDENSON. I will not yield.

In talking to people in the region initially, the concept was that the Nicaraguan Army would disintegrate once the Contras began their attack, that we would see a public uprising against the Nicaraguan Government. To the contrary, we are helping to consolidate the Sandinista hold on Nicaragua.

We need to change that policy and we have that opportunity here tonight.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Chairman, at this point in the debate, I would like to take a few moments to put the events in Nicaragua in their proper historical perspective. For these past several years, whenever our country's policies in Central America have been debated in Congress, we hear the same continuous refrain: That the United States has overreacted to the actions of the Sandinista leadership in Nicaragua—that the United States does not understand the dynamics of revolutionary change in a developing like country like Nicaragua—that the Sandinistas would see the error of their ways if we would only treat them right.

Mr. Chairman, all of these arguments are variations on the theme of "Blame America First!"—the battle cry of the new isolationists, those who have grown weary of that "long twilight struggle" that President John F. Kennedy summoned us to join.

But I would suggest here today that there is another explanation for the tragic spectacle in Nicaragua that has been wrought by the Sandinistas. I would suggest there is another explanation, an explanation with ample historical precedent and contemporary relevance. This explanation is that the Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua was stolen by ideologues and extremists who would rather pay obeisance to a foreign ideology and to the foreign capital that ideology represents—Moscow.

I have been deeply impressed by the statements of prominent Nicaraguans who participated in the revolution, Nicaraguans who sincerely wanted to build a new and democratic society—but whose hopes and dreams have been shattered by the Sandinistas.

Consider, for example, Arturo Cruz, the leader of the democratic opposition in Nicaragua, a former member of the Sandinista military junta, as well as a former ambassador from the Sandinista regime to the United States. Mr. Cruz had this to say 2 years ago:

. . . dogmatism and adventurism seem to have wiped out the Democratic and pluralistic ideals which, in 1979, united all Nicaraguan advocates of freedom . . . in April of 1980, after 9 months in government, I was confronted with a difficult decision. I had already become deeply disturbed by the indiscriminate and speedy radicalization of the revolution amid a great deal of confusion and sudden changes.

Mr. Cruz went on to lament that "totalitarian trends are gaining the upper hand in the process of defining Nicaragua's revolution. In the pursuit of a thorough emasculation of the 'establishment,' the radical zealots are prone to exhibit iconoclastic contempt for highly respected people and institutions."

Keep in mind, my colleagues, that these statements were made 2 years ago—and Mr. Cruz is describing events that he observed as an official in the Sandinista regime before the Contras had even taken to the field in opposition to the regime. Only last September, Government-controlled mobs attacked Mr. Cruz's car and resorted to other harassment tactics to intimidate Mr. Cruz and his political supporters.

Before moving on, allow me one more quotation from Mr. Cruz, again describing his experiences in the Sandinista regime before there were Contras opposing it:

. . . our foreign policy began to show how senseless our goals were. Instead of dedicating all our energy to building the ideal society for which our people had hoped, we were chasing Chimeras abroad . . . declaring ourselves nonaligned, we were, in fact, leaning to the Socialist bloc. Our actions belied our lipservice to nonalignment; it was difficult to explain our position vis-a-vis the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. No less astonishing was our silence about the heroic struggle of solidarity in Poland.

Let us continue to look at the record of the Sandinistas, the record that regime had compiled before there even were Contras taking up arms. In the days immediately after the Sandinistas seized power in Managua in July 1979, the United States and other countries in the free world moved decisively to supply assistance to Nicaragua. By the end of 1981, more then $1 billion had been committed by the free world to support Nicaragua. The United States spearheaded this effort, providing more bilateral assistance to the Sandinistas in 1 year than we had provided to the Somoza regime over the previous 10 years. The Inter-American Development Bank provided more funding in 1 year to the Sandinistas than Somoza had received over the previous 20 years.

What did the Sandinistas have to show for all of this?

By the end of 1981, the Sandinistas had managed to amass an external debt equal in size to the debt that was accumulated by the Somoza regime over a period of 40 years.

By the end of 1981, more than 200,000 people—nearly 10 percent of all Nicaraguans—had fled the country.

By the end of 1981, a country that had been running a trade surplus at the time of the revolution was losing $2.5 million a day.

By the end of 1981, inflation had hit 35 percent and unemployment was at 30 percent in Nicaragua.

By the end of 1981, the public sector in Nicaragua was controlling over 50 percent of the Nicaragua economy, compared to 15 percent at the time of the revolution.

By the end of 1981, agricultural production in Nicaragua had fallen by 50 percent. The country was importing sugar, rice, beans, and corn—staple foods in which Nicaragua was self-sufficient at the time of the revolution.

By the end of 1981, the Sandinistas had sponsored an effort to consolidate the several guerrilla movements in El Salvador under Nicaraguan control. Training agreements with the PLO had also been negotiated.

By the end of 1981, the Sandinistas had suppressed free trade unions in Nicaragua, cracked down on freedom of the press, and were harrassing the Catholic Church—an effort, may I say, that reached a climax of sorts when the Pope was publically jeered during staged demonstrations when he visited Nicaragua in 1983.

By the end of 1981, thousands of Miskito Indians had been herded into concentration camps, all in the name of a literacy campaign.

By the end of 1981, the Nicaragua permanent Human Rights Commission was investigating reports of hundreds of disappearances and executions in the country. The commission, which had been founded when Somoza was in power, was subsequently closed under the Sandinistas and its archieves were confiscated.

Finally, surprise! surprise! by the end of 1981, Humberto Ortega, Sandinista Minister of Defense and brother of Daniel Ortega, had decided to belabor the obvious when he admitted: "Marxism/Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution * * * without Marxism/Leninism, Sandinismo cannot be revolutionary."

No, Mr. Chairman, what we have in Nicaragua is not a case of American policy having failed—it is a case of a revolution having failed; the hopes and dreams of a people being crushed; the leaders of a revolution subverting the very liberties that revolution was intended to establish.

If the Sandinista leadership was content to act as self-conscious parody of the ideals the Nicaraguan people were fighting for in 1979, that would be bad enough. But when that same leadership surrenders the country's sovereignty to act as a surrogate for foreign powers and to spread the false hope of revolution to neighboring countries, it is the concern of every country in the hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, the Sandinistas in Nicaragua must stand indicted in the court of world opinion for betraying their own revolution. And true to form, they have resorted to a psychology of crisis, a psychology of ongoing revolution as the only justification for continuing their disgusting regime. Communism always sponsors revolution against everything except communism itself, which is, in fact, the most reactionary model for political and social development ever devised.

If the Sandinistas were fulfilling the hopes their revolution inspired:

There would not be 40 percent of all Nicaraguan males over the age of 18 now in uniform;

There would not be 7,500 Cuban personnel now in Nicaragua to oversee the military buildup and the political repression presently taking place;

There would not be a Nicaraguan armed force significantly larger than any other armed force in Central America—and over four times larger than the armed force maintained by Somoza!

Finally, if the Sandinistas were fulfilling the hopes their revolution inspired, there would not today be more political prisoners in Nicaragua—more prisoners at this moment—than the cumulative total of prisoners for all the years Somoza was in power.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one final observation. In the course of a congressional session, we debate American policy toward many countries: Chile, just yesterday; South Africa, the Philippines, and many others are sure to come. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that whenever we discuss a country that has not had a grand and glorious left-wing revolution, we always do so in terms that suggest an inevitability, a historical necessity for change that must inexorably come? But, whenever we talk about a Communist state, like Nicaragua, we do so in terms that suggest an acceptance of the present tyranny as a permanent fact of life.

Mr. Chairman, that is precisely what is at stake in this debate. The real issue is whether or not we and our democratic allies in Central America must accept and tolerate the presence of a destabilizing and tyrannical state in our hemisphere, a Communist state whose leadership has sold out to foreign powers in the name of spreading the same perverted revolution throughout the region.

I urge support for the Contras. A figure of $14 million is a small sum to spend in defense of our friends in Central America, and, ultimately, in defense of ourselves.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SWINDALL].

Mr. SWINDALL. Mr. Chairman, in listening carefully to the arguments of those in opposition to H.R. 239, I reached the inescapable conclusion that those opposing H.R. 239 are either intentionally or unintentionally blind to world history, or simply bound and determined to repeat it.

For example, one of the opponents argued that from Vietnam we should certainly learn that our fears of the spread of communism and the validity of the domino theory are unjustified. Yet I would suggest that the lesson to be learned from Vietnam is precisely the opposite.

By the same token, I have heard the argument that rather than seek military aid in this corridor we should work closely with the Sandinistas. I would suggest that history demonstrates that we have already done precisely that.

In July 1979 it was the former administration that actually prevailed upon Somoza to leave and go to Miami, and then in fact, as we all know, 1 year later in Paraguay he was assassinated. But yet in hopes of keeping the Sandinistas from moving to the Marxist-Leninist-Soviet network, we aided them to the tune of $118 million.

It was only after several years that the Carter administration upon recognizing that the Sandinistas had absolutely no intention of living up to their own promises, made voluntarily in July 1979 to the OAS with respect to free elections, withdrew the aid. And it was in that posture that the current administration inherited the problem. It was in that posture that we saw the liberation army grow from a mere 5,000 to the present force of over 60,000.

Yet the gentlewoman from Ohio pointed out we are talking about a population of a mere 3 million. Why then would we see a standing army of over 60,000?

By the same token, we learned that they have argued for self-determination. My question is what about self-determination in El Salvador. What about those that are seeking to hold their democracy in El Salvador only to find the insurgents being trained in Nicaragua by some 3,000 Cuban-Soviet advisers in the region are seeking to undermine that democracy?

Once again, we must remember that we are talking about Nicaragua a country that has a population of only 3 million. I cannot help but reach the conclusion that those who argue against this in reality are simply sticking their heads into the sand in hopes of ignoring the reality of what the facts, rather than emotion, demonstrate.

I urge all of those who are concerned about preventing the loss of American lives and the security of this country and our neighbors in Central America to take this opportunity to avoid shedding American blood, to seize upon this opportunity to aid those who share our goal of true self-determination. In this case we are aiding the actual individuals who were a part of that original revolution. Adolfo Calero, for example, was actually one of the ones who before Somoza was deposed held the palace for over 24 hours and yet, again, we hear arguments that these individuals are part of the original Somoza national guard.

Statistics and intelligence tell us if we are concerned about the fact that in reality what we find is less than 2 percent of the 15,000 comprising the Contras are comprised of former Somozans. The leadership is overwhelmingly comprised of the individuals who stood with their colleagues in the Sandinista army in hopes of establishing a true and free democracy.

Finally, I urge consideration of what is at stake regarding the threat of our early warning system which are worth facing-designed on the premise that Central America poses no threat. Additionally, we can ill afford to have reconnaissance flights on our western seaboard similar to those now being flown over our eastern seaboard as a result of the Soviet presence in Cuba. This is especially true in light of the defense facilities positioned in the western United States.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the support of H.R. 239.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN].

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, there are a lot of experts on Central America, I see, as I watch the debate. Since I spent 5 days in El Salvador and Nicaragua I assume that I qualify as an expert as well.

I thought that I might share some of the benefits of my quick visit there. One is that I did vote for military aid to El Salvador and I came back from Nicaragua with a concern about what I saw. I did not see a Cuba but I saw a country where there are a lot of Eastern European military vehicles floating around; I talked to the editor of La Prensa about the press freedom and lack thereof that is going around.

I am concerned about the expansionist tendencies. But I think the situation is complex. I think we have to ask ourselves what are the U.S. goals in this? No. 1, are we trying to overthrow the government directly? Or, two, are we trying to destabilize the regime so they may be overthrown or weakened? No. 3, are we trying to prevent the Soviet Union and Communist countries from entering the picture? Four, are we trying to prevent the Sandinistas from moving into other countries in Central America? Or, five, are we trying to improve the internal operations of their government?

Now, these are five potential goals. I happen to think that as long as we retain diplomatic relations with the country, which we do, as long as we have an Ambassador in Managua, which we do, as long as we are dealing with them, I do not think that we ought to provide aid to the Contras to overthrow the government or to destabilize the regime so that they would be overthrown. But that does not mean that we are paralyzed, that we cannot act. I am not particularly thrilled with all the language of the Barnes-Hamilton resolution because I am not sure that it speaks clearly to what our goals are in this region. But that is a start.

Other places are a possible trade embargo, a conditional trade embargo against the importation of Nicaraguan goods like beef or bananas or other things in the event that they are involved in these kinds of activities I mentioned.

The Contadora process is one that ought to be encouraged. Warning the Soviets which we did when they were here on their visit, the Politburo and the Supreme Soviet, about the fact that we will not tolerate Soviet military equipment in there; recalling our Ambassador if necessary; or even possibly breaking off diplomatic relations, if necessary. But that is not what is being proposed now.

What is being proposed is providing aid to the Contras to destabilize their government when we have diplomatic relations to this country. I think that is an improper way for us to act as a great power.

I think there is still potential for stabilizing relations between the Nicaraguan Government and the United States. But with covert aid that potential is destroyed. Nicaragua ought to know that if it stops its internal problems that we find so offensive that it might in fact find that it has a lot more to gain from the United States than to lose. It ought to be in their interest to in fact cooperate with us. If they do not, if they engage in these actions, I think we ought to deal with it directly and not indirectly in the form of Contra aid.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARTNETT].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HARTNETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make one comment about my good friend Mr. GLICKMAN who spoke so eloquently, as usual, in the well. He talked about how the Ortega government could learn that it had more to gain by cooperating with us than by being hostile to us. That is very true. But I look at Fidel Castro who since 1959 has impoverished his country because he is an ideologue who is wedded to extending and spreading revolution all over the globe. When you get committed, dedicated Marxists they do not care about what is good for their country. All they care about is spreading the faith.

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to reclaim my time and I would like to continue.

Mr. Chairman, and my colleagues, the gentleman who preceded me in the well made reference to experts on Central and South America.

Mr. Chairman, I am anything but an expert. I am 44 years old and I have never been to Nicaragua. I have never shaken the hand of President Ortega. Nor have I ever met any of the benevolent members of his administration. I have never spoken in broken English or in poor Spanish to archbishops, nor have I ever had the pleasure of looking a Nicaraguan in the eye and asking him how he feels about my country and telling him how I feel about his.

But, you know, Mr. Chairman, the eloquence of the speakers on the other side of the aisle who preceded me this evening has been brilliant; their logic and their rationale, Mr. Chairman, I think in some instances is a little lacking. They have tried to equate this to Vietnam and it will be another Vietnam, Mr. Chairman, if our foreign policy and our assistance to the Nicaraguan people are run by some of the left element of the Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have never been to Nicaragua; many of my colleagues have. The thing that concerns me, Mr. Chairman, is that I have made it for 44 years almost now and never had to know, I have a 14-year-old son that if we stand by and do nothing will be down there by the time he is 18, and my daughter, maybe, who is 12. That is my concern; now what is best for Nicaragua, but what is best for the vital security interests of these United States.

We have been somewhat of a force in this hemisphere, Mr. Chairman, because we have had some control over activities in our own hemisphere. That has made for somewhat of a peaceful existence for us and our neighbors in Central America. But if we stand by and do nothing, I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that we are not going to ever know these United States in the future like we have in the past, nor our own security.

Forty-four years never having ventured to that small country for this aging, middle-aged Congressman, and some, some chance that my 18-year-old son will be there in a very hostile environment in a short time. I would not trade places with him, Mr. Chairman. I do not think many of the sons of my colleagues would either.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOSTMAYER].

Mr. KOSTMAYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I do not rise tonight to defend the Sandinistas. Along with the gentleman from North Dakota who spoke earlier, I visited that country and returned disillusioned and as disappointed as he. Nor in fact do I rise tonight to criticize our President or his party or their goals in the region for I think we have goals in common as Republicans and Democrats, most importantly as Americans.

But I think this policy is flawed in three ways. First, it cannot work. $14 million is not enough to do the job. That is why the administration will be requesting for next year double that, $28 million, and that is why they seek also to double the number of Contras. Nor does the policy have the kind of broad based political support it requires at home in our own country or abroad where our allies feel, and I think rightly so, that we have rejected the Contadora process.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, any effort on the part of our own Government directly or indirectly to overthrow a duly constituted foreign government with which we are not at war and with which we enjoy diplomatic relations, is unseemly.

There is an alternative. The alternative to be offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] that alternative, ladies and gentlemen, sends a clear, strong message to President Ortega and his government, a message to end the censorship, a message to end the religious restrictions, a message to reach a political settlement with his neighbors.

Between tonight and the end of this fiscal year we have 5 months to permit the Nicaraguan Government to demonstrate that they have heard the message of Barnes/Hamilton. Tonight the vote we cast is a message to Mr. Ortega to join with us in seizing the historic moment.

I think that we can shift the direction of the tragedy that is unraveling in Central America if we reject the administration's policy and try something different.

This is a risk, but if it fails nothing is lost.

Mr. Chairman, I think that it can succeed.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 296.

The one irrefutable fact in this debate is that the high ideals and purpose of the original Nicaraguan revolution have been subverted. That revolution was waged with the pledge that the Somoza dictatorship would be replaced by a society based on political pluralism, civil liberties, a mixed economy, and nonalignment.

Nicaragua today is a far cry from the society promised by the Sandinistas. The elections held last November, for instance, were neither free nor fair. As the inter-American Human Rights Commission had documented, the elections were a sham. Legitimate opposition parties were prevented from freely organizing and compaigning. In the end, the Sandinistas used their absolute control of the state to give themselves an insurmountable electoral advantage—an advantage they have since used to consolidate their power.

There are no freedoms today in Nicaragua. There is no freedom of expression, freedom of movement, freedom of the press. It is no surprise that the early supporters of the Sandinistas now shun the regime. Carlos Andres Perez, for instance, a former president of Venezuela and now Vice Chairman of the Socialist International, publicly declined to attend Daniel Ortega's inauguration, saying that he and others who supported the original revolution felt—and I quote—"cheated" by the current state of affairs in Nicaragua and the lack of electoral freedom.

As a consequence, there exists today in Nicaragua a legitimate, native, and growing opposition to the repressive Sandinista regime. Today we focus on the military aspects of that opposition, but that opposition has a real social basis. You cannot manufacture a revolution; nor can a policy decision here in Washington put 15,000 men in the field. The freedom fighters in the field are backed by a broad, growing social movement—they are not merely instruments of U.S. foreign policy.

The freedom fighters are not demanding political power in their struggle. They are demanding a national dialog and a constitutional solution, and they are asking that we help offset the unfair advantage of Soviet intervention on behalf of the Sandinistas. Is this too much to ask?

Those who respond by saying "no" also say "no" to the leadership of that respected Democratic President, John F. Kennedy. They pervert the words of his inaugural address to read: "Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay no price, bear no burden meet no hardship, oppose any friend, support any foe to assure the survival and success of accommodation."

Let's not let the light of liberty and freedom be extinguished in Nicaragua. Let's help return the original Nicaraguan revolution to the Nicaraguan people—support H.R. 296.

□ 2010

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces that the time left of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] is 33½ minutes and the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] is 31½ minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, and Members, I am reminded of my first exposure to the country; Managua. The tune, if I were BOB MICHEL, would go something like:

Managua, Nicaragua, what a beautiful spot,
There's coffee and bananas and a temperature hot.
Managua, Nicaragua, in our mind's eye a dream vacationland,
A spot in our own hemisphere, a happy people, beautiful tropical sunshine.

When I arrived in the Congress in 1979, the country came to my mind's eye in an entirely different fashion. I found the debate that was raging for this new freshman Congressman to be most disconcerting.

I did not pretend to have a lot of answers and tried to listen. What struck me most was that in the debate that had taken place between 1974 and that time, there had been significant shift in this House, regarding our views about what ought to be a future we can support in Nicaragua.

It was clear that there was growing unrest in our country about Somoza and his regime. It was clear that people were asking serious questions about totalitarian systems that oppress people, that did not allow freedom, that did not allow for a free press, did not allow for private economic opportunity and growth.

The Sandinista movement had gained broad support in this House and broad support at home. In the middle of that first year, with the majority developing here, our Government, then the Carter administration, and the House of Representatives as well, applied pressures to the Organization of American States to have Somoza step aside, and the Sandinistas had won what they described as their revolution.

Now my colleagues, I would ask us to step back and attempt once again to listen. Is that which we see as a Sandinismo today what we were voting about in 1979 or talking about in the years before. Absolutely and clearly it is not.

Member after Member was on the side of the overthrow of Somoza, has stood and condemned the Sandinista government. Why have they done so? That government came about as a result of a dual-track revolution. One that we were involved in. The other, on the other hand, that the FSLN was involved in, and a few who were very closely tied to Cuba as well as having loyalty to the Soviet Union.

Now Members and my colleagues, it is critical for us to realize that we were arguing for, you voted for, a chance for freedom, for democracy, for free press; and there is none of that at this point.

Any reasonable review would cause us to understand that it is time for us to think again. The church has done that. I commend to you a book entitled, "The Barren Fig Tree," written by a group of Christians who are concerned about the change from what they expected and what they see. The bishops of Central America supported initially the Sandinista. They encouraged their educational programs only to find that those educational programs were undermining a form of education that gave a chance for freedom in that country.

The church began to back off. In the early period, we supported the Sandinista, $117.2 million in the first 18 months, and then Jimmy Carter was forced to look again, because he found that that other revolution had really gained control; they had strategically placed themselves in a position to take over the revolution, put in place their own. And they are now in the process of attempting to destroy a hope for democracy in the region.

Those who suggest that we are here to talk about the Contras somehow overthrowing the Sandinista just aren't looking at reality. That is not what they are about. They are fighting to see if there is a chance to preserve some time for democracy, to hold in place the chance for this new revolution to grow.

The people who now make up the opposition forces that you call the Contras; those people are Nicaraguans. They represent a broad mix. Some were in the former government, some were supporters of the Sandinistas; some were neither. But a groundswell is taking place, and we must have time for it to succeed.

Mr. Chairman, the issue before us is, are we going to support a Communist Sandinista government, or are we going to vote against that sort of government, and give hope for democracy within our hemisphere.

I fear that if we do not follow the latter path, support democracy, that our hope for democracy in the region is at a loss.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, here is the frontpage of today's New York Times. It reads, "Nicaraguan Rebels Appear Ready To Fight On If Aid is Cut Off." And most assuredly they will, because I hold here a message from the combat front in Nicaragua, from the No. 1 hero of the successful revolution against the dictator Anastasio Somoza.

This letter is from Commandante Zero, Commander Eden Pastora. It is directed mostly to the majority party in the House, but it is surely a message to all of us.

"I will continue our struggle against the Managua regime even if the U.S. Congress stipulates that funds approved will go only to humanitarian aid for refugees and not the rebel groups." "If Congress does that, I will be very sorry, that they don't want to help those of us who are fighting; sorry that they don't want to give military aid to those of us who are fighting with weapons in our hands for the liberty of our people against a dictatorial government of the extreme left. We will continue to fight with or without the aid of the Congress, because it is the revolutionary duty of the Sandino who have no commitment to the Congress or the administration. If the administration proposes humanitarian aid instead of military aid, well then, the administration will know how to settle its differences with Nicaragua. We know how to settle our differences here inside Nicaragua."

With or without the U.S. aid, we will continue to fight, just as we did against Somoza. If it is necessary to fight for another 20 years, then we will fight for another 20 years!

"We do want Democrats to help those of us with weapons in our hands for freedom of the press, just like the U.S. Democrats have. So that the press, Army, party and government will not be one and the same. Those of us who are fighting international communism with the union of treason want a democratic system like the U.S. Democrats have; and we ask them not to conduct U.S. politics at the expense of our people's suffering.

"The Democrat and Republican Parties should settle their differences in the United States and should not create obstacles for those who want to help us in the struggle against the Russians and the Cubans who have invaded us." Signed, Eden Pastora.

"Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we will pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe, in order to ensure the success and the survival of liberty."

Those stirring words are from the magnificent inaugural speech by the youngest elected President ever to raise his hand and swear to defend our Constitution. Those words were spoken 25 years ago on the steps of this great Capitol. Young President John F. Kennedy went on to say that "the trumpet summons us again, it is a call to bear the burden of a long twilight struggle . . ."

There have passed since the January 1961 day a brutal 24 years and 4 months. In that magnificent speech, President Kennedy let the whole world know that the twilight struggle of which he spoke was to be against disease, and we have a better record in that fight than any country in the history of the world; against proverty it is the United States that works hardest in trying to stop the Communist aggravated famine in Ethiopia.

Yes, he spoke out that we would have to fight for as long as we could see into the in this twilight struggle, against the curse of war. But he also said that the twilight struggle was against tyranny. And it is against the tyranny in Managua that I rise today to support my President's foreign policy.

Now, two magnificent things have happened in this House chamber today. One, no one trashed El Salvador, and two, we have had almost 10 hours of excellent, high quality debate. The tone was set by the Honorable EDWARD P. BOLAND of Massachusetts, and with rare exceptions it has been fought on a very high level. It has not at all resembled the debates in the National Assembly in Managua which, when it adjourned right before Easter, had members cursing at one another while other members stormed off the Assembly floor in outrage. The pain of that Assembly, because of Sandinista oppression is truly a mirror reflection of the final spasms of Kerensky's Duma in 1917 Leningrad before that free legislature was snuffed out, never again to meet in free discourse and debate as we so fortunately have been able to do here in our Capital for over 196 years.

Exactly 14 years ago this very day, April 23, 1971, I witnessed the most disgusting, the most obnoxious——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I witnesses in April of 1971 the most disgraceful conduct of U.S. Members of Congress that I could ever have imagined on the west front of this Capitol. On that sunny day, while this distinguished gentleman from Arizona Mr. MCCAIN was still rotting in a Honoi dungeon but thanking his lucky stars that most of his torture was behind him due to the heroic Son Tay raid attempted rescue, I saw a Communist flag of North Vietnam, larger than this beautiful Old Glory behind our Speaker, drapped over one of the front marble railings, behind the railing a speakers podium. And speaking over the Communist flag was a Senator from Indiana, no longer here, thank God, a New York Congresswoman no longer here, thank God. And two more U.S. Senators working the crowd. I grabbed that massive flag and I tore it to shreds. Then the mob, the 1971 "turbas divinas", had their way with me for a while. However, very weak street fighters those pro-Hanoi fools.

Yes, we have come a long way in just 14 years. We have debated in this Congress with almost no one paying lipservice to Communists. I repeat, the success of El Salvador is brilliantly glowing by its near absence in our deliberations. I made my eighth trip down there on Palm Sunday, and I witnessed a fiesta of free religion and free politics. The people's appreciation and enjoyment of the electoral process and love of their liberty was a joy to behold. I was deeply honored to be an official observor of that fourth free election in just over 2 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] has expired.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. The absence of discussion of El Salvador in our debate today, its relegation to the back burner with an attendant absence of hot, burning rhetoric about no democracy in El Salvador shows that President Reagan has had a magnificent foreign policy achievement in that Central American nation. The Hondurans also yearn to be our friends, and in both of those countries Mr. VIN WEBER of Minnesota and heard those people say, including President Duarte on his election victory night, that the reason that those two countries are relatively stable now is because other mothers' sons are dying for them fighting for liberty with the resistance forces in Managua.

VIN WEBER and I visited a Contra field hospital in Honduras. It was a very rudimentary shed, clean but very rough. It was located somewhere between Tegucigalpa and the Honduran border. It brought tears to our eyes to see these campesino peasant fighters cheer when Mr. WEBER told them that Ronald Reagan would not desert them. They knew they were fighting for a worthy cause and they told us so in clear uncomplicated terms. My heart is with them.

"Those who wait on the Lord renew their strength and shall mount up on wings like eagles; they shall run and not be wary; they shall walk and not faint." So with these fighters for freedom.

I know that these brave men and women will fight on with our aid or without it. I want us to be with them.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I wish to call to the attention of this body the attached letter and resolution which has come to me from the Hungarian Freedom Fighters' Association. This resolution calls on the Congress to honor the President's request for assistance and to help the Freedom Fighters of Nicaragua to join the ranks of other valiant men and women who have fought against Communist tyranny. The Hungarian Freedom Fighters' Association, of which I am proudly an honorary member, accurately calls attention to the implications around the world of our vote here tonight. How often have we failed to count the cost in diminished influence in recent years, when we tossed off our concerns as if they mattered not a farthing. The people of Hungary, whose cousins here have provided us a strong reminder in this resolution, know that it does matter.

I place this statement in the RECORD, and urge my colleagues to heed its admonition.

COORDINATING COMMITTEE OF HUNGARIAN ORGANIZATIONS IN NORTH AMERICA,
Rockville, MD, April 21, 1985.

Hon. ROBERT DORNAN,
House of Representatives
Washington, DC

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DORNAN: The Hungarian Freedom Fighters' Federation unanimously passed a resolution on the issue of aid to the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters. This resolution was endorsed by the Coordinating Committee of Hungarian Organizations in North America. Copies of the resolution were sent to more than 60 members of Congress in the hope that it will be considered by them before they cast their vote on this issue.

We respectfully request you—as one of the honorary members of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters Federation—to insert the resolution and our Committee's endorsing letter in the Congressional Record on Monday, April 22, 1985, so that all members of Congress can take note of it.

Respectfully yours,

ISTVAN B. GEREBEN.

HUNGARIAN FREEDOM FIGHTER'S FEDERATION,
Rockville, MD.

RESOLUTION ON AID TO NICARAGUAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS

(Unanimously adopted by the Executive Committee of the Hungarian Freedom Fighters' Federation at its semi-annual meeting held in Washing ton, DC on April 13, 1985)

Since World War II the United States encountered numerous opportunities to influence the course of history to stop the advancement of tyranny. Few of these opportunities were exploited. In most cases gullibility, apathy, expedience, ignorance, well intentioned naivete resulted in disastrous consequences for America. Of these cases the most painful for us, Americans of Hungarian descent, was the political and diplomatic paralysis which characterized the United States during the 1956 Hungarian Revolution. Fear of war resulted in appeasement of the oppressors of Hungary and a greater danger of war today. Since then we learned that fear was baseless and a more principled stand could have resulted in a situation in Hungary which would have brought more freedom for the Hungarians and greater security for the world. Similar mistakes chilled the Prague Spring and U.S. "pragmatism" resulted in the abandonment of Solidarity in Poland, withdrawal from Asia paved the road to the genocide of the Cambodians, marginal support for the Afghan Freedom Fighters prevents the decisive outcome of the struggle for a free Afghanistan.

Now the United States is at a critical point of history again. The eyes of the world are on Washington again. Today we confront Marxist tyranny in our own hemisphere. The Soviet inspired reign of terror, with an appetite to consume our neighbors, is knocking on our southern border.

Our President recognized the futility of continuous moral surrender. He supports those, who have the capability and the desire to fight for their own people's freedom. We—who fought alone and learned the cost of abandonment—urge the members of Congress to stand with the President and give him the resources to financially help the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters.

It is not only Nicaragua's fate at stake. The people of Europe, Asia, and Africa living under the yoke of Soviet tyranny will draw far reaching conclusions as the consequence of America's attitude towards the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters. The people of the Third World are watching also, and will be influenced as well.

As citizens of our adopted country, the United States, we feel obliged to warn against the follies which have so often put the United States in the position of denying effective help to those who fight for the very principles upon which this country was built.

The Hungarian Freedom Fighters' Federation therefore supports the President's efforts on behalf of the Freedom Fighters of Nicaragua and urges all members of Congress to vote for the aid presently under consideration by the Congress of the United States.

Washington, D.C. 13 May 1983.

Hungarian Freedom Fighters' Federation
Dr. ANDRAS POGANY,
President.

This resolution is endorsed by the Coordinating Committee of Hungarian Organizations.

ISTVAN B. GEREBEN,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, I also include for the RECORD, two of the finest articles on Nicaraguan oppression this month. They are by the brothers Bob and Sam Leiken, published in the New Republic.

NICARAGUA'S UNTOLD STORIES
(By Robert S. Leiken)

The 72-year-old senora lives in a solid stone house constructed by the Sandinista government. Her son, German Pomares, was a founder of the Sandinista National Liberation Front (F.S.L.N.) who perished leading the final offensive against Somoza in 1979. Set off by a well-kept garden from the shacks of the cotton field workers of El Viejo, Mrs. Pomares's home appears comfortable. But inside, the mother of the nationally revered martyr sleeps on a cot covered with rags, and she hobbles through bare, unfurnished rooms. She lives on a pension equivalent to $10 a month. She has made four trips to the local hospital, but has yet to succeed in getting a doctor's appointment. Three times she has requested an audience with Comandante Tomas Borge, now the sole surviving founder of the F.S.L.N. Each time, her son's old comrade has refused to receive her.

For one who has sympathized with the Sandinistas, it is painful to look into the house they are building, but it is unwise not to. I spent ten days in Nicaragua in August, accompanied by my brother, a trade unionist from Boston. It was my sixth visit since the revolution, and my longest since 1981. I have testified in Congress against aid to the contras and have supported (and continue to support) negotiations to end the civil war in El Salvador. Yet each succeeding trip to Nicaragua drains my initial reservoir of sympathy for the Sandinistas. Last year I wrote in my introduction to a book treated by the press as the "Democratic alternative to the Kissinger Report" that the Sandinistas' "failure to preserve the revolutionary alliance with the middle class and small producers as well as sectarian political and cultural policies [had] polarized the country, led to disinvestment, falling productivity and wages, labor discontent, and an agrarian crisis." This visit convinced me that the situation is far worse than I had thought, and disabused me of some of the remaining myths about the Sandinista revolution.

Everywhere we went we confronted the disparity between these myths and the unpleasant truth. The Sandinistas blame Nicaragua's economic crisis on the contras war and U.S. economic sanctions. Yet the standard of living in Nicaragua was deteriorating well before the U.S. backed contras turned to economic sabotage in the spring of 1983. A December 1981 internal staff memorandum of the International Monetary Fund found that real wages had fallen 71 percent since July 1979. They have continued to decline in succeeding years. And even with the U.S. "economic boycott," over 25 percent of Nicaragua's exports still go to the United States, not much less than under Somoza. Nicaragua can no longer sell sugar at subsidized prices to the United States, but what it has lost in this market it has sold to Iran at prices above those of the world market. The war and U.S. sanctions have compounded a mess created by the Sandinistas themselves.

Nicaraguans themselves do not seem to accept Sandinista claims that Yanqui aggression is responsible for the general scarcity of consumer goods. Peasants are obligated to sell their goods to the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, and contend that its prices are too low to enable them to make ends meet. A large portion of the peasantry is now producing only for its own consumption, and the resulting shortages have dramatically driven up prices. The marketplace, once the bustling center of Nicaraguan life, is now a daunting experience for buyers and sellers alike. As shoppers make the rounds looking for rice, beans, milk, toilet paper, soap, or light bulbs, the shopkeepers' constant reply is "No hay". (There isn't any). For anyone unable to afford the inflated prices or without the foreign exchange to shop at the new foreign currency stores, Eastern European-style queuing is now routine.

One of the most depressing aspects of our trip was to hear from so many that their lives are worse today than they were at the time of Somoza. Before the revolution Nicaraguans ate well by Central American standards. Thanks to the country's fertile soil and its small population, even poor Nicaraguans were accustomed to beef and chicken. Now consumer goods available to the masses in other Central American countries are no longer obtainable. Barefoot children are hardly uncommon in the region, but I had never seen so many completely naked. As we encountered them, their distended stomachs displaying the telltale signs of malnutrition, Nicaraguans would bitterly recall the government slogan, "Los niños son los mimados de la revolucion" ("Children are the spoiled ones of the revolution").

The shortage of basic necessities is also breeding pervasive corruption. When we asked a rural storekeeper why he was able to sell Coca-Cola while many restaurants in Managua were not, he said that he had obtained the soft drink with a bribe. We later met Ramiro, a Coca-Cola deliveryman in Leon and a former member of the F.S.L.N., hitchhiking home from the city of Chinandega. He was returning from his five-hour weekly excursion after work to procure the three bottles of milk his children need. The milk cost him 150 cordobas, 30 percent of his weekly wages. (The official exchange rate is 28 cordobas to the dollar; the real, or black market, exchange rate is 250 to 1.) To get the money, he told us, he accepts bribes from some of his customers for extra cases of Coke. "This system is corrupting me against my will," he said.

Ramiro's desperate measures hardly merit censure. But others, especially high-ranking Sandinistas, are turning big profits from the scarcity. Members of a leather workers cooperative in Masaya told us that they are officially allotted 10,000 meters of leather a month; they receive between 5,000 and 7,000 meters. The cooperatives' Sandinista directors sell the remainder in Managua's Eastern Market and pocket the money. It is now a general practice for coordinators of the neighborhood Sandinista Defense Committees (C.D.S.) to sell part of the provisions allotted to them by the government on the private market. The people are then informed that provisions have run out.

In the village of El Transito, two hours northwest of Managua, most of the people belonged to the C.D.S. at the outset of the revolution. Now there is but one member, the coordinator, formerly the village's leading Somocista. (The transformation of Somocistas into Sandinistas and of Sandinistas into oppositionists is very common. In every town we visited we were told that former Somoza officials are now running C.D.S.s.) The coordinator enriches himself by selling C.D.S. foodstuffs and supplies in the Eastern Market. As we passed his house, we were able to peer through the window and see him standing there in his dark glasses, isolated and reviled.

The life-styles of the new rich contrast vividly with that of the rest of the country, and with official rhetoric. A Sandinista nomenclatura has emerged. Party members shop at hard-currency stores, dine at luxury restaurants restricted to party officials, and vacation in the mansions of the Somoza dynasty, labeled "protocol houses." Vans pull up daily at government and party offices, to deliver ham, lobster, and other delicacies unavailable elsewhere. In a private state dining room, I ate a sumptuous meal with a comandante at a long table, attended by five servants. The image of the protruding stomachs of the "spoiled ones of the revolution" intruded while we consumed our lemon meringue pie.

Intellectuals and former officials claim that decadence is endemic in upper government and party echelons. A former Sandinista diplomat recounted tales of high jinks and extravagance by Sandinista officials on foreign junkets, and women state employees complained of the same sexual harassment and blackmail that is common elsewhere in Central America. The swinging Sandinista leadership cynically presents an image of revolutionary asceticism to the outside world while being addicted to the very vices that it routinely denounces in "degenerate bourgeois society."

The widespread corruption from the lowest to the highest levels of government makes it hard for Nicaraguans to accept the notion that their problems originate from abroad, or that they should endure further sacrifices "to confront the imperialist enemy." A jobless worker in the Indian town of Monimbo complained, "The C.D.S. insists that we unscrew the street lights to conserve energy in the fight against imperialism. People are falling in holes while the Sandinistas get rich on our misery. What are their sacrifices?"

Those Sandinistas who have refused to be corrupted recognize that their dreams have turned into a nightmare. One government official, a good friend, told me, "We have given birth to a freak. But we must keep him alive." Yet what is to be done when the freak becomes a menace to its people and neighbors? There is a general impression among those in the United States properly aghast at the C.I.A. mining of ports and U.S. support for the professional torturers among the contras that the Sandinistas are the victims, not the victimizers. Inside Nicaragua, however, the image is reversed.

The word Nicaraguans employ the most frequently to describe the Sandinista government is engaño (hoax or trick). In the city of Chinandega, we talked with transport workers from an opposition union who on their own time and with their union dues had painted road signs to make the city safer for driving. The Sandinista government took credit for the improvement. The national literacy campaign is one of the most vaunted achievements of the revolution, praised even by many of the government's critics. Yet two "graduates" of the literacy program in a peasant village told us they could not read their diplomas. We couldn't find one student from the campaign there or in the neighboring village who had learned to read. The campaign did somewhat better in the larger cities such as León, where, we were told, some had learned to read in follow-up courses. But most had forgotten the little they had learned, and at best could now only sign their name for election registration.

The most outrageous engaño occurred during Pope John Paul II's visit to Managua in March 1983. According to Sandinista accounts, the Pope's mass had been "spontaneously" interrupted by the crowd, offended by the Pope's failure to heed the request of mourning mothers who wanted him to pray for their sons killed in the battle against the contras. Two former government officials, who are still Sandinista supporters, told us a different story. They had been appalled at the interruptions made by cadre from the Sandinista women's organization, furnished with microphones and loudspeakers. After the Pope left, the crowd departed in disgust and the Sandinista leadership was left awkwardly standing on the platform. The two officials, depressed by the spectacle, retired to a bar located next to the offices of the F.S.L.N. radio station. They overheard a group of Sandinista radio employees at an adjoining table bragging about how they had played pre-recorded tapes of crowds chanting Sandinista slogans into the sound system.

The Sandinistas engaño has been most successful among the resident foreign press. Journalists familiar with the atrocities of the right-wing tyrannies of Central America wish to believe, quite understandably, that the Sandinistas present an alternative. In today's Nicaragua it is easy to confuse desire with reality. The resident press also frequently merges with the larger population of "internationalists," a term which embraces all those foreigners expressing solidarity with the Sandinistas, from Bulgarian and Cuban apparatchiks to idealistic North Americans and West Europeans. It is the general feeling among Nicaraguans that the foreign press in Managua strongly sympathizes with the government, and that it is dangerous to speak openly with them. Disaffected Sandinista intellectuals, friends of friends, who poured their hearts out to me in Managua were afraid to meet with reporters from the U.S. press. We spoke with a resident of Monimbo, where a spontaneous insurrection had ignited the revolution against Somoza in February 1978. We had spent an evening together a year before with a mutual friend, yet initially he was still distrustful. He told us that the revolution had produced "many advances for the people"; two hours later, he was saying, "Monimbo appears to be sleeping, the way it was during the time of Somoza, but the people are united. One day soon they will stand up again."

One of the most common means of sustaining the myth of popular support is the Sandinistas' use of the rationing system as a lever. In numerous villages and cities, we learned that ration cards are confiscated for nonattendance at Sandinista meetings. In Masaya we were told that before one of the "Face-the-People" meetings (in which commandantes meet with local residents) the ration cards of the members of cooperatives were collected; their return was made conditional on attendance. At one such meeting in Chinandega, Ortega branded talk of inflation "a counterrevolutionary plot." A pound of beans could still be purchased for five cordobas, he claimed. A man in the audience stood up and shouted, "Commandante, here's ten cordobas. Please get me a pound of beans." According to his neighbors, he was imprisoned later that day.

Although Nicaraguans still for the most part bow to government pressure, they do so sullenly and without conviction. We witnessed two Sandinista demonstrations, one in Masaya and the other in Chinandega, two historically pro-Sandinista cities. The Chinandega rally, held at 10 on a Wednesday morning, celebrated the fifth anniversary of the literacy campaign. It was attended entirely by students obligated to go by school authorities. As they marched through the streets chanting slogans distributed to them on small pieces of paper by their Sandinista instructors, pedestrians did not so much as turn their heads. None of the presumably grateful, presumably literate, people came to greet the comandante sent from Managua.

In Masaya the demonstration did not even benefit from student participation. As we approached the gathering in the fading afternoon, a large group of students stood on the steps of the Catholic school. They had refused to join the demonstration because the Sandinistas had removed several of their Catholic teachers. The small group of demonstrators had glazed looks in their eyes as the last speeches wound down. I asked a campesino in attendance whether any of the comandantes had come. He answered, "I don't know. I slept through it."

The Nicaraguan populace has been saturated with Sandinista bombast which issues from radio, television, newspapers, local and national political meetings, and block committees, and which is propagated in the schools, the factories, and the cooperatives. The people resist in different ways: with the indifference and boredom we saw in Chinandega and Masaya; with a resurgence in religious feelings which has filled churches and Catholic schools; with suspiciousness and bitter humor.

Jokes and wisecracks against the Sandinistas are proliferating. The two pro-Sandinista newspapers, Barricada and Nuevo Diaro, are referred to as Burricada (as in bore) and Nuevo Diablo. The F.S.L.N. is "the Somocista National Liberation Front." "Why do people prefer Tona [one of the two Nicaraguan beers]? Because the other, La Victoria, is bitter." Suspicions of the government are so deep that families of the war dead no longer believe that the government coffins shipped back from the front contain the bodies of their sons. (The coffins are sealed as a matter of policy.) People believe, improbably, that the coffins hold rocks or banana tree trunks. In Monimbo we were told that when a family and friends tried to open a coffin with a hammer and chisel, they were carried off by the police.

Nor is popular discontent restricted to these forms of passive resistance. Sympathy with the contras is becoming more open and more pervasive. I was stunned to hear peasants refer to the contras as Los Muchachos," the boys—the admiring term used to describe the Sandinistas when they were battling the National Guard. It was apparent that many Nicaraguans are listening to the "Fifteenth of September," the contra radio station. It must be noted, however, that the contras do not operate in the areas we visited, and sympathy toward them may well be proportionate to absence of direct contact.

Draft resistance has become a mass movement in Nicaragua. The government passed legislation last September under which Nicaraguan men between the ages of 16 and 40 can be drafted for two years. When we were in Nicaragua, four hundred women gathered outside the draft board in La Paz Centro, a trading town thirty-five miles northwest of Managua, to protest forced recruitment of their sons. The demonstration was the latest in a string of anti-draft demonstrations in cities and towns throughout Nicaragua. New York Times correspondent Stephen Kinzer, one of the few resident reporters to sniff out the engaño of Sandinista policies, reported on June 26 that "draft evasion is widespread," and found that high school attendance in six major provincial capitals had declined by as much as 40 percent. A student in León said that his high school class of forty-five had fallen to fourteen during the past year. Honduran researchers say Nicaraguan draft evaders pay 25,000 cordobas to be transported across the border, part of the money going to Nicaraguan Army officials in bribes. The demand is so great that border smugglers are now requiring groups no smaller than five. Draft resistance strikes a powerful blow at the myth of widespread popular support for the government. Young people have historically been the mainstay of Sandinista support.

Perhaps the most illuminating political event in the five years of Sandinista rule was a rally held for opposition presidential candidate Arturo Cruz in Chinandega on August 5. On that Sunday morning, Sandinista chicanery, censored domestic and lackadaisical international press coverage, and the growing vigor of the opposition converged.

Chinandega, a city of approximately 60,000, was historically the heart of Sandinista organizing efforts and support. These efforts radiated out to the surrounding cotton and sugar fields, to the country's two largest sugar refineries nearby, to the stevedores at Corinto, Nicaragua's largest port, and down to León, another center of anti-Somoza resistance. One would have expected that here the opposition would be weakest, the government strongest.

The Chinandega demonstration was the last series of six held in support of Cruz. Each rally had been larger than the last. The organizers were denied access to Sandinista-controlled TV stations. They were able to place an ad on the one local non-Sandinista radio station, but they relied chiefly on two vehicles with loudspeakers, and on word-of-mouth. Two days before the rally three "angels," as members of the state security are commonly known, called on the organizers of the demonstration and accused them of being CIA agents. The turbas divinas, "divine mobs" of Sandinista supporters, circled their houses at night beating sticks against cans and chanting until the small hours of the morning. (Somoza's version of the turbas—the Nicolasa—used to employ the very same method against the opposition.) Meanwhile, Sandinista newspapers and television branded the opposition as consisting of contras and agents of American imperialism, and announced that further "aggressions" by them would not be permitted. Local authorities implied that the demonstration would be declared illegal. The day before the rally, Daniel Ortega, the head of the Sandinista government and the Sandinista presidential candidate, spoke to two hundred youths in El Viejo, a village three miles away. El Viejo's residents later claimed that the youths had been incited against the demonstration's leaders.

Fearing an attack by the turbas, organizers did not put up the banners or placards until early on the morning of the demonstration. But as they were working, fifty turbas burst into the soccer field, tearing down the banners and dispersing the organizers. They returned later during the day to try to repair the damage.

We spoke with two organizers—middle-class, professional women who had belonged to the F.S.L.N. before the revolution. (According to one, "the F.S.L.N. says that the opposition is Somocista. But most of the old Somocistas are working with the government. The opposition has remained the same. It is the F.S.L.N. that has changed.") They told us that after the turbas' nighttime serenading, they went to complain to the offices of the party representative, the chief of police, and the chief of state security, and to the Sandinistas. They were assured that the turbas would be controlled and that the demonstration would not be obstructed. After the early-morning attack, the two women went to the house of the local party leader. The door was open, and they entered. In the next room they heard the turbas informing him of the success of their mission.

There is no question that many who wished to go to the Cruz rally stayed at home. On the day of the rally, local authorities impeded traffic from outlying areas into Chinandega. As Cruz marched through the city, many people opened their doors, gave him the "V" for victory sign, and then ducked back into their homes to avoid the ever-present eyes of the C.D.S. One woman said she did not go to the demonstration because she lived too close to the Sandinista youth office. She told of others who received threatening phone calls. Two weeks after the demonstration, a gas station attendant in Managua told us he had gone to the rally and that three friends who had accompanied him were in jail.

As might be expected, estimates of the turnout vary. Opposition figures soared as high as 20,000; local newsmen said 7,000. Given Sandinista efforts to reduce attendance, even 7,000 seems an impressive number, especially since three months before, the F.S.L.N. only managed to get 2,500 to Chinandega for the country's principal May Day rally. NBC taped the entire Cruz demonstration. Should this tape ever be shown publicly, experts will be able to make an accurate judgment about the number of demonstrators. When I viewed the tape it was evident that these thousands of demonstrators were hardly "bourgeoisie," as the Sandinistas claimed. They were overwhelmingly workers, peasants, and young people. I learned later that workers had hired their own trucks to come from the San Antonio Refinery and from the port of Corinto. They chanted slogans like "El frente y Somoza son la misma cosa." ("The Sandinistas and Somoza are the same thing.")

When Cruz began to speak, dozens of turbas armed with sticks, stones, and machetes surrounded the field. They came in on what appeared to be army trucks chanting, "Power to the people." They proceeded to break the windows and puncture the tires of demonstrators cars. The police seemed to make no serious effort to restrain them. When the turbas attacked the demonstrators themselves, opposition youths dispersed, only to return wielding their own sticks and stones. Out numbered, the turbas were routed.

The almost complete absence of foreign and domestic press coverage enabled Sandinista officials to characterize the demonstration their own way. We encountered a Sandinista official drunk at midday on the streets of El Viejo. He told us that the demonstration had taken place at the private home of a bourgeoisie and was attended only by a handful of plutocrats. In Managua, the Sandinistas told us that there had been several hundred demonstrators. The following day the Nicaraguan press carried no mention of the events except for one photograph in the official newspaper Barricada which purported to show the turbas attacked by "fascist" demonstrators. La Prensa had devoted several articles and photographs to the demonstration and the clashes, but these were all censored, and the paper did not appear. This was the very day that Daniel Ortega had announced the lifting of press censorship.

The demonstrations for Cruz's candidacy tested the popular mood and the prospects for "the first free elections in Nicaragua," as the Sandinistas' slogan puts it. Among the conditions that Cruz and his supporters have laid down as indispensable for participation are guarantees of freedom of movement, assembly, and equal access to the press and television; sufficient time to campaign; international observers; and, most importantly, guarantees that if he won the election he would be allowed to take office. What happened at Chinandega strongly suggests that neither a genuine election nor a genuine campaign can take place.

Chinandega also exposed the Sandinistas' electoral stratagem. Their decision to hold elections in November was based on a rudimentary political calculation. They judged that the external legitimacy provided by elections would more than compensate for their internal cost. They knew that power does not often change hands in Central America through elections. Somoza's elections had proven that, and the Sandinistas are in a far better position to control elections than Somoza ever was.

Yet their calculations were wrong on two counts. First, they failed to account for the Nicaraguan people. High-level Sandinista officials to whom I have spoken seem to live, along with their international supporters, in a dream world. They deem that the "anti-imperialist sentiments" of the Nicaraguan people allow them to bear any sacrifice even when their "anti-imperialist" leaders bear none. They receive favorable reports from lower-level cadre whose jobs depends on the perception of success. The Sandinistas knew that after five years of enforced political paralysis, the opposition was poorly organized, divided, and amateurish. The spontaneous popular reception for Cruz took them by surprise. Second, they failed to recognize the degree to which they have alienated progressive opinion in Latin America and Western Europe. Cruz's recent highly successful trip to Costa Rica, Venezuela, and Colombia, and his support from European Social Democrats like Spanish Socialist Prime Minister Felipe Gonzalez, has confounded the F.S.L.N.'s electoral plans.

Thus the Sandinistas find themselves in a quandary. Will they back down and permit Cruz to run under reasonable conditions, or will they go ahead with a discredited election? Thus far at least, the Sandinistas seem unwilling to pay the price of submitting their rule to a popular test. One Sandinista official, whom I have always considered a moderate, told me privately that they would prefer a U.S. intervention because it would "vastly accelerate the Latin American revolution against U.S. imperialism." He told me that the Nicaraguan Army would immediately invade Honduras and Costa Rica and be greeted as "liberators" by the people.

One can only hope that cooler Sandinista heads will prevail. Authentic elections may be the last chance to avert full-scale civil war. If democratic channels cannot be opened, the civilian opposition will be forced to link up with the armed opposition—which is exactly what happened in the 1970s in El Salvador after fraudulent elections. The United States, which has a monstrous record in Nicaragua, can do something to help. What is needed now most urgently is a bipartisan effort in support of authentic elections in Nicaragua.

As we pulled out of Managua in the fading light of a Sunday afternoon, we found ourselves directly behind an army convoy made up of about twenty vehicles. But unlike the army convoys I have seen in El Salvador, Honduras, and elsewhere, it would not permit traffic to pass. A large vehicle with a blinking light occupied the left lane, forcing vehicles coming toward us off the road. A soldier with a machine gun was poised on the rear truck. It took us four hours to cover the fifty miles to León. It was a grueling microcosm of Nicaragua today: the Sandinistas in the "vanguard" preventing the normal flow of traffic, whether out of real fear, paranoia, or bullying. Behind them the rest of the population followed, inconvenienced, irritated, and enduring another pointless "sacrifice" for the Sandinistas' militarism. Our convenience was only four hours: the Nicaraguan people experience this twenty-four hours a day. Their patience has worn thin.

LABOR UNDER SIEGE

In the last several years, a number of union friends of mine have returned from Sandinista-sponsored tours of Nicaragua with enthusiastic reports of the achievements of the revolution. I visited Nicaragua myself this summer, meeting with members of both the official Sandinista labor federation and the independent unions. I didn't expect to discover a workers' paradise in this underdeveloped and crisis-ridden region, or to see workers running the factories. But I did hope to find signs of progress toward empowering the workers and peasants. Instead, I saw a labor movement battling a "Socialist" government which resists worker demands with tactics ranging from state-controlled unions to spurious arrests and violent goon squads.

In the 1970s labor was united against the Somoza regime, and workers expected that it would remain united to rebuild the country in the aftermath of Somoza's fall. But after assuming power, the Sandinistas sought a large measure of control over the workers by enrolling all Nicaraguan unions in the Central Sandinista de Trabajadores (C.S.T.). In 1980 the C.S.T. joined the World Federation of Trade Unions, headquartered in Prague. "The F.S.L.N. wanted to impose a central union, not build one," one opposition labor leader told me.

When centralizing efforts failed, the Sandinistas used state power to penalize unions unwilling to affiliate with them, to organize disruptive factions, and ultimately to jail opposition union leaders. I was told of death threats, beatings, police raids on union headquarters, military conscription of union dissidents, and blacklisting. Opposition leaders are now reluctant to use the recently restored right to strike for fear of being charged with "economic sabotage" and "abetting imperialism."

I talked with truckers from the port city of Corinto who had voted to disaffiliate their local from C.S.T. and to join the independent C.U.S., which is associated with the AF.L.-C.I.O. through the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Soon thereafter, the local's office was attacked by police and turbas. Later some had their drivers' licenses revoked, and a half-dozen union leaders were jailed. In another incident a leader of the other independent union, the C.T.N., said he had been beaten and his nose broken by tubas at the Managua airport in full view of military and civil police.

The Sandinistas have also alienated workers in their own unions, which has led to increasing numbers of wildcat strikes. Several years ago, when the Sandinistas nationalized the German Pomares sugar works, they ousted the independent union. Then, to ensure a docile new leadership, they stacked the vote by trucking in illiterate cane cutters. This summer workers at the refinery defied their leaders; they struck after the union allowed management to cut back worker access to the company store's superior goods and low prices.

While we were in Managua there was a wildcat sit-in at the government-owned Victoria Brewery. Truck drivers there earn 3,000 cordobas a month. Rents average 1,000 a month, and a pair of pants costs 1,000. One deliveryman told me, "We've had the same salaries for the last five years and now hunger has made us explode." The Victoria workers knew that to return to work without a contract can spell defeat. Forced to go back on the job, they effected a slowdown as a way to sustain their leverage.

The official F.S.L.N. newspaper, Barricada, carried a single article on the Victoria "Labor dispute." It quoted Sandinista union leaders as saying that they offered "full support to the workers," but also said that they were urging them to return to work immediately. In contrast, La Prensa carried a front-page picture of 200 Coca-Cola drivers parading their trucks in solidarity with the Victoria workers. I was able to confirm La Prensa's report that solidarity brigades were sent by the competing brewery Tona, La Milca fruit punch, Pepsi-Cola, and Standard Steel. Several of these unions also have announced impending strikes.

The dissident labor leaders I met were plainspoken, accustomed to dealing with concrete facts. The C.S.T. official I spoke with talked grandly about how the Sandinistas reorganized Nicaragua's tiny, undeveloped labor unions "by industrial branch." Yet he was at a loss to explain why they had abolished the Nicaraguan equivalent of the U.S. National Labor Relations Board (Tribunales de Trabajo).

He often contradicted what the workers had told me. The workers at the San Antonio sugar refinery said that they launched a wildcat strike last February to uphold a wage agreement reached between workers and management. According to the workers, the labor minister, backed by the C.S.T. leadership, disallowed the labor contract because its wages exceeded government guidelines. The C.S.T. official claimed that the labor had rejected the contract because its wages were too low, and even credited the C.S.T. with leading the strike to raise wages. He went on to dismiss the Victoria wildcatters as "backward" and "disobedient." He saw his role not as a representative of the workers, but as their "intermediary" with the employer.

Numerous dissident union leaders described their situation as closely resembling that of the Solidarity movement. One leader, comparing Nicaragua to Poland, told me: "We are both small countries and have suffered many invasions. We both experience long lines and scarcity while many of our products are shipped off to the Soviet bloc. We are Catholic countries with close ties between the unions and the church. We live under regimes where citizens can be jailed at will. And both governments brand independent unions' anti-Socialist agents of imperialism.' " Listening, I found myself wishing that some of my fellow union activists had come with me to Nicaragua. They would have been as shocked and disappointed at the repressiveness of this "government of workers and peasants" as I was.

SAM LEIKEN.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. YATRON].

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the administration covert plan and for the Hamilton substitute.

Mr. Chairman, the Hamilton substitute legitimizes our efforts to support the political aspirations of those genuinely committed to democracy in Nicaragua. This initiative prevents the United States from continuing an armed struggle which simply is not working.

I share the administration's objective with respect to preventing the establishment of a Soviet satellite in Central America. But covert aid for military purposes has not and will not achieve that objective.

Covert military assistance has not interdicted the flow of arms from Nicaragua to the armed insurgents in El Salvador. Covert aid has not terminated Cuban armed shipments to Nicaragua.

What covert aid has done is to contribute to further bloodshed and repression. Covert military assistance has not induced the Sandinistas to fulfill their promises to the Nicaraguan people. In fact, just the opposite has happened. The Sandinistas have used the threat of the Contras as a convenient mechanism to perpetuate further repression. While I do not doubt that certain elements within the Contras are committed to democracy, the evidence clearly shows that many of the insurgents have committed atrocities against innocent civilians.

A vote for the Hamilton substitute does not represent an abandonment of the Nicaraguan people in their struggle to achieve democracy and human rights. This measure coupled with our existing security policy and military presence throughout Central America represents a credible alternative to what has been a misguided policy.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge our colleagues to vote against the administration's proposal and for the Hamilton substitute.

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to indicate my support for funding for the Nicaraguan "freedom fighters" in battling the Sandinista government. My support for this effort is based, for the most part, on two points:

First, no U.S. troops should ever fight and die in Central America; and,

Second, a hostile Marxist/Communist government should not be permitted to follow on its self-professed aim of destabilizing legitimate governments throughout the region—ultimately threatening U.S. security.

First of all, some express doubt that the Sandinistas are exporting revolution to other countries in the region. A 1983 Washington Post article said:

The Sandinistas say openly the they provide moral support and "office space" to the Salvadoran guerrillas. Nicaraguan Commander Bayardo Arce, in charge of relations with other revolutionary movements, said in an interview last year (1982) that the Sandinistas had shown the Salvadoran rebels the clandestine connections and networks they used to get arms for their own insurrection.

In addition to training, the Nicaraguans give Salvadoran guerrillas money, weapons, logistics, intelligence, communications, and sanctuary. According to State and Defense Department officials, some 6,000 to 7,000 rifles and machineguns were delivered to the Salvadorans by Nicaragua. In addition, the FMLN, the Salvadoran guerrillas, have two command centers in Nicaragua, and the FMLN high command lives in Managua.

In the 1969 FSLN—Sandinista—declaration of goals, quoted in David Nolan, the Ideology of the Sandinistas and the Nicaraguan Revolution, it was stated, "We will 'struggle for a true union of the Central American peoples within one country,' beginning with support for national liberation movements in neighboring states."

Add to this the fact that if we cut off aid to the democratic forces in Central America, we will be ensuring a permanent military imbalance in the region and only contribute to the victory of totalitarian forces. Consider that over 40,000 metric tons of military hardware were delivered to Nicaragua during the first 4 years of the Sandinista government by Soviet-bloc countries. In spite of considerable U.S. support in the first years—$117 million in direct economic aid and $500 million in loans to help the Government get on its feet—the Sandinistas continued a huge military buildup—an army of regulars and irregulars totaling 111,000 men, more than 3 times as large as any other army in the region. Tell me this is a purely defensive force.

Arguments that we haven't given the Sandinistas a fair chance simply don't hold water. The aid we gave the Sandinistas was more than the aid we had given the Somoza government in the previous 20 years combined. The opposition has presented the Sandinista government with at least five separate proposals for starting a peace dialog since February of last year. Our Government has been involved in at least three separate offers for negotiations with the Sandinistas, as well, since 1981. In addition, U.S. special envoy Ambassador Harry Shlaudeman held nine separate meetings with the Nicaraguans between June and December of 1984.

The Sandinistas, however, refuse to negotiate with the opposition, even though their supporters claim that the democratically elected Government of El Salvador should negotiate with its armed opposition.

Until the Sandinistas show a sincere willingness to cease support for forces hostile to other governments in the region, the United States must be concerned with stemming the flow of Nicaraguan arms to the rebels in El Salvador.

According to article 51 of the United Nations Charter, countries have the right to individual and collective defense. Given Nicaragua's subversion of El Salvador, "the United States is entitled to respond with whatever action is necessary and proportional in order to create and sustain an effective defense. Article 51 of the U.N. Charter and Article 3 of the Rio Treaty, and Articles 21, 22, 27 and 28 of the OAS (Organization American States) Charter, make it clear that such actions in response to an armed attack are permissible * * *. "Under article 3 of the Rio Treaty, such a defensive response is obligatory. This obligation is virtually identical to the same obligation of the United States under article 5 of the NATO treaty * * *."

"Such assistance, whether it" were to "consist of U.S. * * * forces," or "whether it * * * takes the form of aid to the * * * freedom fighters "is lawful under article 51 of the U.N. Charter and article 3 of the OAS Charter," according to Law Prof. John Norton Moore, of the University of Virginia, who served as Ambassador to the Law of the Sea Treaty talks.

From 1977 to 1979, those who supported the Sandinista revolution manned the heights on "human rights," "international law," and negotiated settlements, but those same individuals have failed to demand the same standards of the current rulers in Managua. Many of those defending Nicaragua's sovereignty under international law today were demanding that we violate that sovereignty in 1977-79.

This is not the only inconsistency in the human rights debate. Many are attacking alleged atrocities committed by the Contras. Have we forgotten that more than 200,000 people fled Nicaragua during 1979-81? During the first year of their rule, the Sandinistas executed 7,884 people, according to the Nicaragua Committee of Jurists. Since 1979, 20 radio news programs have stopped broadcasting. Only one radio news program is not FSLN-controlled, but even it is heavily censored. Both TV stations and two of three major newspapers are controlled by the Sandinistas. The only independent newspaper, La Prensa, has had 50-80 percent of its published information censored. In 1982, the Government claimed a "right to detain and jail persons indefinitely without having proved that they committed a crime. The right to habeas corpus is suspended. Under the decree, strikes continue to be banned, no collective contracts may be signed, and no trade union demonstrations or public meetings are allowed." This information is courtesy the AFL-CIO Free Trade Union News.

The Nicaraguan Permanent Commission on Human Rights, which frequently criticized the Somoza regime—now in exile—has documented mass graves, unexplained deaths, widespread use of torture, illegal arrests, and jailings.

Some have charged that the Constras we are aiding are nothing more than disgruntled Somozistas. However, primary opposition leaders like Arturo Cruz, Adolfo Calero, and Eden Pastora also opposed the Somoza regime. Most have spent time in jail during the Somoza regime as a result. Though present Contra ranks remain about one-third former guardsmen, one-third of them are former Sandinistas, and one-third are recruits which had not previously been aligned with either group.

What has taken place since the United States first began support for the freedom fighters? The location of Contra forces between Honduras and the Nicaraguan border has served to deny the Sandinistas the most direct line of shipments of weapons to the guerrillas in El Salvador. The Contras have, in fact, attacked a number of staging and shipping areas, not only capturing weapons intended for El Salvador—incidentally, the source of some of these weapons?—73 percent of the captured guerrilla M-16's were traceable to American weapons left behind in Southeast Asia—but denying Salvadoran guerrillas use of those areas in the future. Key, however, is that success of Contra operations in these areas has forced the Nicaraguan Government to divert their attention from El Salvador to its own defense. Thus, a number of weapons which may have eventually been sent to El Salvador have remained in Nicaragua for use in anti-Contra operations.

Some have argued that Contra activities have prompted the Sandinista government to become more repressive, rather than encouraging more freedoms. Yet, the evidence is pointing to an increase in Sandinista willingness to negotiate and be responsive to international concerns.

As a good faith effort, the President has called upon the Contras to extend their April 20 deadline for a ceasefire until June 1, in order to allow them to enter into negotiations with the Sandinista government with the Catholic Church. This proposal has been well received by the Contra leadership and leaders in Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Colombia, even though it has been rejected by the Sandinista government.

If we don't face this responsibility today, we will have to commit far greater resources to the promised expansion of hostile forces in the future. Through all of the debate and discussion, there has been no sincere promise of a cessation of expansionist policies on the part of Nicaragua, or for that matter, on the part of Cuba or the Soviets.

When will we meet this responsibility if we do not meet it now? Of the narrow choice of policy options available to us, we could pursue:

A policy of containment, by aiding the other countries in the region. This means physically providing a great deal more military hardware to Honduras, El Salvador, and possibly Costa Rica—with a questionable chance of success; or

A policy of seeking, through pressure, to modify Sandinista behavior while helping to strengthen the political, economic and military capabilities of the countries directly threatened; or

Use of U.S. military force.

I certainly don't want to support the last option and the thought of the first option is not heartening, but promises many long years of involvement.

This is a vital strategic choice for the future of U.S. security and the future of the people of Central America to freely govern themselves.

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Chairman, today we must decide once more whether or not to financially assist the Nicaraguan Contras. We must decide, despite the fact that the Congress and the American people have repeatedly opposed American involvement in what is essentially an undeclared war on the Nicaraguan Government with which we have full diplomatic relations. We must decide, despite the fact that the American people overwhelmingly favor a diplomatic solution to the deeply rooted social and economic conflicts erupting in Central America.

The preference for a diplomatic course of action and the American people's opposition to war against Nicaragua is so clear that the administration has chosen to disguise its proposed funds for the Contras as "humanitarian aid."

But let's take a closer look at House Joint Resolution 239 which, if approved, would release the aid to the Contras. The resolution would permit the transfer of $14 million in fiscal year 1985 funds to the Contras for "supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua." The Contras' use of these funds are in no way limited by the resolution. And the funds will be given directly to the Contras, and not disbursed through an intermediary, such as the International Red Cross, which could monitor the use of this aid.

How can we be sure that this aid will be used for humanitarian purposes, as the administration alleges? If House Joint Resolution 239 is approved, we must rely on the administration's word of honor that the Contras will purchase food, medicines, and other basic, nonmilitary necessities, rather than armaments and other tools of war. We must rely on the word of an administration that has authorized, without the knowledge of the Congress, the CIA mining of Nicaragua's key ports and the creation and distribution of manuals that advocate low-level terrorism and the assassination of local Nicaraguan officials. We must rely on the administration's word that it will provide only humanitarian aid to the Contras, in spite of its declaration that it will continue to pressure the Sandinistas until they cry "uncle."

Mr. Chairman, the administration's record on aid to the Contras clearly contradicts its assertion that any aid to the rebels will not be for military purposes. Moreover, the Contras are not the type of military force to take any aid and turn it into food, clothing, and other humanitarian aid for the population in the areas under their control.

Reports from nonpartisan human rights groups such as Americas Watch document abuse after abuse of the Nicaraguan civilian population by the Contras. These abuses include the torture, mutilation, and murder of civilians and prisoners of war, even those that have been removed from combat because of wounds they have suffered. Are we to entrust our humanitarian aid to rebels that do not even recognize the most basic human rights of noncombatants?

And are we to deliver this aid to the rebel forces' leaders, many of whom are former national guardsmen under the dictatorial and repressive Somoza regime? Many of my colleagues will point out that less than 2 percent of the Contras are made up of former guardsmen, and that the bulk of the rebel fighting forces are peasants disaffected with the Sandinista regime. I do not doubt the validity of this fact, nor that it is an important signal of the unsatisfactory way in which the Sandinistas are governing Nicaragua. But this statistic conceals the important point that former guardsmen make up the large majority of the Contra leadership. For example, of the 48 positions in the rebel command of the chief Contra force, the Fuerzas Democraticas Nicaraguenses, 46 are held by former guardsmen. I find it hard to believe that these officers, so dedicated to upholding the corrupt and unjust Somoza regime, will provide Nicaragua with the democratic government which all of us so ardently desire. In short, the Contras' brutality and their links to the Somoza past demonstrate that these rebels are by no means comparable to our Founding Fathers. Mr. Speaker, we should continue to heed the American people's demand for a halt to further funding or convert assistance to the Contras.

The elimination of funding for the Contras should not imply that we support the Sandinista regime, as it is presently constituted and operates. I share my colleagues' concern about the increasingly repressive tendencies of the Sandinistas. But the roots of these tendencies are unclear to us. The Sandinistas are operating under a siege mentality. They have had to confront not only the Contra forces, but also one of the world's largest military powers, which has conducted large-scale military operations near the Nicaraguan-Honduran border, which has mined its harbors, and which has instructed Nicaraguans in the methods of terrorism and sabotage. It is important that we distinguish between Sandinista repression stemming from Marxist-Leninist dictates and repression as a response to external hostilities.

But we cannot make this distinction without diplomacy, without open communication between the United States and Nicaragua. The Contadora countries—Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Colombia—have offered their good offices to mediate and resolve the conflict in Nicaragua. But the administration has not availed itself of this opportunity. For example, when the Sandinistas accepted a draft Contadora treaty which held the potential for removing all external forces from the region and guaranteeing the principle of nonintervention on a regional basis, the United States immediately dismissed this move as propaganda and failed to further explore the possibilities of a negotiated peace.

Diplomacy will enable us to determine the sincerity of the Sandinistas in achieving a plural, democratic government that will not intervene in the affairs of its neighbors. And diplomacy is what the Barnes-Hamilton substitute offers this troubled region. It would terminate all funding for the Contras and for CIA covert operations against that country, and would provide funding for humanitarian assistance to Nicaraguan refugees, to be administered by the International Committee of the Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. Accordingly, we can evaluate the Sandinistas' claims that its restrictions on civil rights and its increasingly militarized society are the product of war, and not ideology.

At the same time, the Barnes-Hamilton substitute promotes a U.S. policy toward Nicaragua that encourages a negotiated regional settlement under the auspices of the Contadora countries and the Organization of American States. The substitute also provides $4 million toward the implementation of any agreement reached under the Contadora process.

It should be noted that this substitute does not foreclose the use of pressure on Nicaragua—the United States and its hemispheric allies can invoke trade sanctions against Nicaragua if it fails to remove foreign military advisers or restore civil liberties and press freedoms. Moreover, the President is permitted to request new aid for the Contras after October 1. Any requests would be handled in an expedited fashion, and could be evaluated in light of Sandinista responses to the termination of Contra funding and renewed diplomatic initiatives by America and the Contadora countries.

Because of the Barnes-Hamilton substitute's balance between diplomacy and pressure, because of its emphasis on multilateralism, and because of its provision for future sanctions, it has drawn widespread and bipartisan support. I urge my colleagues to support this important amendment, and steer our country away from our present militarily based approach to Nicaragua, which has produced nothing but terror, bloodshed, and oppression, and can promise nothing more. Let's give diplomacy a chance where violence has failed—vote for the Barnes-Hamilton substitute.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Chairman, the administration's proposal on Nicaraguan aid represents a deliberate attempts to mislead Congress and the American people on its intentions in the region. It is an insidious effort, Mr. Speaker, and it is time that we bare the administration's head on this issue.

The administration says the $14 million in aid will go to pay for food, medicine, and other humanitarian items for Nicaraguan Contras. But the administration's record toward Nicaragua completely and irrefutably belie any peaceful intentions. Its policy always has been one of unreasoned and open confrontation, and it is a policy that has failed and failed miserably. Indeed, it is no surprise that the President's proposal allows these funds to be used for military purposes at the end of 60 days.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the repressive and antidemocratic nature of the Sandinista government. But the administration policies, continue to backfire, galvanizing the Nicaraguan people against the United States and causing resentment toward the United States throughout the area. It is time, Mr. Speaker, that this administration work within the Contadora process, and begin addressing the crisis of poverty and economic hardship in the entire Central America region.●

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this resolution for two principal reasons. First, it is in the best interest of the United States to prevent another Russian beachhead in North America. There is no doubt in my mind that the Sandinista regime is Communist. When they and others in Nicaragua overthrew Somoza, primarily because we finally stopped supporting his dictatorial and oppressive regime, we gave them $20 million in aid. The Carter administration stopped another $75 million in aid when it became apparent they were moving toward becoming a totalitarian form of government and enlisting the aid and assistance of Russia, Cuba, and other Communist countries. I also have no doubt that if the Contra pressure is allowed to wither and die for lack of military aid, the Sandanistas will consolidate their power and with the aid of Russia, Cuba, and other Communist countries spread their Communist ideology into other Central American nations.

This brings me to my second and more important point in support for this resolution. I firmly believe the Sandinistas, with the support of Russian, Cuban, and other Communist countries, will spread their revolution to other Central American countries. And sometime in the next 3 or 4 years, this Communist revolution so very near our border will become a clear and present danger to our security. And the American people and their Government representatives will have this clear and present danger crystallize in their minds and galvanize their resolve to stop and remove this danger from our hemisphere. However, by that time, our only option will be to send American troops to Central America. This can be prevented if we aid the Nicaraguans fighting for democracy and freedom against the Communist Sandinistas. Today, I believe, we vote to stop totalitarian communism in Central America with willing, dedicated Nicaraguans or risk stopping it in the future with Americans—it is our choice.●

● Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to contribute a short note to the debate on the obligation of funds to the people of Nicaragua and against the Government of Nicaragua. For some time, I have been concerned that sending $14 million in aid to the Contras—or to the freedom fighters—will not accomplish much in the way of contributing to the prospects for peace in the region of Central America.

After meeting with President Reagan today and with President Duarte of El Salvador a week ago, I believe that we must seek the capitulation of the Ortega government through reform in Nicaragua. The Sandinistas have shown no inclination to respond to anything short of a threat of force. But a threat of force alone contributes only to prolonging the status quo in Central America—and the status quo amounts to war, declared and undeclared, with the prospect for escalation implied in each congressional action.

In any context, with or without superpowers, with or without the Monroe Doctrine and the Alliance for Progress, our aim in Congress has been to support our allies in a given region and to hope for the peaceful establishment of democratic governments. In this connection, I wish to express my hope that we will consult with other Central American governments, particularly with our neighbor Mexico, as we anticipate building a bipartisan policy toward Central America which is something more than a quick fix. We cannot, then, give up on the idea of dialog with the Ortega government, even though we may mistrust its ambitions. Nor can we tolerate the positioning of a foreign base in Nicaragua that would endanger the interests of democracies in this hemisphere. But, we must allow for a period of testing—perhaps as long as 5 to 6 months—in the interest of seeing whether or not the Sandinistas live up to their word. To date, their record in telling the truth has not been a good one. But we cannot ignore the prospects for peace in the region, and we must not convince ourselves that $14 million buys peace of mind in Central America.●

● Mr. DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, let us stop for a minute and reconsider what it is that we are debating today. In 1979, the Sandinistas came to power in Nicaragua on the promise that totalitarian rule in that country was finished. And on the promise that there would be elections, genuine nonalignment, and respect for the sovereignty of their neighbors, the Sandinistas garnered enough international support to prevail.

We believed them, Mr. Chairman, as did the Organization of American States. We believed them to the tune of $117 million in direct aid through mid-1981, aid that provided more money per Nicaraguan citizen than in any other country in the world. And because the Sandinista leadership still included internationally-respected Nicaraguan patriots in those days, we continued to deal with the Sandinistas in good faith long after their actions began to belie their words. This continued as they built in all of the repressive mechanisms of the Marxist Police State. Kangaroo courts, Mr. Chairman. Secret police informers down to the block level in each neighborhood or village. The perversion of the literacy campaign which made their educational system a mockery and a political propaganda tool.

We continued out of hope and misplaced trust well into 1982—and what did it get us? What did it get for the American States unlucky enough to be the neighbors of the new Sandinista regime? What it got us was an army in Central America, configured not for defense but for offensive warfare, of 119,000 men, over half of whom are on active duty. It got us tanks, and armored personnel carriers, and artillery and rocket launchers, and the MI-24 hind hunter-killer helicopter used by the Soviets to terrorize Afghanistan. In short, Mr. Chairman, while we and our American neighbors were telling ourselves that these were the growing pains of a latent democracy in Nicaragua, what was actually happening was the growth of a deadly malignancy. There are no moderate elements, men of good will, left as part of the Sandinista regime. They've all been forced out, Mr. Chairman, as healthy tissue is displaced by deadly cancer cells. And the analogy is the same for Nicaragua's American neighbors. The Sandinista malignancy is insinuating Marxist revolution and subversion throughout the region. The Sandinistas are proud of that, Mr. Chairman. Over and over, we have been treated to their slogan: "The Sandinista revolution knows no national boundaries. Ours is not a national revolution." They are exporting guns and revolution to their neighbors, Mr. Chairman, and more recently, illicit narcotics to the United States to help them get the hard currency to pay for revolution.

Ambassador Motley has said that the Nicaraguans do not come to the negotiating table because they admire it as a piece of furniture; they come to the negotiating table only because of the Contras. And if we are not going to provide the aid necessary for the Contras to keep military pressure on the Sandinistas, then we must convert that aid to a form which will permit the organization of an effective, legitimate political opposition internationally recognized as a counterweight to the Sandinistas. It must be an opposition which represents the true ideals of the original Nicaraguan revolution, and not the subsequent theft and perversion of that revolution by the Sandinista police state. We cannot vote today for a measure that will turn tens of thousands of freedom-loving Nicaraguans into stateless refugees, into an equivalent of the boat people of the 1970's. We cannot vote for a measure which will permanently extinguish the desire to be free on the part of the people of Nicaragua.

If we do not fashion a solution which combines effective aid to a legitimate opposition, and effective moral, political, and economic sanctions to the Sandinistas if they fail to represent the legitimate aspirations of the Nicaraguan people, then we have not only failed our American neighbors, but we have failed our constitutents.

I have grandchildren, Mr. Chairman, who are coming of age to be riflemen—infantry soldiers—and who may well end up as soldiers if we ignore the malignancy in Central America. We can talk, and posture, and fail to act until we and our neighbors run out of time, or we can do something effective there today. We have a choice. And we may not have that luxury too much longer.

In supporting the Sandinistas, I hope that no one is doing so under the illusion that it is a legitimate political party. They gain power by deceit and rule by force. Communism is not political; it is an international conspiracy, and its purpose is to rob people of their freedom and their liberty.

In 1947, President Harry Truman crafted the doctrine which bore his name, setting forth the goal of containment of communism which was then attempting, through subversion, to overthrow the Government of Greece. Fifteen years later, when the Soviet Union attempted to install missiles in Cuba, President Kennedy successfully pressed for their removal so close to our shores.

What is needed now—what is desperately needed—is a reinstatement of these two positions: That we will resist communism where it is found, and that we will employ the means available when Soviet weapons are found so close to our borders.

Thank you.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 239, to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

I also rise urging support of the amendment in the nature of a substitute which will be offered later by our distinguished colleague Congressman LEE HAMILTON.

On four previous occasions, this body has opposed, with reason, the administration's effort to impose a military solution on the people of Nicaragua. On four previous occasions this body has voted to cut off assistance to the Contras, who seek the violent overthrow of the established Government of Nicaragua.

In doing so the House of Representatives exercised considerable wisdom, restraining a policy that has escalated violence in the Central American region, strengthened militarism and reaction, and worked against the forces of democracy and pluralism, serving to isolate our Government from many of our friends in that region and the world.

What is needed is an alternative that prevents the disbursement of funds to the Contras, works toward a nonviolent resolution of the Central American conflict, and meets the basic human needs of refugees.

We will have an alternative before us that offers such a possibility after we again defeat the latest proposal of support for the Contras. This alternative comes to us through the resolution offered by our distinguished colleague Congressman MICHAEL BARNES, as it will be presented to us for debate and consideration as an amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by our valued colleague Congressman LEE HAMILTON. This substitute would provide $4 million for the implementation of a peaceful resolution in conformity with the 21 Contadora Principles if such an agreement is arrived at. Additionally, this substitute would provide $10 million in humanitarian assistance for refugees outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they are associated with the Contras. Quite importantly, this $10 million would be allocated through the International Committee for the Red Cross or the United Nations' High Commissioner for Refugees. The substitute prohibits the use of any of these funds for supplying combat units of any type and most importantly, continues indefinitely the present prohibition on funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, unless and until Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing this prohibition.

This measure also contains a number of policy recommendations encouraging a cease-fire and peace negotiations within a regional context and under the Contadora framework.

I urge my colleagues to reject House Joint Resolution 239, and any other proposal that would provide assistance to the Contras by U.S. Government agencies, and urge their support of the alternative offered in the Barnes resolution/Hamilton substitute.●

● Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Chairman, as a freshman, I gave my word to look closely at both sides of this issue and not come to a hasty decision on the matter. After reviewing the facts, however, I believe that the proper course of action is clear.

Tonight, I will be casting my vote in favor of aid to the Contras. I will do so because I view the current Sandinista Government as a direct threat to the national security of the United States.

The proximity of Nicaragua to the United States and the vital Caribbean sealanes, not to mention the Panama Canal, presents a clear and present danger to the political and economic stability of the region.

When we look at Central America today, we see President Duarte of El Salvador negotiating with the Communist opposition in his country. Meanwhile, Nicaragua and Cuba continue to ship offensive arms to the very people with whom Mr. Duarte is negotiating. Why is it not justifiable for the Sandinistas also to engage in negotiations with the opposition movement in Nicaragua?

The President is seeking to engage the Sandinistas in talks aimed at removing all Soviet, Cuban, PLO, and Eastern bloc advisers in Nicaragua. Many of my colleagues who are against the President's plan say the root cause of the problems in Nicaragua are ignorance, poverty, and disease. I could not agree more—but it is quite clear to me that the Sandinistas are using the human misery in their country to attain the legitimacy of their regime that they could not attain by holding free elections.

I believe that the inherent military pressure associated with keeping the Contra forces alive is a useful diplomatic tool in getting the Sandinistas back to the bargaining table. When will the United States draw the line? It wasn't Cuba. If not Nicaragua, where?

It is self evident that the Sandinistas are biding their time by using the Contadora process, and yes, the Western media as a smokescreen—a smokescreen for consolidating their power, and ultimately the Soviets political and military power.

I am voting for military aid because I would rather attempt to cure a cold now than arrest pneumonia later. By acting to aid the Contras, we will prevent the possible need for greater involvement later. We are being asked to provide aid to people who are willing to fight for their own freedom and self determination.●

● Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Chairman, today the House begins deliberations on whether or not to release $14 million in military aid to the Contras in Nicaragua.

Today we can help decide whether the conflict between the Contras and Sandinistas continues, or whether the United States takes a more constructive role in seeking a negotiated peace in the region.

Today we can take a step closer to achieving the goal of political and economic stability in Nicaragua by sending a signal to those countries participating in the Contadora peace process, that this government does not want to contribute to the continuing military escalation in the region and that we would like to make a positive contribution to the Contadora process.

Our covert military involvement in Nicaragua so far has been a violation of international law, morally reprehensible, and contrary to the best interests of the United States in this hemisphere.

I agree with the administration that we should support democratic changes and institutions in Nicaragua, just as we should support democratic changes in Chile and South Africa. However, I disagree on the means of achieving those democratic goals.

The alternative to a foreign policy which emphasizes military might is one which achieves peace through negotiations—negotiations with the Sandinista Government and its neighbors.

I urge my colleagues to resist the administration's public relations campaign and oppose the continuation of funding for the Contras.●

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the resolution before us today that would make available $14 million in military aid to the rebels in Nicaragua. No matter how it comes, military aid to the Contras in Nicaragua is unacceptable policy for the United States.

The administration has cried wolf on this issue too many times. I would like to ask this administration, "Where is the evidence to support your arguments?"

First, the administration sounded the alarm when it suspected that the Soviet Union was shipping Mig-21 aircraft to Central America. But, the administration has no evidence that those crates ever left the Soviet docks. Where are these Mig-21 aircraft?

Then, last year, the administration accused the Sandinistas of exporting large quantities of arms into El Salvador. But, the administration has yet to come to Congress with evidence to support this claim. Where are those shipments of arms?

And, this year, to defend this very resolution, the administration claimed the aid would be used as bargaining leverage in negotiations between the Contras and the Sandinistas. But, where are the negotiations?

And, more recently, the administration claims it has the support of Costa Rica and Colombia. But, where are those words of support from President Monge and President Betancur?

Finally, the administration claims that only one-third of the Contra command structure is former Somoza National Guardsmen. The Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus not only claims that 46 out of 48 Contra leaders are Somoza heirs, but also names them. Where are the names that support the administration's claims?

There are just too many inconsistencies in the administration's Central American policy.

All Americans want to see an end to the violence in Central America and the restoration of stability in the region. We want to be able to offer the people of Central America an alternative to totalitarian and dictatorial leadership, as well as an alternative to further military conflict. Basic liberties and human rights only mean something if they can be exercized in peace.

The Contra war against the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua does not contribute to stability in Central America. It contributes to neither peace nor democracy.

A vote against this resolution is not a vote for communism. It is a vote against a military solution to the problems in Central America. It is a vote that rejects the administration's military priorities.

Later on, we will have an opportunity to offer the people of Nicaragua and Central America a peaceful alternative. A constructive policy in Central America means support for the Contadora process. And economic development aid that will solve the indigenous economic problems in Central America that lead to political instability.

I urge my colleagues to oppose this resolution.

Thank you.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, it is time that the United States stopped trying to singlehandedly change the Government in Nicaragua through military intervention. We have learned from past experiences in Vietnam and elsewhere that this is not often a successful policy, and is one which requires tremendous American resources: a tremendous amount of money and an unacceptable loss of lives.

Aid to the Contras has been one of the most debated policies in Congress. We have thoroughly discussed the ill effects of our current policies, the "perceived" Communist threat of the Sandinista government to the United States, as well as the need for some form of pressure on the Sandinista government to improve its human rights record and to limit its power to extend revolution to other countries.

What we have learned from this debate is that the situation is not as black and white as the President portrays it. We have seen further that the President's military aid to the Contras has proved to be neither a popular, nor a very effective policy.

We have seen that military aid to the Contras has not accomplished our goals. Nor can we realistically expect a limited amount of military aid to be instrumental in the overthrow of the Sandinista government. Even if this somewhat dubious goal were achieved, what guarantee would we have that the new regime would be more democratic, that it would be more consistant with American interests, or even that it would hold the support of the Nicaraguan people?

Revolution is not new to Central America, nor will it go away through military force. The problems leading to political instability in Nicaragua, as well as in all of Central America, results mainly from poor living conditions. The area is plagued by unemployment, inflation, poverty, hunger, illiteracy, disease, and declining growth and investment. In order to find long-term solutions to regional and local unrest, we must address these sources of political instability as well.

Our military pressure on the Sandinistas, by supporting the Contras, simply justifies the militarization of Nicaragua and the oppressive measures taken by the Sandinista regime. The threat of the "Imperialistic Yankee" from the north gives the Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega a collosal enemy to rally his forces against, and helps him to generate popular support.

In addition, our unilateral military approach hurts U.S. credibility in the international community, especially when the legality of our policy is at best, questionable. Our policy of supporting the terrorist activities of the Contras underscores the international perception of the United States as an aggressive bully pursuing its own interests rather than that of a nation pursuing peaceful world coexistence.

Mr. Chairman, instead of continuing the battle over an unacceptable policy, I feel it is time to develop a better approach. President Reagan maintains that we must overthrow the Sandinista government because it is a threat to its neighbors in Central America. But the United States can no longer play the role of the big brother to all countries. Battling our own huge Federal deficit, we do not have the economic resources to undertake such a protective role on our own, nor do we have the ability to individually impose our will upon others.

If the Sandinista government is indeed considered a threat by neighboring countries in Central America, then it is the Central American community which should put pressure on Nicaragua, not just the United States.

If there is not support and participation by the countries which we are claiming to protect, then we are not acting like the big brother the United States prides herself on being, we are acting like the local big bully. This unilateral military dominated approach simply undermines the U.S. position in Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, it is time that the United States stop trying to solve the world's problems on her own and begin to recognize the ability and the clout that lies in international cooperation. In Central America, we should be encouraging multilateral approaches to resolving conflicts. A multilateral approach would promote world support and engender an international consensus.

We can begin by supporting and adhering to international agreements such as the OAS. This include following the provisions in this agreement ourselves.

We can support the efforts of the Contadora group, which is made up of the countries which are supposedly threatened.

We can require that any efforts to influence the actions of Nicaragua be supported and participated in by the Central American countries whose security is ostensibly threatened. If the decision is made that military intervention is warranted, then that should be made by the neighboring countries as a whole, and participated in by these countries.

There are several forms of "peer" pressure Central American countries can place on Nicaragua. These measures would include both "carrot and stick" approaches involving diplomatic, trade, and technology transfer, and border-related incentives and disincentives.

Mr. Chairman, the United States need not be out on a limb by herself in Nicaragua. I appeal to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to vote against and put aside the question of military aid, which has lost the support of the majority of the American people.

I am not asking us to turn our backs on Nicaragua. Instead, I am calling upon all Americans to look deeper into the dynamics of the Central American region, and to look for a more acceptable and effective U.S. policy. I am calling upon the United States to work with the countries in Central America and to support a multilateral approach to Nicaragua.

Finally, I ask that we learn from our failed policies in Nicaragua. I ask that we reassess our policy not only toward Nicaragua, but toward less developed countries [LDC's] in general. Military containment of communism simply has not worked in Third World countries. The problem which we are confronted with in Nicaragua today will be present in other countries tomorrow. We must develop a more intelligence, comprehensive approach in coping with insurgencies in LDC's. Countries in Central America, Africa, and the Middle East lack economic, political, and social infrastructures and institutions necessary for political stability. To improve United States and world security, we must explore alternatives which address the causes of instability as well as holds the support of the international community.

Mr. Chairman, Nicaragua is a good place to start.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 247, a resolution which would provide both humanitarian aid and strong support for regional peace negotiations in Central America.

The policy set forth in this resolution is to seek peace in Nicaragua and Central America through the Contadora process, while preventing the administration from continuing its covert war against Nicaragua through the Contras. This alternative lends support to regional peace efforts and gives diplomacy a chance to work while maintaining pressure on the Sandinistas to change policies that have destabilized the region.

Unlike House Joint Resolution 239, the Barnes resolution provides absolutely no funds for the Contras. Even the administration has admitted that there would be no effective controls on how the Contras used the funds, even if the President pledged that the funds would only be used for humantiarian purposes. Therefore, instead of funding the Contras and their war against Nicaragua, this resolution would place the United States on the side of the Contadora group of nations that have been working for 3 years toward a peaceful solution of the conflicts in Central America.

House Joint Resolution 247 would provide $10 million for refugee assistance in Central America, to be distributed only by the Red Cross or the United Nations refugee agency. This ensures that the Contras will not receive aid and prevents the distribution of aid by the Central Intelligence Agency, which has actively aided the Contras for years.

The Barnes resolution would also apply pressure to the Sandinista government by explicity stating that future congressional decisions on aid to the Contras, and in foreign aid to Nicaragua, will take into account the behavior of the Sandinistas. This approach makes clear congressional concern about the Sandinistas' excessively close links to Cuba and the Soviet Union, their violations of human rights and their attempts to abet unrest in the region.

President Reagan asserts that his plan of action must be followed to stem the spread of communism on our continent. I agree with him and the rest of the Nation that to sit back on our heels and watch Central America subverted to Communist influence would be a grave error in American foreign policy. However, aiding the Contras to attack Nicaragua is no way to assure political stability in the region.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly believe that if the administration was really interested in a peaceful settlement of its difference with Nicaragua, it would not be seeking funding for more war against that government, but would be supporting the efforts of the Contadora group which has produced several draft treaties on ending conflict in Central America.

I urge my colleagues to support the Barnes resolution, an alternative which serves U.S. peace and security interests in the region, and promotes political pluralism and the observance of human rights in Nicaragua.●

● Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Chairman, once again we are faced with an ultimatum from President Reagan—bow to his will and send $14 million in aid to the Contras, our so-called brothers in Nicaragua, or we will contribute, Mr. Reagan says, to Nicaragua's becoming a Communist terrorist arsenal.

Once again we are asked to deny what we hear and see and read about the atrocities committed by these brothers of ours against civilians in Nicaragua; we are asked to ignore the serious efforts by the Contadora nations to bring a true peace to the region; and we are asked to forget the history lesson taught by Vietnam—that there is no way the CIA or the American military will get just a little involved in the affairs of another nation.

Members of this body are well aware of our involvement in Nicaragua, and how the United States has continually interfered in that nation's government. For more than a century, we have involved ourselves politically, economically and militarily in the governing of that small nation.

Yet today we are asked to forget that history, and to continue along the path of imperialism by seeking to again impose our will on the Nicaraguan people and make their government "cry uncle."

In his attempts to convince Congress to go along with this plan, President Reagan has apparently decided that sleight-of-hand and mirrors will confuse the issues. First Congress was told that support for the Contras was necessary to intercept the flow of arms from Nicaragua to El Salvador. We soon found out that, in fact, no such flow existed, and that the Salvadoran rebels were getting arms from the very army they were fighting. Next Congress was told that the Contras were made up solely of disaffected peasants and farmers, and that they were led by former Sandinistas. We soon found out, in fact, the military leadership of the Contras was dominated by former Somoza national guardsmen. Congress was also told that the Contras were "the moral equivalent of our Founding Fathers," and that they were committed to democracy and human rights. We soon found out that, in fact, the Contras were terrorists, who attacked civilian populations and read CIA manuals that preach the art of assassination.

Now, in the last-ditch effort to garner support for his policy, the President has put forward the argument that the $14 million is a "bargaining chip" that the Contras must have to force the Nicaraguan Government to come to the peace table. If the Sandinistas will only accede within 60 days, the argument goes, to those talks, the $14 million will be used for the humanitarian purposes of food and health care. If they do not bargain with the terrorists, our aid can and will be used by the Contras for military purposes.

Despite these smokescreens of our real purposes in Nicaragua, it is clear that the intention of the Reagan administration is nothing short of toppling the Nicaraguan Government and replacing it with one more amenable to an imperialistic rightwing philosophy.

President Reagan says that he is concerned about the well-being of the Nicaraguan people, whom he claims are brutally repressed by the Sandinista government. Daniel Ortega, the democratically elected President of Nicaragua, has said publicly that if Mr. Reagan really wanted a restoration of political and civil rights and an end to the present state of emergency he need only stop the war. Clearly, human rights would be best served if resources now used to defend the country against terrorist attack could be made available for health care, education, and agriculture. It would seem that if Mr. Reagan were sincere about his concern for the Nicaraguan people, he would stop the aggression, and offer genuine support for the Contadora peace process.

The President has proposed a deal that gives the appearance of a commitment toward peaceful negotiations. In reality, the so-called peace proposal is a sleight of hand that would allow the administration to continue its doomed policy. What the administration does not want people to realize is that their humanitarian aid would allow the Contras to use all the money they now receive from private sources in the United States strictly for military purchases. In effect, nothing is changed, and the Contras can continue their destructive activities. The Sandinistas understood this, and were thus inclined to reject the administration's proposal, as we should.

Congress must hand the administration a new agenda in Nicaragua—one that precludes violence and aggression, and delivers a chance for peace. Let us take a lead in helping the Nicaraguan people build a life for themselves, unencumbered by the perpetual threat of an invasion. Let us work with other countries of the region, as they have asked, to begin demilitarizing the region. Let us return with a clear conscience to the framework of international law. And let us use our creativity to explore more peaceful alternatives to the present policy.●

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Chairman, it was my honor to recently travel to Nicaragua as part of a group sponsored by the Commission on United States-Central American Relations.

The Commission on United States-Central American Relations is a nongovernmental organization dedicated to improving the climate of the hemispheric relations by employing alternative U.S. policies in Central America. This commission has issued a statement concerning the Contra aid vote and its belief that the Contra Program imperils U.S. national security interests by undermining democratic institutions throughout Central America, especially in Honduras, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

I believe that it would be very beneficial for all of my colleagues to review this issue statement prior to casting their vote today. Thank you.

COMMISSION STATEMENT OPPOSING AID TO THE CONTRAS

Since its inception in 1982, the Commission on U.S.-Central American Relations, an association of citizens concerned about the direction of U.S. policy in Central America, has been deeply disturbed by the role of our government in financing, directing and otherwise aiding the guerrilla army (or "contras") fighting to overthrow the Nicaraguan government.

In April of 1983 the Commission sponsored a fact-finding delegation to Honduras and Nicaragua to investigate U.S. covert activities in the region. This group consisted of experienced and objective observers, including two current members of Congress, Reps. Berkley Bedell and Robert Torricelli. The Reagan administration was then describing the covert operation as an effort to interdict arms allegedly being supplied by the government of Nicaragua to the Salvadoran insurgents.

In a public statement released upon their return to the United States, this group concluded that "there is no doubt that our government is deeply involved in covert activities aimed at overthrowing the government of Nicaragua" and that "no convincing evidence was presented to us that significant men or materials were being sent by the Nicaraguan government to El Salvador or other countries in the area." This latter judgement was corroborated by the U.S. Embassy in Managua.

Since then the secret war against Nicaragua has grown in scope. The Reagan administration's justification for its continued support has grown increasingly broad, leading to a seemingly open-ended commitment to aid the contra army in the overthrow of Nicaragua's government. In response to a series of alarming revelations concerning CIA operations in Honduras and Nicaragua (mining of harbors, the CIA manual, contra atrocities against civilians), Congress has increasingly asserted its authority to terminate what Rep. Hamilton has termed an illegal, immoral and ineffective program.

We join with the majority of the American people and Members of Congress in condemning all U.S. efforts designed to aid the overthrow of Nicaragua's government. These actions violate the will of Congress and constitute a direct violation of Article 18 of the OAS Charter to which our nation is solemnly committed. The U.S. government's attempts to avoid Nicaragua's complaint in the International Court of Justice serve only to flout our government's violations of international law before the court of world opinion.

But above and beyond the legal aspects of this issue, we deplore these actions because they violate the moral principles of the American people. We are not a nation that condones the murder and torture of innocent civilians, which have become a common feature of the contra war that our taxes are financing. Recent press accounts provide chilling evidence that the contra war is exacting an extremely high toll in lives and suffering among the people of Nicaragua.

Further, we strongly believe that this intervention does not serve the cause of building democracy and increasing economic well-being for the people of Central America, which are the stated goals of U.S. policy. Our intervention:

Is not geared toward achieving its stated purposes of interdicting arms or pressuring the Nicaraguan government to further liberalize its internal political process.

Encourages the Nicaraguan government's reliance on Soviet Bloc economic and military assistance.

Alienates the Nicaraguan population, the majority of whom bitterly oppose our support for the contras and resent the hardships imposed by our policies.

Confirms the concerns of our Latin American allies that the U.S. is returning to its historical pattern of unilateral intervention in the internal affairs of Latin America and Caribbean nations.

Extends and regionalizes the Central American conflict by fomenting confrontation between Nicaragua and her neighbors, which have been used as forward bases from which the contra army launches attacks.

Inflames the regional conflict by extending superpower confrontation into Central America.

Threatens the future of democracy in Honduras by strengthening military and extra-legal means of policy execution, thereby undermining democratic institutions.

Imperils Costa Rica's traditional neutrality as the Reagan administration seeks to enlist that country in the destabilization of Nicaragua.

The Commission on U.S.-Central American Relations reiterates its strong support for the use of diplomatic means to resolve regional conflicts in Central America. We regret that our government has suspended bilateral talks with the Nicaraguan government, which held the potential of reducing tensions and obtaining verifiable security guarantees of mutual interest for both nations.

The contra program is fundamentally incompatible with the long term national interests of our government and those of our allies in Latin America. We thus urge the Congress to reject a resumption of contra aid, and to exercise its oversight responsibilities to assure an end to all forms of U.S. funding for the contras, whether overt, covert, direct or indirect through third parties.

● Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I am baffled and disturbed by the debate over providing aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. I am baffled because the word humanitarian, thrown into this equation by an administration bent on passing some kind of aid to the Contras, has succeeded in shifting our focus dramatically; and I am disturbed most of all because if we accept the concept of humanitarian assistance to the Contras—whether for 60 days or for 1 year, we give the President his victory—albeit watered down some—on the policy in Nicaragua. This should not be.

The central question is whether or not the United States should be supporting the Contra forces with aid. I think not. And, from what I have seen and heard over the past several weeks, I think most of my colleagues in this body think not. Is our support for the Contras any less real if we call the funds humanitarian? Of course not. Humanitarian aid is support money that has traditionally gone to feed, clothe, and sometimes house or provide medical supplies for a people in need. When we provide food, clothing and medical supplies to armies, it is called military support, not humanitarian aid. To borrow from Gertrude Stein, aid to the Contras is aid to the Contras is aid to the Contras.

If the President is committed to peace in Nicaragua, and not simply to the removal of the Sandinistas, why has he consistently rejected the Contadora initiatives? Time and again, we offer rhetorical support of that process, yet continue to fund those who seek a military solution. Why have we rejected the World Court's jurisdiction when we are the torchbearers of justice? Why have we actively mined harbors and taught terrorist tactics when we decry those actions by others around the world? Mr. Speaker, I believe the administration cannot support a real peace initiative in Nicaragua because its bottom line is not peace and self-determination. This administration wants an end to the Sandinista government, and it will change the wrapping on that package as often as is necessary to achieve that goal.

But it is simply not enough to change the wrapping. The question of U.S. support for the Contras has been and remains a fundamental choice of how best to move toward peace in that country. Let us at least be clear on that point: No matter how one feels toward the Sandinistas, no matter how strongly one feels about communism—and I share my colleagues' abhorrence of that oppressive system—our goal in Nicaragua is peace for the people of that country, and the freedom to enjoy it. Overthrowing the Sandinistas is not a plan for peace.

This administration has never put forward a peace plan for the people of Nicaragua. They have simply advocated a more and more sophisticated and costly and deadly war. We have not destroyed communism in Nicaragua; we have helped to destroy a struggling economy, we have helped destroy innocent lives, and we are on the verge of destroying those people's faith in the United States as the moral kingpin of the world.

It is our responsibility here in Congress, as the Representatives of an overwhelming number of Americans who have been flooding our offices with pleas not to continue any support of the Contras, to forge an alternative that does stand up for peace, that does throw the full weight of our democratic principles into action, that does send the signal to the people of Nicaragua that we support their quest for freedom. And what is the most promising vehicle for peace? Clearly, it is the Contadora process.

The Contadora nations, without significant backing from the United States—in fact with considerable negative reaction from us—have continued to try to address the major problems in the region, forging a peace initiative which calls for a loosening of the restrictive policies of the Sandinistas, a withdrawal of foreign advisers, and a ban on military aid to rebel groups in other countries. Right now, the Contadora nations are trying to iron out the specifics of how to implement such moves fairly—concerns raised again by our administration.

Mr. President, I appeal to you to support the peaceful, democratic process that is the Contadora initiative. I challenge you to risk a trial of that program in place of your military campaign. The money that Congress is debating can be put to good use, but let us stop this charade of promoting democracy by funding terror. In Honduras, 20,000 Nicaraguan refugees live in squalid camps, desperate for food, for medicine, and for shelter. These are the refugees that President Reagan himself called "the innocents of the war—people without politics, people who * * * are both innocents and victims." We can help these people who have been forced from their country. And while we help them, we can help forge the foundations for peace in Nicaragua by providing the means to implement a peace. Mr. Chairman, that is a humanitarian proposal, and one that we can all support.

Tonight we have the opportunity to act as defenders of freedom. Tonight we have the opportunity to stand up for the American ideal of self-determination. Tonight we have the opportunity not only to stop what is so painfully wrong, but to take action finally on a program that is strategically, legally, and morally correct. As a still relatively new Member of this body, I retain the hope that we have the strength and commitment to our ideals and our constituents to deliver an unequivocal "no" to an untenable military posture in Nicaragua. Let us start today to create a future for the people of Nicaragua, rather than destroying their past. We have the tools; I desperately hope that we also have the courage to use them wisely.●

● Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, on this day, Congress will decide what form, if any, aid to the democratic opposition in Nicaragua will take. This issue, more than any other in recent years, has garnered national and international attention amidst an unparalleled propaganda blitz of charge and countercharge.

At this time it is appropriate for the Congress to ask itself a simple question: Does the United States have any obligation to oppressed people suffering from a regime that denies them the basic freedoms and liberties that we Americans enjoy? Do we owe anything to individuals subjected to intransigent and oppressive regimes?

Some argue that we do have an obligation and that it extends the world over, regardless of where the subjected peoples reside. Others maintain that our Nation's responsibilities end at our borders—that activities outside this country are matters beyond our jurisdiction. Most of us, however, recognize that when our national security is at stake, the United States must move boldly to promote democracy and protect our vital interests.

Certain facts regarding the Sandinista rise to power provide insights as to the nature of their government. Prior to the ousting of Somoza, the Sandinistas and the other rebel forces pledged to the Organization of American States that Nicaragua would become a democratic and nonaligned government that supported open elections and a free press. On July 22, 1979, 3 days after the revolution, the first American shipment of food arrived in Nicaragua. During the first 18 months of the new government, the United States gave some $118 million in bilateral economic help, $24 million in emergency food, medical and reconstruction assistance, and endorsed $262 million in loans from multilateral lending institutions. This aid was advanced to help the fledgling government in Nicaragua attain a stable economy so fundamental to an orderly shift to a democratic and free society. Unfortunately, the Sandinista government reversed course to the radical left, ignoring their previous promises, while building a military force unmatched in the region.

In just over 5 years, the Sandinistas have realized an active duty force of approximately 62,000 persons, and a total force—including reserves and militia—that exceeds 119,000. The tank and armored personnel carrier inventory numbers 340; moreover, the addition of a radar air defense system and the Mi-24/HIND D, one of the world's most sophisticated attack helicopters, has further increased the military capability of the Sandinistas. It would be ludicrous to believe that this capability was achieved without Cuban and Soviet backing.

This unilateral military buildup has been totally out of proportion to the capabilities of Nicaragua's neighbors or to any possible foreign threat. In tanks and armored vehicles, Nicaragua surpasses all other countries of Central America combined. Costa Rica has no army per se, and relies on an essentially constabulary Civil Guard of 8,000. Honduras has a military of about 18,000—less than one-third the size of the Sandinistas' active duty forces. Clearly, the Sandinistas' buildup is consistent with any possible defensive needs of a country in that region, and it represents a powerful offensive threat to Nicaragua's neighbors.

Internally, the Sandinistas have taken steps to repress human rights and institute a police state. Both TV stations and two of three major newspapers are controlled by the Sandinistas. La Prensa, the only independent newspaper, still faces a high degree of censorship. In April 1984, the Nicaraguan bishops called for peace and national reconciliation. The Sandinistas responded by labeling the pastoral message the work of the CIA, arresting Father Pena for so-called counter-revolutionary activities, and then expelling 10 priests for allegedly violating Nicaraguan law.

Coinciding with this rise in repression has been an increase in opposition fighters seeking to direct Nicaragua toward democracy. Disillusioned by the succession of events, many opponents of General Somoza and supporters of the revolution have left the Sandinista government. The freedom fighters, or Contras, now number 15,000 and among them are former Sandinista junta members Alfonso Robelo, Arturo Cruz, and Eden Pastora.

Mr. Chairman, virtually every objective observer and my colleagues on both sides of the aisle recognize the unsavory nature of the Sandinista government. The President's proposal offers Nicaragua a credible chance for peace and self-determination while maintaining some form of pressure on the Sandinistas. The immediate precursor of the President's proposal was the Nicaraguan bishops' acceptance on March 22 of the mediation role proposed in the March 1 announcement by the internal and external democratic opposition. The opposition's call for church-sponsored dialog and a cease-fire was characterized as fair and promising by a wide spectrum of observers. The Sandinistas rejected the entire idea. Now President Reagan is asking them to reconsider and has asked us to help provide the incentive for success.

Let me remind my colleagues that the $14 million in aid is for humanitarian purposes and prohibits these funds from being used to purchase military or paramilitary materials as long as the cease-fire continues—presently designed to last until June 1, 1985.

This proposal is entirely fair and reasonable. The Sandinistas protest the war and here is an offer to stop it. How must they pay? Only by joining a process that points to the original goals of their own revolution. Think of it: An offer by the opposition to put down arms and to start about achieving the Sandinista's own early promises is dismissed as a hostile conspiracy. The hostility is clearly being instigated by the oppressive Sandinistas.

As Adolfo Calero stated so lucidly:

> We Nicaraguans see the main issue as internal—a struggle by Nicaraguans for self-determination, democracy and social justice. It is a struggle against other Nicaraguans and foreigners who * * * have imposed a tyranny on their fellow citizens with the help of the Soviet Union * * * We ask only for enough help so that we can have a reasonable, even chance in our fight for freedom.

As Members of Congress, and indeed, as American citizens, we do have a responsibility to oppressed peoples; especially to those in neighboring countries; especially to those in a country with direct access to the vital Caribbean shipping lanes; and especially to those subjected to a Soviet and Cuban supported regime openly hostile to the United States. I urge my colleagues to support the President's proposal and vote "yes" on House Joint Resolution 239.●

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

□ 2040

The CHAIRMAN. Three hundred sixty-three Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO].

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH].

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Chairman, 136 years ago, a first-term Congressman stood up in this Chamber and suggested the United States had become enmeshed in a war in Latin America—a war that had in his judgment been "unnecessarily and unconstitutionally commenced" by an American President.

That Congressman was Abraham Lincoln. He didn't win many elections in his life—partly because he was so uncompromising on issues where morality and legality intertwined.

As a Member of Congress I recognize that in foreign affairs the benefit of the doubt should be given to the President; as a Republican I believe it should be given to the leader of my party. But the issue before us today should not primarily be considered in a partisan context; nor as reflective simply of philosophical differences between Members of this body and the Executive. Fundamentally, the issue at stake is the constitutional process and the role of law, domestic as well as international.

Today, Congress faces an awkward and largely unprecedented dilemma. In the case of Vietnam, Congress abdicated to executive discretion both in the appropriations process and in the Tonkin Gulf Resolution. But in the case of Nicaragua, Congress passed a resolution, which with Presidential signature became the law of the land, specifically proscribing U.S. efforts to overthrow that government.

Now Congress is faced with the problem of responsibility. Once the executive, against congressional will, has armed and equipped rebel forces to inflict chaos in Nicaragua, is Congress obligated to continue assisting them? If it refuses, will it validly be accused of undercutting the word of the President and leaving courageous freedom fighters in an indefensible breach?

It is the view of this Member that our intervention in Nicaragua lacks a constitutional imprimatur because it lacks legislative sanction. Nevertheless, we have an American responsibility for events that our Government has precipitated.

What then should be done? In the first instance, it is imperative not to allow the decisionmaking process within the executive to force congressional complicity with dubious policy. Congress should not be railroaded by events. Neither can Congress deny responsibility for the effects of executive actions. A fine line must be walked between refusing to endorse the single-minded policy of one branch of government and the collective responsibility we must all assume for U.S.-initiated policies.

Under the circumstances it would seem that the most reasonable and compassionate approach is for Congress to authorize a significant upgrading of humanitarian assistance to all refugees in the region, regardless of the side they may have chosen in the conflict, and to funnel this assistance through the International Committee of the Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees to ensure that such assistance is not provided in such a way as to assist military units preparing for armed struggle.

The debate this evening pits those who seek to have the United States identified with interventionist policies against those who would prefer a more pristine legal neutrality. In this regard, it is my belief that every Member of this body, whether or not supportive of the notion that covert action against Nicaragua may be efficacious, should be morally incensed that the law of the land which we ourselves crafted and the law of nations as reflected in treaties and covenants to which our country is party have been so cavalierly disregarded.

Not only has U.S.-supported covert action against Nicaragua strayed beyond the bounds of U.S. law—the Boland amendment—it has struck a damaging blow to world order. International law, we are obligated to recall, explicitly prohibits the overt or covert destabilization of existing governments of whatever political stripe. Article 2.4 of the United Nations Charter states that:

> All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state . . .

In 1970, the U.N. General Assembly adopted by consensus the "Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation Among States in Accordance with the Charter of the United Nations." That declaration includes in its authoritative elaboration of the general principles contained in the U.N. Charter the following:

> . . . No State shall organize, assist, foment, finance, incite or tolerate subversive, terrorist or armed activities directed towards the violent overthrow of the regime of another State, or interfere in civil strife in another State.

Article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States [OAS] likewise states:

No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State.

Not only does it prohibit such intervention by use of armed force, but by—

. . . Any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the States or against its political, economic, and cultural elements.

The United States is a party to both of these international treaties.

Supporters of the administration's position respond to charges that U.S.-backed covert operations violate international law by arguing that these operations are undertaken for the ultimate purpose of self-defense. While there is little room for doubt that the governments of Nicaragua and Cuba are aiding the insurgents in El Salvador in their quest to overthrow the Government of that country, any right to self-defense belongs logically to the Government of El Salvador. For the United States to act in the place of El Salvador in the exercise of any right of self-defense, if such an act of becoming an alter ego in itself would be consistent with international law and the exercise of natural sovereign rights, would probably have to be at the specific and formalized request of the Government of El Salvador, and the United States could not undertake that right to any greater degree than El Salvador could. That nation would not necessarily have the right to organize and train troops in Honduras and then assist them in Nicaragua, directly or indirectly, to disrupt that political system solely as a rectifying action to prevent arms from reaching insurgents within its own borders. Under the circumstances, that kind of response might well be considered a disproportional response. It would itself probably be classified as an unlawful act.

If we were to accept the administration's thesis that our covert actions are justified by Nicaragua's support for the guerrillas in El Salvador, will we then be forced to accept, under the same rationale, future administration actions to destabilize the Cuban and/or Soviet Government for their part in aiding those rebels?

If proponents of the covert action are not arguing some vaguely defined principle of individual self-defense where the United States is concerned, but are arguing instead the principle of collective self-defense, does that right include the right to commit the prohibited acts cited earlier under the U.N. and OAS Charters? Further, if the right to collective self-defense is being asserted, why have the procedures under the Rio Treaty and the U.N. Charter not been followed?

It is important for those who would raise the argument of the principle of individual or collective self-defense under international law to review the conditions set forth in international law which are to be a guide to the exercise of that right. One of the most often cited legal references authorizing acts of self-defense is article 51 of the U.N. Charter which states that:

Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations . . .

However, the remainder of article 51, which many fail to cite in full, adds.

. . . until the Security Council has taken measures necessary to maintain international peace and security.

Article 51 goes on to mandate:

Measures taken by Members in the exercise of this right of self-defense shall be immediately reported to the Security Council . . .

If, as some argue, the covert operations against Nicaragua are legal under this article, then the remaining obligations under that article ought to be equally honored and the covert action reported to the Security Council. This has not occurred. In fact, it is Nicaragua, not the United States, which proposes Security Council intervention in this issue.

Under the OAS Charter, there are similar rights and obligations. Article 21 states that:

The American States bind themselves in their international relations not to have recourse to the use of force, except in the case of self-defense . . .

Articles 23 and 24 further mandate that all disputes arising between states in this hemisphere are to be submitted to peaceful procedures including direct negotiation, good offices, mediation, investigation and conciliation, judicial settlement, arbitration, and other means. In the event of an act of aggression committed against a state of the OAS, it is to be considered an act against all members. Such acts, it is important to note, are not limited to "armed attack" but may include any act of aggression short of armed attack, extracontinental conflicts, conflicts between two or more American states, or "any other fact or situation that might endanger the peace of America."

In the event a state is confronted with such aggression, a number of steps are to be taken under the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance of 1947 [Rio Treaty], to which the United States is a party. First, article 3 of the Rio Treaty provides that in instances of armed attack against a treaty party, all other parties may determine the measures they will take at the request of the victim to fulfill their obligation to "assist in meeting the attack in the exercise of the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense recognized by article 51 of the Charter of the United Nations." Furthermore, the Organ of Consultation, consisting of the Foreign Ministers of the states party to the treaty, is to meet immediately to examine the measures which have already been taken and to agree upon collective measures to be taken.

To date, Nicaragua has not yet undertaken a direct, armed attack on any of its neighbors although the capacity and opportunity to do so are certainly obvious. Were it to engage in such an action, however, any state which is the victim of that attack could call on other parties to the treaty, including the United States, to respond to that action and the Organ of Consultation could be convened immediately to determine what collective measures would be taken. Short of a direct armed attack, however, provisions in both the Rio Treaty and OAS Charter recognize that there may be other forms of aggression which may violate the integrity of the territory or the sovereignty or political independence of another state and thus endanger the peace of this hemisphere. In such cases, article 6 of the Rio Treaty states that:

. . . The Organ of Consultation shall meet immediately in order to agree on the measures which must be taken in case of aggression to assist the victim of the aggression or . . . the measures which should be taken for the common defense and for the maintenance of the peace and security of the Continent.

If two or more American states are engaged in conflict, the parties to the Rio Treaty are to call upon the countries involved to cease hostilities and restore matters to the status quo ante bellum. In addition, the parties to the Rio Treaty may take other measures necessary to reach a peaceful resolution of the dispute. Whether a state accepts such peaceful measures is critical in identifying who the aggressor is and in applying the agreed upon measures.

Article 8 of the Rio Treaty outlines the measures which the Organ of Consultation may decide to take under the treaty. Those actions include:

. . . Recall of chiefs of diplomatic missions; breaking of diplomatic relations; breaking of consular relations; partial or complete interruption of economic relations or of rail, sea, air, postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and radiotelephonic or radio telegraphic communications; and use of armed force.

If it is the informed judgment of the United States Government that the actions of the Nicaraguan Government pose a threat to the peace and security of this hemisphere and endanger the sovereignty and independence of neighboring states, we have a legal obligation to abide by our treaty commitments to take such matters before other parties to the OAS Charter and the 1947 Rio Treaty. The United States is not justified under any reasonable interpretation of contemporary international law to conduct a covert war to topple a government with which it maintains formal diplomatic relations. The principle of tit-for-tatism—that is, our illegal acts are justified by similar illegal acts of others—by which the administration is operating is neither good government nor a legally sanctioned rationalization for political behavior. In fact, article 14 of the OAS Charter explicitly warns against such behavior:

The right of each State to protect itself and to live its own life does not authorize it to commit unjust acts against another State.

The policy of symmetry—tit-for-tatism—thus has the effect not only of lowering us into the gutter of our enemies but of driving a stake right into the heart of international law.

Article 60 of the Vienna Convention of the Law of Treaties has been cited by some as providing a legal remedy authorizing reciprocal approaches to international law. Yet clearly this extraordinary article was designed to be a shield and not a sword. It does not provide an excuse for the commission of a mutual breach of international law or condone an action which would otherwise be in violation of any treaty. The so-called wronged party is still bound by its treaty commitments to other treaty parties as well as to the international community.

If, as publicly reported, the new legal rationale for U.S. involvement in Nicaragua is not merely to interdict arms but to pressure and disrupt that Government, then in effect the United States is violating the same international legal principles that we assert we seek to uphold. Our attempt, directly or indirectly, to affect a change in the political elements within Nicaragua would be tantamount to an unlawful intervention in that nation. Two violations of law do not make a legal right.

We all recognize that in international politics there are often imperfect alternatives, involving "no win" options. This could not be truer of the situation with which we are confronted today. But the key issue before this body is not whether a particular policy is effective, which is in serious doubt, but whether this body will demand of the executive branch an accounting for its actions under the laws of the United States which it has a constitutional duty to faithfully execute. No branch of government is above the law.

Congress is faced today with difficult choices under difficult circumstances. However, it would appear wiser to err on the side of respect for the rule of law rather than on the side of those who may pay lipservice to democracy but whose actions demonstrate a willingness to flaunt the law and to finance anarchy in foreign countries. Congress simply should not give the administration license to compound errors already made.

In this regard, administration logic has an ominously familiar ring. A phenomenon which might be described as a "domino theory of decisionmaking" confronts us today as it did not long ago in another war half a world away. One bad decision had been followed by still others, leading this Nation down the long tunnel of a counterproductive foreign entanglement. Under Presidents Kennedy, Johnson, and Nixon, the commitment of a small number of troops in Vietnam and the failed policies which followed led progressively to the commitment of greater numbers of troops and still other policies which failed to progressively greater degrees. We have an opportunity today to ensure against a repetition of that experience in Central America and to reverse the direction of U.S. policy in that region before it is too late.

While analogies to Vietnam are necessarily facile, there is one new dimension to American policy which is to some extent more ominous than that which applied to Indochina. This relates to recent administration efforts to privatize the conflict in Central America.

As a Republican, I feel compelled to note that the tradition of my party is one of constitutionalism, of law and order, of playing carefully by the rules, of not devolving too much authority to the Executive. Thus it is particularly upsetting to find a Republican administration appearing to encourage private citizens to involve themselves in the conflict in Nicaragua in violation of all traditional governmental norms of behavior.

Under vastly different geopolitical circumstances, Congress in 1794 passed the Neutrality Act to ensure that U.S. citizens did not engage in private actions abroad which could rebound to jeopardize general national security. The times may have changed, but the principle is still valid today. Citizens still carry with them an obligation not to, by their private acts, craft a foreign policy for an entire nation.

The Neutrality Act reflects the democratic premise that the United States should engage in warfare only with congressional approval. Presidential use of covert private armies undermines a view of warfare that was incorporated into the Constitution: War should be public rather than private; jointly sanctioned by the Executive and the legislature. Private actions that involve armed intervention undermine the democratic decisionmaking processes protected both by the Constitution and the Neutrality Act.

Respect for the law is at the heart of both our national tradition and the fluid contract between the Executive and legislative branches on foreign policy. But today private citizens, frustrated with the struggle between their elected representatives over Central American policy, have decided to take the law, and foreign policy, into their own hands. They have become international vigilantes, provisioners of posses accountable to no government. In so doing, they have become the international counterparts to New York's infamous subway celebrity, though the stakes for our national security are potentially much higher.

Apart from reflecting these important democratic and constitutional values, the Neutrality Act also reflects a crucial international norm. Despite the increase in violations, the prevention of covert military interventions remains an important part of the principle of territorial integrity affirmed by the United Nations and in numerous treaties to which the United States is a party. The duty of one nation to prohibit the initiation of hostile expeditions by persons within its territory against another nation has become an accepted principle of international law. It should not be thrown lightly to the winds.

The difficulty of the lack of state control over private expeditions is as clear today as it was in the 1800's. The Bay of Pigs operation demonstrated that exile groups are extremely difficult to control. Similarly, as in the Nicaraguan situation where a regional peacekeeping negotiation is underway under the leadership of the Contadora group, the use of private armies makes attempts to terminate hostilities extremely problematic. Troops under Presidential command, as was the case in Vietnam, are clearly preferable to private armies precisely because they are state led and politically accountable.

For decades there has been debate about whether the Untied States should play the role of policeman for the world, with some arguing that it is a chore for which we lack either a legal imprimatur or adequate resources to undertake. But a new dimension to this debate is implicit in the administration's privatization of the war in Latin America. The administration seems to be suggesting that not only will we play the role of world policeman, but rather than enforcing the law, the interventionist cops American citizens are encouraged to support are themselves above the law.

From a policy perspective, the administration is today in the ironic position of standing foursquarely in El Salvador against forces which are armed and financed from abroad who would shoot their way into power. In Nicaragua, on the other hand, it is standing with such forces; American citizens, following the precedent of their Government, have become financiers of anarchy.

In embracing these tit-for-tat policies, we have lowered ourselves into the gutter with the violence-prone revolutionaries we so loudly condemn and in the process have undercut the moral imprimatur upon which U.S. policy in the region must be based. Subversion to halt subversion, terrorism to stop terrorism, is of dubious legal or moral validity. As profoundly, this state-sponsored terrorism appears not only to be counterproductive in the region, but of such a nature to spark a general breakdown in international order. The conduct of foreign affairs is always controversial, but seldom have both our ideals and our actions been so thoroughly at odds.

The history of the 20th century demonstrates that viable and deeply rooted indigenous democratic institutions cannot be easily built by outside military intervention. The historical analogies offered by the sorry debacle at the Bay of Pigs in 1961 and the CIA overthrow of the Arbenz regime in Guatemala in 1954 indicate both the likelihood of failure as well as the long-term counterproductive effects of any short-term successes. The era of great power interventionism in Central America policy may not have been entirely eclipsed on the clock of history, but practical considerations of national self-interest would seem to argue against continued U.S. support for the Contras in their secret war.

It is difficult to comprehend what practical benefit the administration believes it will gain by identifying with the ex-Somocistas who just 4 short years ago lost a massively popular revolution. It is not difficult to anticipate, however, the likely price the United States will pay in the future for such an association with allies of a despised dictator. The energies of nationalism, which too many confuse exclusively with the zeal of Marxism, are easily mobilized to the advantage of the Sandinista regime. Portraying the insurgents as agents of Yankee imperialism serves to consolidate the undeserved and unwarranted power of a few. It helps vindicate repressive internal policies and pro-Soviet and pro-Cuban external ones. Just as the Bay of Pigs operation helped consolidate Castro's brand of socialism, so Contra efforts, despite the courage implied, are likely in the final measure to prove counterproductive.

There is an apocryphal story that dated back to the Kennedy administration that deserves attention today. The story has it that in the Israeli Knesset a member suggested that Israel's economic policies could be righted simply by declaring war on the United States. After 2 days of conflict, he conjectured, the white flag could be raised and Israel would immediately become entitled to massive foreign aid. In rebuttal, a colleague then inquired: What if we win?

The point of the story is that even if one presumes a Contra victory—which few strategic analysts suggest is likely—the aftereffects would almost certainly include a continued bloody civil war and the transformation of a small pacific country into a violence-ridden republic. What moral right do we have to impose such a future on the people of Nicaragua and potentially as well on her neighboring states? Can we be confident that the objectives we and so many concerned citizens of Nicaragua wish to achieve are not more likely to be obtained under conditions of peace rather than war?

As a visitor to the Nicaraguan border 2 years ago, I can attest to the effect which the paramilitary operations are having on innocent civilians, victimized by the violence spawned by the military mobilization of the Contras. Priests in the region tell visitors of the kidnapings and frequent killings. The inescapable and ugly reality is that the poverty-stricken masses of rural Nicaragua are being treated as pawns in an East-West conflict they hardly understand. If, as the administration argues, it is not supporting the violent overthrow of the Sandinista government, one can only conclude that much of the violence this Congress is financing is violence without a purpose. The United States has become a rebel without a cause.

The most fundamental issues of world politics are, in the first instance, how we contain and constrain weapons of mass destruction and, in the second, how we can best advance the rule of law. To refuse to submit disputes to the World Court and abide by arbitration decisions of that body is to deny our heritage.

It is difficult not to conclude that our foreign policy is becoming increasingly, elitist, if not authoritarian. A bipartisan foreign policy can only be established with bi-institutional sanction. On trial in this country at this time is not only a particular policy but the Constitution itself.

Two and a half millenia ago in a chronicle of the Peloponnesian War, Thucydides recorded how the Athenian assembly voted to send by ship a force to conquer the island of Melos whose people declared they wanted to remain neutral in the great struggle of the Greek age. The day after the fleet was ordered to sail, the assembly reconsidered and a vessel was ordered to convey new orders of restraint. Melos received a reprieve.

Thirty years later the same issue was revisited. This time the order was not reconsidered and Athenian forces landed on Melos, killing the males and enslaving the females of the island.

Thucydides' account was intended to portray the flowering and then the decay of Athenian democracy. Today America stands as the Athens of our time; the Soviet Union, an ideologically more rigid Sparta. The question we must ask ourselves, as our democratic forefathers did 2,500 years ago, is whether it is possible to respect the right of a small country to self-determination even if it implies living with a government in our region which articulates a philosophy repugnant to our own?

It would be the hope of this Member that in a world far more complex than that confronted by prenuclear and pregunpowder Athenians that our ships will be recalled, that Periclean democracy can be revisited in these halls in this century.

What this country lacks at this time is not just a sense of the importance of law, of playing by the rules of the game, but a sense of history. Nicaragua, after all, is less strategically consequential to the United States than Melos was to Athens. The Constitution is more important than the President; the rule of law more valuable than any short-term military victory that might be achieved in a small Central American republic.

A constitutional crisis has been precipitated. Let's resolve it in a manner consistent with our heritage and support humanitarian rather than military aid in the region.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this issue of Nicaragua is so difficult because there are no clear-cut solutions. I became involved in this issue for two reasons. No. 1, I truly believe that our major foreign policy opportunities and threats in the near future lie in Mexico and in Central America.

No. 2, 3 weeks ago I headed a delegation of U.S. observers looking at the election in El Salvador. In that country, democratic institutions are in fact growing. They are actually beginning to work and to take hold. Our policies in Nicaragua are not that clear cut. When we returned from El Salvador, I thought about this week's debate and the option was that we would either spend $14 million in military assistance to the Nicaraguan Contras or we would do nothing and walk away. Neither one of those options were acceptable to me.

For myself and a number of other moderates in both parties, we felt a middle course was in order. That is when we set about under the leadership of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] to work out a middle-course alternative, an alternative that denied military assistance for the rest of this fiscal year, an alternative that primarily gave humanitarian assistance, administered through the Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

We had two goals in mind. No. 1, to have an immediate cease-fire as quickly as possible.

No. 2, to get all the warring factions to reenter a dialog and to get them back to a conference table. To achieve those twin goals, we felt it was necessary to have a series of incentives and disincentives and to set forth some measurement so that the Congress and the President could let the American people know whether progress was being made toward peace and democracy.

I have had some experience in another administration in trying to build support for policies using a military option, that in Vietnam. One thing is certain. They cannot be successful. A military option cannot be successful without the support of the American people and the American people do not suport the military use of pressure in Nicaragua today. So we have to let the American people know how progress and if progress is being made.

The incentives are that Congress will revisit this question under the Hamilton alternative and if progress is being made toward peace and toward democracy in Nicaragua, we will consider as additional assistance, economic assistance to build that country, agricultural assistance, technical assistance, Peace Corps, and the like and if progress is not made the President will report in the new fiscal year to the Congress on the same fast-track procedure that we are dealing with today and this whole question of aid will be revisited.

Now, let there be no mistake. We do not support, we flatly oppose the Sandinista government's repression of freedoms, its military ties with Cuba and the Soviet Union, and its export of war to its neighbors.

In the Hamilton alternative, these measurements of progress away from these things we oppose and toward peace and democracy are clearly set forth so that when we visit this question again we will be able to determine with some accuracy whether or not the incentives or the disincentives ought to be used.

Lastly, our colleague in the other body, the senior Senator from Georgia, made a speech in which he said we must change our policy toward Nicaragua. We must change, make a change that will move diplomatic pressure for peace to the front burner and move military pressure to the back burner, but keep both on the stove. That essentially is what we are attempting to do through this middle course, to give diplomatic pressure an opportunity to work toward peace, toward lasting friendship between the people of Nicaragua and the United States.

I believe we have a great opportunity there and we can be successful if the United States will present a set of policies that are viewed in Nicaragua and throughout Central America as a promoter of peace and not a purveyor of war.

I urge support for the Hamilton alternative.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] that he has 20 minutes left and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 21½ minutes left.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, at this time it is my pleasure to yield 7 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN].

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCAIN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, 23 years ago President Kennedy felt so strongly about the threat of Soviet military intrusion in the Western Hemisphere that he took this Nation to the very brink of war. President Kennedy blockaded Cuba, and turned away Soviet ships carrying missiles to a Cuban base just 90 miles from the Florida coast.

I applauded that action then, and today I rise to ask this Congress to support President Reagan's strong position to again guard against an invidious Soviet presence in Nicaragua.

The National Bipartisan Commission on Central America clearly showed us that Cuba and the Soviet Union are exploiting the economic and social injustices which have faced this region for decades. This is the same type of collaboration which brought Marxists to power in Angola in 1975, and to Ethiopia in 1977.

The Sandinista's successful opposition to Somoza focused on repression of the press, lack of fair elections, the repression and murder of political opponents, and the political uses of the Nicaraguan Army. As we now approach the sixth anniversary of the Sandinista takeover of Nicaragua, the opponents of the Sandinista dictatorship focus their complaints on the same repressions that the Sandinistas pledged to resolve by their overthrow of Somoza.

In 1979 the Sandinistas were praised for liberating the Nicaraguan people from a repressive regime, but during the last 6 years we have watched the Sandinistas systematically reject the ideology which brought them their original populist support. Censorship of the press, imprisonment, and murder of political opponents, an unprecedented buildup of the Sandinista army, and the meaningless elections held last year prove that the Sandinistas are rapidly gaining totalitarian control over the people of Nicaragua.

The Soviet Union has given the Sandinista army one-half a billion dollars in military hardware in the last 5 years to support this repressive regime. Today we are being asked to release $14 million in aid already appropriated for the Contras.

I submit that this is a ridiculously low price to pay to close the Soviet door to the Western Hemisphere which was propped open by the Sandinistas in 1979. It is therefore my intention to support this resolution which is clearly beneficial to the national defense of this Nation and therefore consistent with our best interests.

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. Chairman, four times today during debate which I have observed most of the day, a good and honorable military officer, General Gorman, was quoted by those who were opposing the resolution before us by stating that he said that $14 million would not have an impact on events in Nicaragua. We received a phone call from General Gorman. He greatly resents that distortion of his remarks and he says, and I quote:

> Adequately supporting the Nicaraguan resistance forces can indeed bring pressure to achieve changes for democracy that they seek. Without U.S. support the freedom movement in Nicaragua is doomed.

That is the full quote that I just received from Mr. Gorman. I think he and the rest of us would appreciate very much him not being quoted out of context in the course of this debate.

I am also very interested to hear the continuous lessons from Vietnam and Indochina that are usually quoted from this side. Though I do not agree with those lessons as they have been enunciated, I also feel that is well to view our activities and the vote we are about to take in light of those lessons.

One relevant lesson to this debate is that in the final analysis the people must wage their own war, must gain their own freedom and must be willing to fight to preserve that freedom. There is no better example of that than what has taken place in El Salvador. Under the leadership of Jose Napoleon Duarte the people of El Salvador, with our help, have installed a pluralistic and indeed free society.

Tonight and tomorrow we will decide whether to aid another group of people who are willing to undertake this struggle. Indeed, we are making a decision critical to the existence of the democratic forces within Nicaragua. Make no mistake about it, this decision will have an impact well beyond the boundaries of Nicaragua.

We are being watched by all of Central America and the Caribbean. We are being watched in Thailand and Pakistan and Japan and West Germany, and most of all we are being watched in Moscow and in Havana.

Many of my colleagues have asked why should we involve ourselves in Nicaragua. They ask why do we fear an impoverished nation with an economy near collapse.

I believe they ask the wrong question. The question should be why not act to further the cause of freedom. The longer we delay the higher the cost.

Those who oppose personal freedoms, those who support the supremacy of the state over the individual, will only gain in strength and influence.

Last week in the Western Hemisphere Subcommittee hearings on Nicaragua I heard a number of individuals state that seriously we must give the Sandinistas more time, time to reform their behavior, time to fulfill the promises they made to the OAS and to their own people. And if the Sandinistas fail to reform, we can then contemplate serious actions against them.

There were two courses of action that I heard. One, trade embargo and economic sanctions. There is no time in history where trade embargoes and economic sanctions as instruments of foreign policy have been successfully used.

The other one, and greatly more alarming to me, by certain people who are much more liberal than I am, was that we can always impose a naval blockade such as we imposed on Cuba in 1962.

A showdown on the high seas between the Soviet Navy and our own naval forces is a degree of brinksmanship which I do not want and I do not believe anyone in this body seeks. That, my friends, is a policy that we cannot follow and we cannot reach that point.

If we do not provide the aid to the democratic forces that we are considering tonight, we are going to be faced with two situations: a Hobson's choice which I think is untenable. One, a Cuba on the mainland of Central America, which we will have to, of course, accommodate for all of the problems and the challenges that that provides us; or the direct involvement of U.S. military troops.

I do not like either option. I do not believe we should have to face those conditions.

While some of my colleagues agree with my statements, they do not find the so-called Contras worthy of our support. They decry the human rights situation, they talk of the instability that the Contras create in the neighboring countries.

While these are valid concerns, I am troubled by certain questions. Do we really believe that the end of the democratic forces within Nicaragua and the consolidation of the Marxist Sandinista regime will improve the human rights situation? Do we really believe that the end of the Contras will result in more stability and less insurgency in El Salvador, Honduras, or Costa Rica? What evidence exists in the annals of history to support an affirmative answer to those questions?

Here I believe our experience in Indochina is illuminating. Many claim if we only end our military aid to the region and its corrupt governments, the result would be peace and a prosperous future.

One and one-half million Vietnamese have fled, 3 million Cambodians never had the chance to flee, and the suffering goes on. To these people, talk of human rights is nothing but a cruel joke.

Finally, there are still others in Congress who believe that the Contras deserve a form of assistance but it should be channeled through some international group known for its benevolence or opposition to force such as the Hamilton amendment.

Whatever the noble intention of these proposals, the result is the same. The democratic forces will eventually cease to exist. They will become the boat people of Central America, fleeing to other countries including the United States seeking refuge. They will lose their ability to effect any positive change. Their hopes of a pluralistic society, freedom of the press and religion, will become nothing more than a distant vision.

Mr. Chairman, I find it very regrettable that this issue has become so highly partisan, that opposition to the President's Central American policy has become a litmus test for many Members of this body. For many reasons, the American people turned their backs on Vietnam, and those who were responsible for our failure were not held accountable. This time the American people will not be able to turn their backs on American policy failure. The blame will rest with those whose action causes failure.

In the last analysis we must all live with the decisions we make and our failure to properly influence events. However, it is our children who will endure the consequences of these actions.

I urge this body to support a policy which will sustain pressure on both the Sandinistas and the Contras, call for a cease-fire, mediation, the remaining of President Ortega in place, and bring this unhappy tragedy and unhappy chapter to a rapid and peaceful solution.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, in the years I have served in the Congress, rarely have I encountered an issue which so divides us. In recent months, we all have had the opportunity to meet with leaders of the military and political opposition to the Sandinistas, Nicaraguan businessmen and exiles, as well as Sandinista leaders. We have had ample opportunity to be briefed by our State Department and intelligence sources. The American people are also divided. On one hand are those who view current policy as inconsistent with our traditions and our mission of encouraging a more just and stable world. On the other hand are those who view our support for the Contras as a necessary countermove to Soviet and Cuban infiltration into Central America.

Mr. Chairman, essentially the Congress, by resolution at the conclusion of this debate, will express American policy in Central America, and particularly toward Nicaragua. The elements of such a policy expression, I submit: First, recognizes reality; second, advances U.S. self-interest in the stability and security of the region; and third, promotes Democratic institutions and self-determination for the peoples of the countries in Central America.

The reality of the present regime in Nicaragua is that it is repressive internally and supports insurgency against the legitimate Government of El Salvador. The reality is that the Sandinistas have made a mockery of the promise of the revolution of 1979 and are perceived by their neighbors as a force of subversion, and even military threat.

United States self-interest is in regional stability and security, advancing a cease-fire and peace negotiations, nurturing democratic institutions, ending human rights violations, and the departure of foreign military advisers and of international terrorists.

Promoting self-determination cannot be achieved by suppression of individual liberties, suppression of political expression, suppression of freedom of worship, and suppression of the independence of the media. Self-determination is promoted by the free expression of political views. To achieve this, our support for the political resistance to the Sandinistas should not be doubted.

Mr. Chairman, the issue before the Congress is not these policy goals, for they reflect American values and tradition. They are within our legitimate interest and in accordance with principles of international law. Rather, at issue is the means to achieve these objectives.

I submit these policy goals are embodied in the Hamilton or bipartisan alternative.

To date, the means to implement this policy has been to finance and support military operations by those opposing the Sandinistas. If justified on the basis of arms interdiction, it has failed. If justified by a reduction in Soviet and Cuban influence or a military buildup in Nicaragua, it has failed. It has also placed the United States in the uncharacteristic and unfortunate posture of violating international law. It clearly is in violation of our treaty obligations, and I fear, diminishes our claim to leadership of the free world.

The bipartisan alternative offers another route. It seeks to encourage a cease-fire and negotiations. It squarely puts the Congress in support of the Contadora process as an appropriate framework for achieving peace and security in the region. What are some of the components of this framework?

They are the observance of the principles of international law that regulates relations among States. A few of these are the right of free determination of a people, nonintervention, a peaceful settlement of controversies, respect for territorial integrity, pluralism, the observance and encouragement of human rights, and the proscription of terrorism and subversion. These principles parallel the self-interest of the United States. The moneys allocated for expenses arising from implementation of an agreement based on Contadora principles include peacekeeping, verification and monitoring systems.

The bipartisan alternative, in clear terms, spells out the objectives of our policy goals in Nicaragua: First the removal of foreign military advisers; second the end of Sandinista support for insurgencies; third the restoration of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and independence of the media; and fourth, progress toward a pluralistic democratic system.

Our alternative calls on the Sandinistas to shape up. It calls on the United States through appropriate organizations to seek to maintain multilateral pressure on Nicaragua to address our concerns. It states clearly our disposition to support sanctions adopted by such organizations.

Appropriately, this resolution for the Congress itself to monitor the behavior of all combatants. It makes clear that in 5 months we expect to see our concerns addressed. It affirms congressional readiness to wield sanctions: economic, diplomatic, political—yes, even military—if Managua fails during this period to enter a negotiating process and make progress toward these goals.

There should be no doubt but that the legitimate security interests of the United States will not permit foreign military bases in Central America, the presence of foreign military advisers, nor the exportation of the means or philosophy of an antidemocratic revolution.

The President's reports required by this resolution will describe actions by the Sandinistas and by groups opposing that government by armed force, which have contributed to or hindered efforts toward peace and democratic institutions. There are many options available to the United States—a partial or full economic embargo, seeking the cooperation of multilateral organizations to reduce or deny aid or credit, and a break in diplomatic relations.

It is significant that the second alternative to be offered this body calls for a trade embargo. This certainly is our most important economic option as the United States is Nicaragua's largest trading partner. The bipartisan alternative, however, goes further, much further. It leaves our options open. Our response can be flexible, allowing Congress to decide at a later date what degree of severity is warranted.

If it is determined by the Congress that progress toward peace and the development of democratic institutions in Nicaragua is being made, the resolution embraces the traditional American role of a willing neighbor and valuable friend.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the acceptance of this policy alternative as a means by which we can implement a policy most consistent with our Nation's values and traditions.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the chairman.

Mr. Chairman, listening to the debate today, I would say that many in America are frozen in a world growing smaller, and more dangerous, and demanding action, we are frozen somewhere between Cuba and Vietnam. In Cuba, we were shocked by the turnabout of Castro and frightened by the might of the Soviet Union and we asked ourselves the question: Did we do enough? In Vietnam, we were pained to the core by the death and defeat and we asked ourselves did we do too much? Between the extremes of too little and too much we need a plan to plant democracy on the barren soils of inexperience and on the rocky shores of Third World poverty.

Frankly, I am tired of the temptation of having to embrace dictatorships on the right because they are anti-Communist dictatorships of the left; so I voted against Chile yesterday. But is there nothing in between? For it is in the in between that we will cultivate democracy and it will not be easy. It is in between that there are no easy answers, no blacks, no whites, just grays, and browns, and more gray. No easy answer.

For example, one Member today rose and said that we have no right to interfere in the affairs of another country. Yet this same Member supports strong measures of economic sanctions against the racist Government of South Africa. Different, he will say; but it is the same. No easy answers.

Another Member rose and said that he could not support the Contras because they were thugs, Somoza's men in Contra gear. Now some are, but not in the main. In the main is it not true. The vast majority of the Contra leaders fought on the side of the Sandinistas against Somoza and were then betrayed. Oh, they are warriors and they are not perfect but talk with the Suma and the Roma Indians, and talk with the Miskitos, and talk with Steadman Fagoth, and compare their dreams with the realities of the Sandinistas and see who comes closest to our dreams of middle-ground freedom. The Contras do. No easy answers but we must choose. We cannot be 100-percent certain but we must stand somewhere or not stand at all.

On this issue I stand with the President. As long as he continues to pressure the Sandinistas to stop exporting revolution to their neighbors, as long as he continues to pressure the Sandinistas to eliminate offensive military weapons, to pressure the Sandinistas to begin a meaningful dialog with the freedom fighters about power sharing. In my opinion the best way of maximizing the pressure is a combination of military and economic aid for the Contras coupled with economic sanctions on Nicaragua.

I feel that we should stand with the freedom fighters in their war until the Sandinistas agree that they will talk to the Contras in peace.

Unfortunately, the combination of military and economic package is not to be voted on. Instead we have three relatively weak propositions of which we must take the best.

On the first vote, minimum military assistance to the Contras, it is a moot point. It is dead. The President buried it days ago.

The only reason, in my opinion, that we will make the first vote is to embarrass the President. My party, the party, which, during the Lebanon fiasco, said that in foreign policy matters partisan politics stops at the water's edge; my party, of which I am usually proud, in my opinion will take a cheap, gratuitous, unnecessary, partisan, counterproductive slap at the President.

I stand with the President when he is right.

On this issue the President is imperfect in his approach, but closer to the truth than his critics.

You know, I disagreed with the President about Lebanon. The marines were the target, not policemen; they were sitting ducks, not eagles. We brought them home.

I disagree with the President on his South African policy. Economic pressure on South Africa, a nation that treats human beings like animals, is long overdue. I disagree with the President on the price of reconciliation with West Germany. My God, even inadvertent recognition of SS honor is too high a price to pay.

But I stand with him in his pressure on the Sandinistas.

On the first vote I will not slap the President. I will stand with him.

The vote on Hamilton is an interesting one, because the resolution does nothing. It huffs, it puffs, but nothing happens.

We pay people to leave Nicaragua, we threaten pressure—oh, we are tough—finally, it is the ultimate copout. On the battlefield of freedom it is the old "check's in the mail speech."

Finally, we will vote for Michel. Not perfect, not enough, but at least it gives flexibility to the President's methodology, $14 million in aid to the Contras, and keeps pressure on the Sandinistas.

We could do much more. We should do no less. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces that the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] has 14 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 8½ minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO].

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I think my colleagues on the Committee on Foreign Affairs on both sides of the aisle would agree that many of us have been trying over the last couple of years to find bipartisan answers to the crisis that our hemisphere confronts in Central America.

One of my frustrations tonight—really, it is sort of a sense of sadness tonight, is that we continued to be struck with this issue on which we struggle still to find an answer around which we can develop a consensus.

On a lot of other issues, we have been coming together in ways that might not have been thought possible even 1 year or 18 months ago. The election of President Duarte in Salvador; now the fact that the Christian Democrats have 34 seats in the 60-seat assembly in Salvador I think makes it much more possible for us to find a bipartisan approach to U.S. policy with respect to El Salvador.

We did not see it last night on the vote on Chile, but I think even on Chile, there has been some movement in the administration that some of us who have been very critical of the administration's approach to Chile can support.

On a whole range of issues in our hemisphere, we have been able to find much more of a bipartisan policy than ever would have been thought possible even 12, 18 months ago.

But on this one issue of U.S. support for the groups fighting to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua, we have not been able, as yet, to find a bipartisan approach.

It was in that spirit, I think a very sincere spirit, a sincere desire to try to find a bipartisan approach to what is a very difficult and important issue, that Chairman HAMILTON of the Intelligence Committee, Chairman JONES, a number of Members on the other side of the aisle; Mr. FISH, Mr. ZSCHAU, Mr. LEACH, Mr. GRADISON, and I sat down and tried to come out with a different approach; one that is not a compromise so much as a different approach, one that we hope could bring together Members from both sides of the aisle in support of a policy that could unite the American people.

Why did we feel that the current policy is not one that is likely to achieve the goals that we all have? Well, one thing, we looked at what our Latin neighbors, the people who have most at stake in this, were telling us.

When President Reagan unveiled his initiative a couple weeks ago, it was said that the leadership of the Contadora nations supported his initiative.

Well, then we learned that the Government of Mexico does not support it. In fact, the President of Mexico issued a statement saying specifically he could not endorse the President's proposal.

We learned that the Government of Venezuela does not support it. The Government of Venezuela was forced to issue statements indicating they did not support it.

We learned that the Government of Panama does not support it. The President of Panama said he believes that the President's approach is in violation of international law. And we learned that the Government of Colombia does not support it; the President of Colombia who had been cited as a supporter of the President's initiative said it is not a peace proposal; it is a preparation for war.

We were told that His Holiness, the Pope, supports the President's initiative and supports all of his efforts in Central America and the Vatican had to take the rather unusual step of issuing a formal statement repudiating that and saying that that is not the case.

We were told that the President of Costa Rica, President Monge, supports President Reagan's initiative, and I have just received a letter from the Embassy of Costa Rica, including a statement issued by President Monge of Costa Rica just 5 days ago, in San Jose, Costa Rica, in which he said in response to the question: Would you support an action in which those $14 million were to be given to the insurgents for war purposes in Nicaragua?

President Monge of Costa Rica responded:

No, I could not support such an action contrary in nature to the neutrality of Costa Rica. I could not support this type of aid to the insurgents.

Well, why is it, why is it that the President of Colombia, the President of Costa Rica, the President of Venezuela, the President of Panama, why is it that these Democrats in our own hemisphere do not support this approach?

Is it because as we have been told all day, that they want to see the consolidation of a Marxist-Leninist dictatorship in Nicaragua? Is it because they want to see communism spread throughout our hemisphere?

Of course not. These are Democrats who are just as concerned as anybody in this body; maybe more, because they are closer to it than we are, about what might be happening in Nicaragua, and they are not blind to what is happening in Nicaragua. They know that is happening in Nicaragua. They have been there more than any of us. They are closer to it than any of us.

Why is it that they are opposed to what we are being asked to vote for tonight? Which is $14 million in military assistance to the Contras fighting in Nicaragua.

They will argue, as President Betancur did when he was here just a couple of weeks ago and he met with members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, they will argue as the President of Argentina did when he stood at that microphone and spoke to a joint session of the Congress just 3 or 4 weeks ago, they will argue that there is a better way to deal with the challenge that we all recognize is there.

If they were here tonight, if the democratically elected presidents of the democracies of Latin America were standing here in the well tonight, they would plead with all of us to vote against this military approach, and they would plead with us to give their effort an opportunity to work.

They say—and they have said it to many of us in this room, they say that when the United States holds a gun against the head of the Sandinistas and says 'Cry uncle or we'll shoot," there is no better way to assure that the Sandinistas will not do what we all want them to do.

They say, allow us the opportunity; that is the Contadora nations, allow us the opportunity to bring pressures from the Latin neighbors on Nicaragua to achieve these goals.

That is the argument they make to us. Tonight, at this very moment, there are more than 100 Latin American diplomats working on the Contadora effort to try to find peaceful answers in Central America, and to try to bring pluralism and democracy to all of the countries of Central America.

What we who are opposed to this military approach now are saying is, why not give them some time to see if this thing can play out and work? They say it can. President Betancur told us he is very optimistic about the Contadora process succeeding in achieving the goals that we all want.

Well, you can say, "I do not think it will work, I think it is better for us to engage in a military intervention in Nicaragua despite the fact that we all recognize the problems with that."

Well, that option is not going to go away. That option is going to be there 3 months from now, 6 months from now, a year from now. The United States gives up none of its alternatives if it gives peace an opportunity to work as our neighbors are asking us to do.

It seems to me it is a very simple choice tonight. Do we vote to continue a program which our neighbors tell us is counterproductive, will not achieve the goal we want, in fact will make it almost impossible to achieve, given the historical context in which it happens? if you were a Nicaraguan and you were being told you have got to change your form of government or the United States is going to change it for you, given what your nation has been through—the United States has intervened in Nicaragua, as I understand it, 12 times, historically—given what your nation has been through, and given what you went through to overthrow the United States-imposed Somoza dictatorship, I do not think there is a stronger argument you could hear for maintaining what you are doing and refusing to change.

So let us take the opportunity that we have tonight to do what we are being asked to do by our friends, the Democratic friends in Latin America, and that is, let us give them a chance to make their initiative work. It is a Latin initiative. And if ultimately it is necessary to take military force—and that is not ruled out, that option is always there, it is there under the Rio Treaty, it is there under the charter of the OAS—if ultimately it is necessary to use military force, ladies and gentlemen, would it not be better if it is not the gringos who do it, would it not be better if it is a choice that is made by the Latin Americans themselves to deal with the problem that they recognize? they recognize it as surely as anyone here today who has given these eloquent speeches denouncing communism. Let us give our friends, our Democratic friends, an opportunity to do the job they are trying to do.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, today we have heard the pros and cons of the President's policies in search of peace, stability, and democracy in Central America.

Now the choice is clear: Are we going to support the forces for freedom in Nicaragua through humanitarian aid, or are we through our action, or inaction, going to let the professed Marxist-Leninist leadership of Nicaragua prevail with all that means to its long suffering people and to our own legitimate interests in the area.

President Reagan has presented a solid peace proposal. He has also promised not to use the appropriated $14 million for arms. To those who have raised the specter of U.S. troops in Nicaragua, let me say that the President has given assurances that this legislation will not be used to justify the use of U.S. Armed Forces. In plain English this legislation is no back door for sending troops there.

The legislation before us is in the national interest of our country. We must choose whether to support the President in his efforts to stop Soviet encroachment by proxy in our hemisphere. If we fail this test, the world will know we are not serious in our support of freedom. I urge a vote on this resolution for freedom in Central America.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, we have indeed had a lengthy and arduous debate today, in the great tradition of this great deliberative body. We have now come to that time to vote. The question is simple on the vote tonight. It is not a complicated question. We have received and again I will read the letter of transmittal from the President accompanying his classified report submitted to Congress. It reads as follows:

Pursuant to provisions of title VIII, section 8066 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (Public Law 98-473, enacted October 12, 1984; 98 Stat. 1935), I herewith transmit a classified report on U.S. support for the democratic resistance movement in Nicaragua. On the basis of this report, I have determined that assistance for military or paramilitary operations now prohibited by Section 8066A of that Act is necessary.

The resolution we will be voting on tonight, very shortly, is House Joint Resolution 239 introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], which again says:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

There is not one word in the classified report submitted by the President or the resolution on humanitarian aid. That is a Gulf of Tonkin resolution. It provides military aid pure and simple.

If the President wants to use funds for humanitarian aid, he cannot use these funds. These funds are earmarked for military purposes and he has asked for release of these funds for military purposes. If he wants these funds to be used for humanitarian aid, after the Congress votes down House Joint Resolution 239 tonight, he can send a letter in support of BOB MICHEL's resolution, if he wishes, which talks about humanitarian aid. A letter from the President, a press release from the President, a discussion by the President on humanitarian aid is not law. This resolution is law. House Joint Resolution 239 which you will be asked to vote on very shortly, that is law. And if you vote for House Joint Resolution 239, you will be voting to give the President $14 million for one purpose and one purpose alone, and that is for additional military aid, the foot in the door for future increases of military aid to Nicaragua.

It is simple. Tomorrow you can vote on humanitarian aid, whether it be the Hamilton resolution or whether it be the Bob Michel resolution. That will cover humanitarian assistance. Tonight the resolution before you is simple and clear cut. As I have pointed out to you, it provides for paramilitary or military aid as requested by the President.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADDABBO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I wish to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks and support his position most vigorously, and I rise in opposition to House Joint Resolution 239 to release $14 million in previously appropriated funds for use "to support directly or indirectly military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua." This position is consistent with earlier votes I have cast on this subject, and it also demonstrates my belief that the release of these funds at this time could have ominous consequences in the future.

We find ourselves in the unenviable position of having to, in effect, choose between the lesser of two evils. The first evil is the Sandinista government—a government of deceit. The second is increased support on the part of the United States for the Contras, and the potential it has for involving us more deeply than ever in the conflict. I contend that the second evil has far graver consequences for our Nation and its people. No one can quarrel with the premise that efforts must be undertaken to bring peace to Central America. It is also hard to disagree with the premise that we must work to put pressure on the Sandinistas to engage in a good faith diplomatic process aimed at a promotion of self-determination in Nicaragua. As I see it, Mr. Chairman, the issue before us today is what is the distinction between pressure and involvement? I contend it is a very fine but distinct line which must be respected and honored. Providing aid for the purposes espoused in this resolution would violate that line and transform it into a dangerous blur that can only confuse the people of Nicaragua and provoke fears among people in this Nation.

The Congress has long held the position I take today, and I suspect will vote later today to reaffirm that position. We are opposed to providing that aid which can be converted for military or paramilitary use. We have had amendments after amendments, almost since our involvement in Nicaragua commenced earlier this decade, spelling out that this was not aid to be used to plunge us into a conflict. I voted as recently as last fall to bar the release of any U.S. funds to Nicaragua until the President certified need.

Our problem is compounded by the simple but powerful observaton made this week in the Congressional Quarterly Weekly Report that "the Reagan administration has never made clear its long-term policies toward Nicaragua."

We were told initially that our aid was needed to help interdict a flow of arms crossing into Nicaragua from Honduras. Then we began to see the dramatic unraveling of our supposed "covert" operations through bungled maneuvers such as the unsuccessful mining of Nicaraguan harbors. Then came reports in late 1982 and early 1983 that the guerrillas, or Contras, had as their main objective the overthrow of the Sandinista regime. Then, in April 1983, the President restated our goal as being the prevention of the flow of arms. Then, in 1984, the President charges that the Sandinistas went back on their word and we would continue to support the Contras. Finally, in February 1985, the President stated as his goal the "removal" of the Nicaraguan Government.

This confusion in policy statements has caused great apprehension here and throughout Central America. Passage of this resolution can only serve to prolong this confusion and clearly plunge us far deeper than we should ever be in Nicaragua.

The challenge before us is this: If we are to spend $14 million in Nicaragua, can't we spend it in a productive and humane fashion. I contend we can and we must. There is an urgent need for humanitarian assistance in Nicaragua—there is compelling human need. There is an equally urgent need for new incentive to regain the diplomatic momentum in Central America.

If it is pressure we wish to exert on the Sandinistas then let us continue our support, but let us not in any way allow it to be converted into military purposes. Let us abandon the theory that the solution here can only be a military one. This would make us sound like the British and their positon relative to Northern Ireland. But never let us accept the yielding of Nicaragua into the Communist camp. Let us pursue the diplomatic route with our full strength and let it produce the desired result of a political solution featuring self-determination for all the people of Nicaragua. Militarism will beget militarism and we will find ourselves pitched in a new superpower conflict that will only result in fear and apprehension—for the entire world.

I urge the rejection of this resolution because its approach is flawed and dangerous. Let us look for another way for the United States to involve itself in the struggle for peace in Nicaragua and all of Central America.

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO] how many speakers he has left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. ADDABBO, has no time remaining. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 6½ minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, to conclude the debate, I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], the distinguished minority leader.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] is recognized for 6½ minutes.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, after almost 10 hours of intense debate, the fundamental facts remain the same.

In 1979, a small clique of Communists stole a revolution from the Nicaraguan people.

These Communists immediately began to install the apparatus of a totalitarian state. Even while we were sending them over $100 million in aid they were engaged in systematic abuse of human rights.

Today this same clique holds power through the barrel of a gun. If they get to the point of consolidating their takeover at home they will surely spread their poison throughout the region.

They have received aid from Cuba the Soviet Union the PLO and other totalitarian nations and groups.

The democratic forces of Nicaragua who oppose the Communists have pledged themselves to the democratic principles of the San Jose Declaration. It could be for all practical purposes the Magna Carta of the Nicaraguan people.

The choice we face is between the San Jose declaration on one hand and the consolidation of Communist power on the other.

Every other argument is irrelevant.

The Sandinista force has 62,000 active duty personnel a total force of 119,000 including reserves and militia.

This Sandinista force has Soviet MI-24 hind attack helicopters. It has 150 tanks, 200 other armored vehicles, and some 300 to 400 surface to air missiles. The Sandinistas have nearly completed a runway long enough to service any aircraft in the Soviet or Cuban inventory.

We are told this arsenal is a reponse to our aid to the democratic forces.

Why, that is a reversal of the law of cause and effect. It is because the Sandinistas have turned Nicaragua into an armed camp that we aid the democratic forces not the other way around.

When Harry Truman asked for aid to stop the Communists from taking over Greece, almost 40 years ago, he was told that the democratic forces in Greece were corrupt and didn't deserve our aid. We heard the same myth today.

But Truman was stubborn. And Greece was saved.

We are told that if only we'd stop aiding the democratic forces, the Sandinistas wouldn't be driven into the hands of the Soviet Union and they wouldn't abuse human rights.

But the Sandinistas always have been ideologically committed to the international cause of the Soviet Union. They imposed a Marxist-Leninist dictatorship before the Contras ever existed.

And do you known why? Because such a dictatorship is an article of faith with them. They have faith in communism. Oh, that we had such faith in democracy.

Let me conclude by saying:

There are voices that matter in this debate who haven't had a chance to be heard, today.

They are the voices of the victims of totalitarianism now in the past, all over the world.

Voices from Cuba, from Afghanistan from eastern Europe. Voices from the Gulag. Voices from the Nazi death camps. Voices from Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia. Voices crying out: "Remember our fate."

If we abandon the democratic forces in Nicaragua they will join the long, tragic, forced march toward the grave that marks the fate of all freedom lovers under totalitarian domination.

I regret that maybe there is sufficient time to read a copy of the President's letter that was addressed to two of our colleagues in the other body earlier today before that resolution was adopted by a 53-to-46 vote. It incorporates the same language as embodied in the language that we have before us today.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would advise the gentleman that it is a breach of order to refer to a particular vote in the other body.

Mr. MICHEL. I understand, Mr. Chairman.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: I announced on April 4 a proposal to promote peace in Central America by fostering a dialogue between the Government of Nicaragua and the democratic resistance, accompanied by a ceasefire in the conflict between them. My proposal was intended, in the words of the Contadora Document of Objectives agreed to by Nicaragua and its neighbors, "to promote national reconciliation efforts . . ., with a view to fostering participation in democratic political processes in accordance with the law."

Since April 4, I have had the benefit of many fruitful discussions with Latin American leaders and with members of the Congress. I have been encouraged by these discussions, which have shown that a broad consensus exists on the need for reconciliation in Nicaragua, based on democratic principles, as an essential aspect of achieving peace in Central America.

Today the Senate will vote on a resolution, S.J. Res. 106, the test of which is required by a law enacted last October. That text purports to release appropriated funds and free the Executive Branch from restrictions against the support of military or paramilitary action in Nicaragua. However, my intentions are founded on a different approach. Accordingly, I want to make clear to the Senate, as it approaches this important vote, how I will proceed in pursuit of peace if S.J. Res. 106 is enacted.

First, I will provide assistance to the democratic resistance only for food, medicine, clothing, and other assistance for their survival and well-being—and not for arms, ammunition, and weapons of war. Second, I will not use more than the $14 million already appropriated during the current fiscal year for such assistance. No other U.S. Government funds would be spent for such material assistance to the armed democratic resistance. I will personally establish thorough procedures for the detailed management and accountability of the program in order to assure that these limitations on both the nature and amount of U.S. assistance are scrupulously observed.

I recognize the importance some Senators have attached to bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua and the establishment of a ceasefire. I have considered these views and believe that such steps could help to promote the internal reconciliation called for by Contadora and endorsed by so many Latin American leaders.

Therefore, I intend to resume bilateral talks with the Government of Nicaragua and will instruct our representatives in those talks to press for a ceasefire as well as a church-mediated dialogue between the contending Nicaraguan factions. I must emphasize, however, that such bilateral talks must be in support of the Contadora process and the internal dialogue and cannot become a substitute for these efforts to achieve a comprehensive, verifiable agreement among all the nations of Central America. Also, as I said on April 4, peace negotiations must not become a cover for deception and delay. If the Sandinista government shows bad faith by seeking to gain unilateral advantage, for example, through a further arms buildup during a ceasefire or intransigence in negotiations, I would feel obligated to respond accordingly in our diplomatic efforts and would not expect the democratic resistance to continue to observe a ceasefire which was unfairly working to their disadvantage.

I will report to the Congress no later than September 1, 1985, on the progress made in achieving a verifiable peace and reconciliation in Nicaragua based on democratic principles. Such report shall also include an accounting for the funds obligated or expended under this joint resolution and may include such recommendations as I deem appropriate with respect to Nicaragua. I shall expect any recommendations for additional legislation for further assistance or sanctions to receive expedited handling.

While economic sanctions are unlikely by themselves to create sufficient pressure to change Nicaragua's behavior, the Sandinistas should not benefit from their present access to the U.S. market while continuing their intransigence on issues affecting our national security. The Administration will favorably consider economic sanctions against the Government of Nicaragua and will undertake multilateral consultations with other Central American states in this regard.

The U.S. condemns atrocities by either side in the strongest possible terms. We will use our assistance to help ensure against wrongful acts by those who seek our help and we will urge them to take steps to investigate allegations of such acts and take appropriate actions against those found to be guilty.

The United States now stands at a moment of judgment. Experience has shown that a policy of support for democracy, economic opportunity, and security will best serve the people of Central America and the national interests of the United States. If we show consistency of purpose, if we are firm in our conviction that the promising developments over the past year in El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Guatemala also show the way for a better future for Nicaragua, then over time we can help the democratic center prevail over tyrants of the left or the right. But if we abandon democracy in Nicaragua, if we tolerate the consolidation of a surrogate state in Central America, responsive to Cuba and the Soviet Union, we will see the progress that has been achieved begin to unravel under the strain of continuing conflict, attempt at subversion, and loss of confidence in our support.

There can be a more democratic, more prosperous and more peaceful Central America. I am prepared to devote my energies toward that end. But, I also need the support of the Congress. I hope that you will give me your support today.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

And so, as you vote, I ask you to listen. Listen to the voices of those who learned too late what totalitarians can do. Listen to those voices of the doomed innocents and then cast a vote in support of our President who wants so desperately to do the right thing down there.

I urge the Members to support the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

H.J. Res. 239

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress approves the obligation and expenditure of funds available for fiscal year 1985 for supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to Public Law 98-473, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REID, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239) to approve the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, had directed him to report the joint resolution back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to Public Law 98-473, the question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were ayes 180, noes 248, not voting 5, as follows:

NOT VOTING—5

Badham	Daniel	Vander Jagt
Byron	Rodino

□ 2200

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Badham for, with Mr. Rodino against.

So the joint resolution was not passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 239) to approved the obligation of funds available under Public Law 98-473 for supporting military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua, and that I may be permitted to include certain tables and extraneous material.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con Res. 37. Concurrent resolution providing for acceptance of a statue of Jeannette Rankin presented by the State of Montana for placement in National Statuary Hall, and for other purposes.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 1402

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed from the list of cosponsors of the bill, H.R. 1402.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make the following announcement.

Following the 5-minute special orders, Members who had been granted permission to address the House for special orders on the calendar day of Tuesday, April 23, will be recognized after the remaining special orders for the legislative day of Monday, April 22. Except for those Members who had been granted a special order for both days, only the first such special order will be called.

INTRODUCING A PRIVATE BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF STANISLAV LEVCHENKO

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a private bill for Stanislav Levchenko, a defector who has given U.S. intelligence agencies critical information concerning the activities of the KGB and the identities of KGB agents. Mr. Levchenko's information and his assistance to U.S. intelligence agencies has contributed immeasurably to the security of the United States. Despite this outstanding contribution to our national security, Mr. Levchenko has been hampered in his efforts to become a full-fledged American citizen. The bill I have introduced would rectify this situation. Mr. Levchenko's activities show that he clearly deserves to become a citizen of the United States.

The bill is identical to H.R. 6354 which I introduced in the 98th Congress. Because of the press of time, it was not possible to consider the bill in the closing days of that Congress.

Mr. Levchenko is a 43-year-old former KGB major who was assigned from 1975 to 1979 to the Soviet Mission in Tokyo under cover as a journalist for the Soviet magazine New Times. In October 1979 he walked into a U.S. Army installation in Tokyo and requested political asylum in the United States. He defected for ideological reasons: an intense disillusionment with the Soviet system and a strong desire to fight that system. Since his defection, he has been completely cooperative in sharing with the U.S. Government all of his knowledge on the KGB, particularly in the field of Soviet covert action, or what the Soviets call active measures.

One example of this cooperation is his testimony before the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, in July 1982, in which he presented a detailed explanation of Soviet active measures and answered numerous questions from the members of the committee. The committee subsequently published these hearings, providing the Congress and the American people with a unique document outlining in detail—from a former KGB specialist's personal experience and knowledge—Soviet active measures objectives and techniques.

Of critical importance to U.S. counterintelligence efforts, Mr. Levchenko has also provided the identities of KGB staff officers and KGB foreign agents, including some in high foreign government positions and the foreign media. He has discussed the KGB's use of agents of influence, and the overall KGB methods of operating, including KGB field procedures and mission training.

In addition, Mr. Levchenko has, as an independent consultant, given advice on how to counter hostile Soviet actions. For example, he has met with members of the National Security Council, the U.S. Information Agency, the State Department, the FBI, and other U.S. agencies. He has also spoken at the Army War College, the President's Foreign Intelligence Advisory Board, and the Government's special Technology Transfer Group.

A Soviet military tribunal tried Mr. Levchenko in absentia and sentenced him to death. Despite this threat to his life, he has continued to speak out in press and television interviews and in writing, exposing, and explaining Soviet espionage and deception practices. For example, in recent months he has cooperated closely in the writing and publication of a major new book on the KGB and another book on Soviet "Disinformation." His press interviews continue to be published in this country, in many West European countries and in the Far East, as he seeks to make a broad audience aware of Soviet realities. He also continues to consult and lecture to governmental and research groups studying Soviet intentions and activities.

Mr. Levchenko's efforts have made a great contribution to U.S. national security. The director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, who has primary responsibility for countering Soviet espionage in the United States, issued a formal FBI commendation to Mr. Levchenko in 1982 for his unique contribution to the security of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Levchenko deserves the gratitude of the American people for what he has done to ensure their security. Mr. Levchenko helped U.S. intelligence because he believed in America and American principles of freedom and democracy. The least we can do is help him to qualify to become a citizen of this country. The bill I have introduced will do so. The bill modifies the applicability to Mr. Levchenko of some technical provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act concerning residency and past membership in a proscribed organization. Mr. Levchenko still will be required to meet all the other requirements for naturalization.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill, which will enable the man who has contributed so much to the American people, to become one of the American people.●

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER], is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, last night my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle took a series of special orders to express or to restate, rather, their position on the McIntyre-McCloskey race in Indiana. While we Democrats on this side of the aisle have various opinions concerning that race, and while many of us have reserved judgment on the final outcome of that race pending the filing of the report which is forthcoming, and while many of us would disagree with the tactics employed by our colleagues to restate their position, we nonetheless vigorously support their right to state that position.

I would like to publicly thank those Members of the Congress who stayed here during the wee hours last night on the Democratic side, sitting patiently, listening to the arguments which we have heard before.

So I publicly acknowledge the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KANJORSKI], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRUCE], the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SIKORSKI], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TORRICELLI], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ECKART], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SYNAR], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WATKINS], and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EARLY], together with loyal staff assistants, Steve Skardon, John Mack, and Barbara Rourk, and a number of other doormen, clerks, police, and security guards who sat here during the night in order to assure that our colleagues have the right to say those things that they wish to say.

To these hardy souls we are grateful.

We are also grateful to the following additional employees:

EMPLOYEES OF CLERK OF THE HOUSE WHO WORKED DURING SPECIAL ORDERS ON APRIL 22, 1985

Immediate office; Tom Ladd.

Legislative operations: Robert Berry, James Bromwell, Mary (Meg) Goetz, Jack Gregory, Kevin Hanrahan, John Jenkins, John Overstreet, Maxine Snowden, and Lee Thomas.

Official reporters: Jon Alexander, Russ Greenwood, Charles Gustafson, Susan Hanback, Dan Hawkins, Chris Heil, Florence Leahy, Heather Mapes, Bill Pennekamp, Brad Roe, George Russell, Mary Stahl, Tony Tartaro, Gay Topper, John Ulmer, and Edward White.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, due to official business in my congressional district, I was unable to be present Monday afternoon, April 22, 1985, for rollcall vote Nos. 60 and 61, and on Tuesday morning, April 23, 1985, for rollcall vote No. 62.

Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on House Resolution 125, condemning the Government of the Soviet Union for the murder of Maj. Arthur D. Nicholson, Jr.

Had I been present, I would have voted "nay" on House Concurrent Resolution 52, as amended, calling for the restoration of democracy in Chile.

Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on House Resolution 136, providing a rule for consideration of House Joint Resolution 239.●

ADMINISTRATIVE NATURALIZATION

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RODINO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to facilitate the often time-consuming and frustrating process of acquiring U.S. citizenship by allowing for administrative naturalization.

For those immigrants adopting this country, U.S. citizenship is a priceless possession. In return, our country is enriched with their contributions and each nationality and heritage is woven into a rich tapestry of American society.

The avenue toward U.S. citizenship as it exists today is a cumbersome one for those who want to enjoy the rights of this great land, the right to practice religion freely, the right to participate in a democratic form of government, the right of free expression, and the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In order to accommodate the increasing numbers of persons who seek citizenship and provide a more effective means to obtain naturalization, I have introduced a bill to bring the entire naturalization process within the Department of Justice.

The legislation vests authority for naturalization in the Attorney General whose designated representatives would carry out the functions of what is currently a judicial process by allowing immigration judges to conduct ceremonies for naturalizing citizens of the United States. This bill simply streamlines the process by which persons become citizens and does not alter existing statutes with respect to the prerequisites for obtaining citizenship.

The Naturalization Amendments of 1985 first directs that the sole procedure for naturalization shall be through the Attorney General. Second, it allows judges designated by the Attorney General to conduct naturalization ceremonies. These most important provisions change existing law by consolidating under the Attorney General what is currently a two-step process engaged in by both the executive branch and the judicial branch. This means a qualified applicant for naturalization must simply submit an application for naturalization on to the Immigration and Naturalization Service and it will be on one track through the final swearing of allegiance ceremony consecrating the ultimate act of gaining citizenship.

Third, the bill retains significant elements of the judicial system in order to retain the dignity and decourm generally associated with the citizenship ceremony. It requires ceremonies be conducted in "open session" and that the Attorney General designate certain days for final hearing on citizenship cases. It also retains a certain period of residence in the State for purposes of filing an application for naturalization.

Fourth, the bill provides for a de novo hearing at the district court on denied applications for naturalization.

The time has arrived, I believe, to relieve the applicant for naturalization from some of the onerous paperwork requirements currently on our statute books. The courts now conducting naturalization ceremonies already have heavy dockets in other areas and the backlogs of those awaiting naturalization frequently causes tremendous inconvenience to the applicants. In many cases, delays result in denial of employent opportunities, travel plans, and, most importantly, exercise of their right to vote. The progress currently being made by the Immigration and Naturalization Service in reducing their backlogs in the naturalization area has been encouraging and demonstrates the priority attached to this area by the Service. I believe my bill will complement this effort.

Additionally, immigration judges—who will become the designated ceremonial agents under my bill—have demonstrated a high caliber of professionalism and I am confident that they will look upon their proposed duties with enthusiasm.

I believe this step to be a timely one in view of the impending 100th anniversary of the Statue of Liberty and I would urge this positive step on behalf of the new immigrants who have contributed volumes of history to this new land.●

THE ELECTION IN INDIANA'S EIGHTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, let me begin as the gentleman from Arkansas a few moments ago to thank the staff of the House and the staff of the minority and majority side who spent time with us here last evening as we discussed matters that we regarded as important to this body. And we felt strongly that there were issues that needed to have the attention drawn to them that the all night session last night we thought did. And the staffs I think performed nobly. We appreciate their hard work and know that they work on behalf of the whole House, and we are very grateful for their indulgence of the kind of activities that we Members engage in.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is also important to recognize that we are sincere in attempting to address issues that we regard as extremely important on the minority side; namely, the issue of the seating of Mr. McIntyre in the Eighth District of Indiana, and I am somewhat disappointed that some of the reactions from your side of the aisle has been rather questionable in terms of content.

For instance, members of the Speaker's staff were quoted in a newspaper article as trying to trash the process of the special orders here indicating that there was a report of the Clerk of the House talking about how much money these particular special orders cost, and they were talking about staff salaries and talking about the amounts of money that it cost for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I make the point simply because I called the Clerk of the House today myself. The Clerk of the House informs me that no such report exists, that it is in fact a distortion to suggest that such a report has ever been done. When I asked for that report to be given to me, to lay this out, I was told by the Clerk that it does not exist, that the staff salaries that are quoted around here in such reports are in fact a total misnomer because the people who are indicated in those reports are in fact people who are salaried, are not on hourly pay. So it costs no more money to have them here for special orders than it would any other time. And that the entire idea that we could assign costs to this kind of a thing are in fact a distortion, except in one instance, and that is that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of course, is an item of some cost in order to print.

However, it is less money to print the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Members who are speaking here on the floor than the Members who refuse to come out and participate on the House floor where they will be challenged on what they say, and instead use special order time to dump large pages of documents into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without ever having said anything on the House floor with regard to the subject matters that they are addressing. So that is where the real abuse is taking place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is where the real cost is, and I am surprised that the majority never seems to raise that, because some past counts of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show the majority is far more abusive of pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than any Members of the minority.

I just want to make that clear because I think there is a conscious attempt on the part of the majority to try to trash the process of special orders, and it seems to me that this is an important forum for many of us to have a chance to make points that we do think are important.

Mr. DURBIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DURBIN. So that I understand the point the gentleman is making, first let me preface this by saying in order to preserve your right and the right of any Member to speak on the floor of the House, I do not believe that the question should be raised as to cost. I believe that it is important that we have this opportunity.

Mr. WALKER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. DURBIN. But the gentleman is not suggesting we can go all night long in this Chamber with all of the staff present, the lights burning, the televisions running, without some additional cost to the taxpayers, is he?

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman that it is very minimal because the lights that burn might be a little bit of an additional cost, and television cameras, but the staff salaries, the largest single component, the so-called claim of the Clerk's report, it is $6,000 in the article today, that in fact is a total distortion. The Clerk has never issued such a report. The Clerk tells me, unless the Clerk is lying to this Member, and I talked to him personally, I am told that the people who are listed in that report are in fact salaried personnel.

Mr. DURBIN. Would the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DURBIN. When I felt at midnight last night, after having had the opportunity to preside, I saw a rather substantial number of security officers, as one might expect when the House is in session. And it is my understanding that the way they work is on an hourly basis. They are not salaried employees.

Would the gentleman concede that there might be some employees who have to stay because some Members would have to have their special orders go on through the night?

Mr. WALKER. I asked specifically about that, and it may well be there would be a few police that would be involved in that. I would say to the gentleman, however, that the Clerk informs me that some of the police officers would in fact receive their regular pay because they would simply be working their regular number of hours and would be here anyhow.

And that there are a minimum number of security people required when the House is in session. So I am simply saying to the gentleman that it is in fact a total distortion to suggest, as some staff on your side of the aisle have suggested, that somehow special orders are costing the taxpayers large amounts of money per hour. The Clerk has issued no such report. The Clerk told me that today. There is no such report.

I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DURBIN. I might just conclude by thanking the gentleman for yielding and suggesting again that I will continue to defend his right and the right of any Member to use a special order even if I disagree with the content of the special order. It is an important element in this House.

But I think we all must concede that you cannot have a special order running all through the night without incurring some additional expense to the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely right. There is some minimal additional expense to the House. But I would say to the gentleman that to do as the majority side has done now on several occasions, to suggest that the processes of this House that the minority uses are in fact costing the taxpayers money and so therefore the minority is doing something irresponsible by using the processes of the House, I appreciate the gentleman's words, that some of these things are important and ought to be continued and that the cost to the taxpayers is certainly something which is budgeted as a part of the House proceedings, and it is at best a minimal expense involved in this. It is not even a few thousand.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FAZIO. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I guess we probably have both said that freedom is not free. So obviously there are some costs involved here. But license can be costly. I guess my thought is there are times when we ought to be weighing the relative benefits of taking the time that we do take here on the floor with no dispute from most of the parties at issue here. We understand the right that the gentleman has. But it does cost money. There are people who work here who would not have to work here. It is not just a matter of salary.

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman the only point I am making is that those people are salaried, they are on annual salaries. It is not costing the House additional money for those people to be here.

Mr. FAZIO. Let me say that the law enforcement personnel are not really in a position to simply accept salary. This is a matter of overtime for most of our policemen.

Mr. WALKER. My understanding of the matter, and the gentleman is more expert in these matters than I am, but my understanding is that the security contingent is in fact here whether we are here or not at night, and there may be a few additional people, but it would be a question as to whether or not they are working more hours than they would otherwise work as to whether or not they get overtime pay.

Mr. FAZIO. There are people here, we agree, who would not have to be here if we were not keeping the House in session all night.

Mr. WALKER. And most of those are salaried people who we do not have to pay additional amounts to.

I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. First of all, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and let me say, first of all, that I have been in this body for 9 years, and I can tell you that if the leadership of this House would get to some sort of rational scheduling process so that we did not waste long hours in this Chamber doing nothing and then try to go into the late hours of the night, in the last minutes, trying to rush something through, we would save far more money than has been spent on all of these special orders.

I would also say that when we are talking about an issue of such transcendent importance as the seating of a Member of Congress and going through a procedure that has so violated the Constitution of this country, it does not make any sense to stand here and protest that a Member of Congress should not be able to debate and bring forth the issues about the seating of a Member and the violation of the Constitution because we are having to pay overtime to security. That seems to me to be getting things totally backward.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for the time he has taken to bring to this House and to the public this important matter.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman. I do want to make the point that another little bit of research that we went ahead and did was how much it cost for us to have the pro forma sessions which are scheduled by the leadership regularly around here. In fact, the pro forma sessions cost more money than any amount of money that has been spent as a cost to the taxpayers through special orders done by the minority side. Now that is the majority scheduling, and they do not seem to worry too much about the fact that their pro forma sessions are costly. You know, maybe that is as it is, the House rules require us to have pro forma sessions, too. But let us just understand that the cost goes both ways.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FAZIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I did not bring this issue up, but I did want to engage in some dialog on it.

Clearly, the gentleman would not be protesting as much as he is if he were not somewhat concerned about the costs that do occur.

Mr. WALKER. Let me say to the gentleman, the reason why this gentleman brings it up is consistently every time we have had, and there have been only two of them in my time in the House, one of these long special orders we have had somebody from your side of the aisle quoted in the newspaper saying that it is irresponsible to hold this because of the cost to the taxpayer and what they do is they quote the Clerk of the House.

The only point this gentleman is making is that is a lie. The Clerk does not have such a report. I just thought that it was important to put on the record the fact that no such report exists and that to continue to use that is to distort the entire process.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FAZIO. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

I am sure we can document what the costs are, and I am sure that the gentleman and others on his side will calculate that those costs are worth absorbing, given the other weighty issues at stake. It is always a relative judgment as to whether the exercise of your rights are worth the cost. You happen in this case to think it is. I just think the issue should be clear for the public to decide so we can put in the RECORD the costs that will occur as a result of these late night sessions, which I grant your side's right to engage in. But I do think you have to be willing to own up to the costs and the public has to know about it.

Mr. WALKER. I hope the gentleman will come forth with that kind of report, because every time this has come up I have requested a copy of the report.

At one point the majority leader was out there on the floor brandishing a sheet of paper that purported to talk about the cost to the taxpayer of doing certain things. I was told in that colloquy that that came from the Clerk. I called the Clerk's office and said since that Member had it couldn't this Member get a copy? I was told there was no such report that exists.

We never prepared such a report.

If the gentleman wants to prepare that report and give us the breakdown, I would sure love to see it, because I do not think that you can come up with anything that comes anywhere close to the kinds of figures that the gentleman's side of the aisle has been brandishing around here as purporting to be costs to the taxpayers.

Mr. FAZIO. I will see if we can clarify this matter. I just hope that the gentleman will accept the fact that there will be costs. The gentleman can toss them off as the price we have to pay for democracy, but I think that price should be known to the public.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman. One thing that has amused me over the years is we even have people around here who do not like to come over to the floor and vote. They have put a cost on coming to the floor and voting on matters. You know, I really do think we have got to the point where the majority side simply does not want anybody doing anything on the House floor because they prefer to do things in the back room, and that somehow does not cost us anything.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SWINDALL. I would like to make a point that has nothing to do with what the gentleman was speaking about. But as I was walking over here to cast my vote tonight on the aid to the Contras bill, what was already a level of outrage with regard to what is going on in the Eighth District of Indiana, soared to even greater heights of outrage as my gaze focused on a poster that I had seen many times, but I guess the words never really struck me as they did on this occasion. They said, "Count all the ballots; McCloskey wins."

The reason I became so outraged, as I saw that, is before coming to this august body I was a trial attorney and on occasion I tried criminal cases, and any time I was a trying a criminal case I alway tried to go back and find documentary evidence that in some way showed the frame or bent of mind of the criminal before he was actually apprehended, because there you somehow find what was really going on with respect to their intent.

With that in mind, I noticed that it said, "Count all the ballots; McCloskey wins."

Then it occurred to me that was printed long before the recount, which was supposedly an objective recount, where numbers of individuals defended that they were going to go into it objectively, and whoever won, won. Well, I submit to actually print a document before the recount is over that states, "Count all the ballots, McCloskey wins," is a very revealing fact, because it tells us that before all of the ballots were counted, this step was already contemplated to the point that they knew who would win.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman, and the problem of course is the fact that, having paraded that sign around for some time, then they decided at the last time not to count all the ballots, which is the angle that ends up being extremely unfair.

Mr. SWINDALL. If the gentleman will yield further, that is the other point, because that just stuck out even that much more, because it says, count all the ballots. As did a number of my colleagues this morning.

Mr. WALKER. I noticed that a lot of those signs have come down since we got the final result, because they know doggone well that there were at least 32 ballots that they did not count, including those of our servicemen.

Mr. SWINDALL. If the gentleman will continue to yield? Would you say that perhaps the evidence is being hidden?

Mr. WALKER. I think that might be an analysis that would stand scrutiny.

Mr. DURBIN. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DURBIN. First let me say to my new colleague from Georgia [Mr. SWINDALL] that the use of the words "theft of the election" I think is an excessive term, but it has become a fashionable term on the floor of the House. If everyone who used that term had their words taken down, we would have done nothing else over the last 48 hours but take words down, and I will not ask for that.

I would like to comment, if I might, if the gentleman would refer to the war of the posters and look at his own party's posters, long before the recount was taken, your poster claims, "Seat McIntyre, He Won."

Again, if there was a conclusion as to what the result might be, we are all hopeful as to the result and in fact we now have the result, and Mr. McCloskey is the winner by four votes.

Mr. WALKER. I think that our poster was a statement of fact, however. We had a certified winner from the State. Just as he came to this body with a certification from his State that he won his election, so did Mr. McIntyre come with a certification that he had won his election.

He was in fact the winner. That is the reason why we thought he should be seated. Under all precedents of the House of Representatives, he should have been seated. He was not seated because there was an arbitrary decision made to not seat him and to go through this charade of a process of declaring someone else a winner who could not win an election on his own in Indiana, but could only win by having the House of Representatives count.

The House of Representatives then went through a process where they did not count all the ballots; they counted some of the ballots. They continued to count up until that time when McCloskey took the lead, and then they stopped counting.

That is the process that we regard as unfair, a process that I think is very revealing based upon your posters which stated, if you count all the ballots, McCloskey wins, and then refuse to count all of the ballots.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. CRAIG. I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, on January 3, I stood on this floor and admonished my colleagues on this side not to vote against the duly elected and certified Congressman from the Second District of Idaho, because the delegation from Indiana was going to attempt to hold him from his certification as the Members on this side of the aisle held Mr. McIntyre from his certification.

I took the floor that day to argue the point that although there was still a question in the race in the Second District of Idaho, and although the incumbent, who had been defeated, had filed some protests because of some irregularities alleged in certain precincts in the Second District of Idaho, that it was not a question of a recount; there were no irregularities in the count in Indiana. In fact, the incumbent had not filed a protest, and there was a recount underway.

I said, and I believed it then and I believe it now, that the gentleman from Idaho should be seated until there was some evidence that irregularities could be proven that might change the election outcome.

Because that gentleman, Mr. RICHARD STALLINGS, had a valid certficate of election from the secretary of state of the State of Idaho, as did our colleague, Mr. McIntyre.

I took the floor that day and asked the members of the Indiana delegation not to use the congressman from the Second District of Idaho, just elected, as an example in protest. I believe I was right then and I think I am right now in saying that was the thing that should have been done because that was the constitutional and responsible act of this House.

So there were some limited protest votes, but the movement was backed off from. I made only one mistake that day, and that mistake was to believe that this body would attempt, through a fair and just constitutional process, to determine who was elected or who was not elected.

The bottom line was and is still remaining, that there is a gentleman from the Eighth District of Indiana who holds a certificate of election, but he has been denied by the majority of this House, through an absolute display of arrogance and power that they can in fact un-elect and re-elect as they decide. Not as the citizens of the Eighth District of Indiana decided; not as the citizens of the Second District of Idaho decided, and therefore by their act ask the secretary of state to so certify.

I can only apologize to the citizens of the Eighth District of Indiana that the arrogance of power is so massive in this House today that they will deny those voters, as they almost attempted to deny in Idaho, the right of the duly-certified individual to serve in this body.

I am disappointed. I thought we were a constitutional body, but I do recognize that power by the majority can and does and has overridden the Constitution of this great country.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I was standing on the floor when I heard your statement, and I would like the gentleman to define what is minimal, if I may. Do you have an opinion?

Mr. WALKER. Well, I do not really know—I assume the gentleman is talking about the cost. I simply reflected the fact that the salaries of the employees around here that are being included in the cost estimates given to us by the majority side, whoever is peddling that story around here, which is a false story, is not true because the salaries are paid annually whether or not the people are here or not. Just as the salaries for my staff are paid whether they work 12 hours a day or 18 hours a day.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. Sure.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Now, I happened to spend most of the good evening last night with my friends from the other side. We had a rather heavily involved conversation, and I was impressed that it had to be costing us something.

Since I heard your comment, at my request, I asked the Sergeant at Arms to give me a cost per hour of the extra police protection for having kept the House of Representatives in session.

I think you will agree, on that question that you were discussing yesterday, we at least were in session an additional 14 hours. Would you agree to that?

Mr. WALKER. I have no idea.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Well, the Sergeant at Arms informs me that the minimal cost for the services of the police force alone are $1,500 an hour. That is $20,000 for police protection alone.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman for his observation——

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. WALKER, in my book and in my district in Pennsylvania—I do not know about yours—that is enough to employ one man for an entire year and raise a family, and that is not minimal.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman, and it is a great deal of money. Of course, the gentleman realizes that we have security around this body whether we are here or not, and I would be somewhat suspicious of those figures since no one is able to document that kind of thing.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I did not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Is there a reason now we cannot have a byplay?

Mr. WALKER. I am simply trying to make my point, and I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. KANJORSKI. I ask the gentleman to yield. We have the Sergeant at Arms in the Chamber.

Mr. WALKER. The Sergeant at Arms. I talked earlier today to the Clerk, and I will say to the gentleman, the point is a peripheral point, because I am simply making a point that what we saw in the paper today——

Mr. KANJORSKI. Is now peripheral, is that correct?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is marked by his rudeness, and the only point that I would say to the gentleman is that the reflection I made earlier was that in a newspaper article there was a claim that the Clerk of the House has issued such a report. No such report exists. That report is a lie. If the gentleman wants to in any way refute that, I would suggest that he talk to the Clerk of the House.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. I just want to say that I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania is, frankly, getting drawn into a quicksand that is not relevant.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me say unequivocably to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if he wants to make a case about the Speaker's major trips, which are vastly more expensive, if you want to take on a number of things that are done in this place that are very expensive, then we will take you seriously. But the fact is that among many of your colleagues during the 1950's and the 1960's, all-night sessions in the other body, which were involving isssues of the Constitution and of civil rights, were heroic, they were noble, they were useful.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. No. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. KANJORSKI. You know, it is interesting, you are constantly asking us to listen.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, could we have regular order?

Mr. GINGRICH. I would be glad to yield in just a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentlemen please maintain decorum?

Mr. WALKER. I think we ought to forgive the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He may be somewhat inexperienced and not familiar with the rules of the House. But it seems to me that at the very least he ought to respect the courtesies of the House as they relate. I have been good enough to yield to the gentleman. I will again. But I think the gentleman ought to try to respect the courtesies of the House.

I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINGRICH. I would just like to finish what I was saying.

It is fascinating to have people come down here who are willing to spend virtually any amount of money on virtually any domestic idea that drifts through, to have people come down here who spend billions of dollars randomly, whenever they have a project, who proudly announce back home hundreds of thousands of dollars, millions of dollars, who are perfectly happy to have massive amounts of overseas travel, who have staffs around this building and offices around this building in their party's keep, which are an enormous cost, and then they rush down, suddenly, because we are speaking and they talk as though they were fiscal conservatives. It is a wonderful mockery, I think it is a beautiful act, it is a nice thing for them to do, but let us put it all in perspective.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I think it is important to understand that we have had a few votes around here about bringing down the cost of this place by reducing the number of staff around here and doing that. Invariably, the majority party votes absolutely against those reductions in staff and the kinds of things that would save big money.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I have listened very intently to my colleagues about the cost of operating this House, and having come from the private sector and also from local government, I have become very conscious of what it costs to operate anything, including this House of Representatives. And I must say, in all candidness, what we are talking about here is like a grain of sand on a beach compared to the cost of operating this House.

For example, here is the whip notice of the activities of the House of Representatives for this week: On Monday there were three suspension items. That is it. On Tuesday, self-explanatory. Tomorrow the House meets at noon. We may or may not take up what is the authorization of the State Department, but that is subject to a rule. Thursday is a pro forma session. The House meets at 11 a.m. In plain English, that means nothing will happen. The House is recessed on Friday.

Now, could any kind of a business anywhere in the United States function with that kind of a calendar with the overhead that this House has, whether it meets or not? And I think the object and the answer is absolutely no.

Now, a little personal note: I happen to represent a district from the west coast which has a considerable cost of travel. The changes made on the spur of the moment, without any apparent reason, of day after day, week after week, month after month, of this House of Representatives' program costs the Federal Government a bundle of money in changing reservations to get back to the district to meet the obligations of not only this Member but I am sure many other Members of this House because there evidently is not thoughtfulness enough to understand that every hour that this House is operating there is a cost.

To me, what happened last night is a basic constitutional issue and demonstrates the need to speak out for something that obviously is out of order.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman. I just want to make the point that in the matter that we are discussing, the Eighth District race, the Democrats had no hesitancy whatsoever of paying two people for one job during the period of time that they were taking time in order to change the election result in Indiana. That particular cost to the taxpayer, paying those two people for one job, comes to more money than even under the rather questionable figures of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the cost to debate in the House last night.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FAZIO. I would just like to make several points, and then I will leave the floor so the gentlemen can continue their internal discussions about their view of what happened in Indiana.

The last 6 years the legislative branch budget has been held down to a far greater degree than any budget of the executive branch.

Mr. WALKER. But it still has increased.

Mr. FAZIO. And we have still made progress on a yearly basis on eliminating personnel. We have had in the last 2 years declines in the number of employees in the legislative branch, net. We have been doing our job to set an example. I think we have done it in a bipartisan way. I simply wanted the record to show that we have had some success, and I think we will continue to have it this year. We are making every effort we can to make reductions not in the rate of increase but absolute reductions in the legislative branch once again. That would be the third consecutive year.

So I would hope that as the gentlemen defend their positions in terms of the time that was taken—and it is one that can be defended, from their perspective—that they would not play fast and loose with the facts as they relate to the spending that is taking place in the legislative branch.

We are now in a far different mode than we were 10 or 20 years ago. The gentleman from Georgia can cite history, but the fact is that today we are making progress on this, and I think we are doing it in a cooperative spirit, one that should not be trashed by the kind of late-night historics that occasionally impact us here.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman. I would simply say to the gentleman that the point being that there evidently are some costs that are involved that the people from his side of the aisle get up here and posture against all the time when they happen to affect the minority. Our point is that many of the costs of running this body are involved with the fact that our committees around here are overstaffed, we have far too many subcommittees, we have a whole raft of staff around here that many of us think could be cut back and that we think there are ways of saving big bucks, and all the time what we hear is that the minority should not be allowed to debate, that would really save the money.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to the yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for pointing out that the information that has been floated erroneously is not accurate.

Mr. WALKER. It is a lie, I would say to the gentleman.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. I think he said it was a lie. That the fixed expenses, if you would, of this body, continue, with the exception of some items. But I would like to pose a question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania: Is not the real question here—and perhaps the other side of the aisle should be focusing on that—what is the cost to the system, what is the cost to the system when the minority is trampled? What is the cost to the system when the State of Indiana is trampled in terms of certification of a candidate? What is the cost to the system when people lose faith in the system, this House of Representatives has to have two people being paid, as you said.

Mr. WALKER. Both are on the payroll.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Which is far in excess of any additional electricity or a few security patrolmen.

Would the gentleman care to comment on the cost to the system?

Mr. WALKER. That brings it back to the real issue, which of course is the issue that the gentlemen on that side of the aisle do not want to discuss, because they do realize that, despite all of their rhetoric, despite all of their rhetoric of counting the ballots, they have refused to do that, that they stopped counting; and so, therefore, they send up smokescreens all the time.

When we get out on the floor and discuss the real facts, make our points very clearly to the American people, they then raise peripheral issues in order to try to divert the attention away from the real facts. They are spending their time talking about all kinds of matters in order to divert attention away from the real facts of the matter here and the real cost of this body, the real costs to our constitutional system if in fact they are allowed to pervert the Constitution in a way that they have moved thus far in the State of Indiana.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. I thank the gentleman. If he would continue to yield, I wonder where the Members are who were talking about the few dollars of police protection.

Mr. WALKER. Oh, they do not want to talk about this issue.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. If they could address the question of the cost to the constitutional process.

Mr. WALKER. Well, they all voted to pay two people for the seat in Indiana at the same time. They all voted in that direction, and they do not want to get out here and discuss that matter because they are on record as having voted that way, which cost the taxpayers far more than anything the minority has done thus far. So they are not about to come out and discuss that issue. The gentleman I think is kind of deluding himself if he thinks that they are really willing to discuss real issues out here on the floor. They want to take their time on issues of nonimportance.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I absolutely cannot believe my ears. This, majority leaders of the House, is not National Orange Juice Week that we are talking about, it is not National Transcription Week, it is not any of a number of somewhat perhaps nonmeritorious subject that we get up and talk about at great lengths at cost to the taxpayer. This is a matter of seating a Member of this body who is certified by a State as having won an election twice. And I have seen no Members on the other side of the aisle, on the Democrat side, get up and make any type of a substantive defense of the Democrat majority refusing to count the last 29 ballots in this race, those same unmarked ballots, the absentee ballots, that had been counted up to that point, until the Democrat contender got four votes away or basically pulled ahead of the pack by four votes, and then they said, "We don't want to count the ballots any longer," and then they stopped counting.

Let me tell you something: You had over 60 Members of the Republican conference in this special order that took place all night. These people left their families, they left their homes, they left other business engagements, they did a lot of sacrificing to be out here to talk about something that was very important to them and that is democracy in this United States. It is basic fairness in seating Members of Congress.

Let me tell you also that it was not simply conservatives, it was not simply liberals, it was a cross-section of all the Republican conference. Republicans are outraged; a lot of Democrats are outraged, my friends, and a lot of people in Indiana and across the Nation are outraged. Because it means that the Democrat majority for the first time, "You really do not have to get 50 percent of the vote to win a congressional seat, you guys come close out there and we will see what we can do."

Let me tell you something else for the gentleman that got up and said, "Well, it looks like we won by four votes." I got news for you: I predicted 4 weeks ago that you would win by a couple of votes. Some people in my District said what are you talking about; the Republicans are some 400 votes ahead? I said when the Democrat task force gets finished analyzing and controlling which votes will be counted, they will not be some 400 and some votes ahead; the Democrat will have won and the Republican will have lost.

They said, "My gosh, that is a cynical view." I said I am sorry. There were very few betting people in America when that 2-to-1 task force took off for Indiana who were willing to bet that the Republican would come out the winner, and it looks like they were right.

Let us say something else about propriety and the appearance of impropriety. One of the best points that was made last night, and I hope Members listen because this was not a filibuster where some Member of the other body gets up and reads a phone book so he can claim some time. There were very articulate statements made. The one gentleman, Mr. COUGHLIN from Pennsylvania, made one of the best comments and best statements about this body I have ever heard. He said, you know this body runs on comity, and comity means respect. It means respect for the minority. And he said essentially that task force should have bent over backward to accommodate the Republicans. They should have bent over backward to be fair. How can any Democrat stand up there and say how can you be made Republicans? When they counted those ballots, they counted those absentee ballots until they pulled four votes ahead, and then they said, "Now we think perhaps that the State of Indiana was right, and we are going to stop counting the ballots and we are not going to count those last 29 ballots."

How could they have expected any other reaction except outrage from the Republican side, from our leadership right on down. That starts with Mr. MICHEL and goes right through the ranks. Everybody was outraged; liberals in the Republican Party; conservatives in the Republican Party. In fact, I saw some conservatives stand here last night and wince a little bit when some of our more moderate Members got up and really explained very graphically what they think about this outrage that occurred.

I think every Member saw a number of them this morning, a number of people who are very, very concerned about civil liberties in this country, and about the right to representation. I would like to ask something else about cost: How about the 100 days-plus of cost that the citizens of Indiana experienced in not having a Representative? How about that cost? What is the cost to democracy? Well, I will tell you something: If you go over to the Soviet Union, you are not going to have many all-night sessions; you are not going to have many sessions at all.

If they are saying essentially other forms of government can run more effectively than those in which Members get up and speak their mind on subjects, they are probably right.

Mr. WALKER. Let us understand: Dictatorships tend to be very efficient. They are not very nice to live under, as we know on the minority side, because what we are hearing from the Democrats around here is they like efficiency. So when we do something like this, it is not very efficient, and so they do not particularly like that. It just happens to be democratic, however.

So what we have is a contrast here between democracy and dictatorship. It gets played out all the time in this body and on this floor, and I think that we have seen a few more examples of it here this evening.

I yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MONSON. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, all this talk about cost has really outraged me even more. We have had a cost going on for the last 3 months that we did not even have to have and that is the recount process, period. We never needed to do that because we had a certified winner. We never needed to go through this process at all. We never needed to worry about whether we were going to pay two salaries. This was all immaterial because we knew who the winner was.

Then we go through all this process and what have we been left with? We have been left with a situation where they have counted spoiled ballots. Ballots that no one would count under normal circumstances because we know that they were spoiled and they were set aside and someone was given a new ballot because they had asked for a new ballot because they had spoiled the first one. They have counted some of those, and then the real abuse, when they get to the end, it takes them all but 32 votes before their man can pull ahead, and then they quit counting because all of a sudden they have a lead.

We do not know those last 32 votes would go, but we know that they were not counted, and until those are counted, and until you can eliminate all those spoiled that should never have been counted, giving us in some precincts more people voting than signed the register, I do not see how we have learned a thing from this. We have just extended the period more; created more uncertainty; lack of credibility in the voter's minds, and we have committed one of the biggest outrages this House has ever committed.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman makes a very good point. I wonder if some of those Democratic staff people who seem to have these figures instantaneously at their fingertips for the majority side has some figures as to how much that task force has cost us and all this recounting they have done. Getting the GAO and doing all this. I wonder if they have that kind of figure. I doubt it; I doubt they have it at their fingertips. I imagine they will try to bury that somewhere because they are not going to want to know, they are not going to want the American public to know just how much it cost in taxpayers' money to steal this election.

I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it seems sadly ironic that today, as we are faced with the vote on $14 million in assistance for those who are fighting for freedom and free and fair elections in Nicaragua, that we are faced with this kind of dispute here.

I was just talking to my good friend from California [Mr. HUNTER] about this quandary, and I wonder if he might have any comments on a comparison he could see between this dispute which exists, because we know very well that in 1979 there was a promise made by the Sandinista regime that we would in fact see free and fair elections.

I wonder if my friend from California sees my comparison in this.

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from California, and the gentleman from California knows that the gentleman from Virginia has been waiting too.

Mr. HUNTER. I would simply say I think in that letter that the Sandinistas sent the OSA promising free and fair elections, they were not referring to the Indiana Eighth; I think that is obvious.

Mr. DREIER of California. They had no idea at that point that the dispute would exist, I am sure.

Mr. HUNTER. That is right.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman and I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I really do not think the cost is very significant. Obviously, we are dealing with principle. If I were the Speaker of the House, frankly, I would let most of the staff go home on almost all these special orders. I think we keep too many of the staff people around. I think those who have families ought to be able to go home.

Mr. WALKER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. DREIER of California. Shall we take a vote?

Mr. WOLF. Well, we could take a vote tonight.

On the question of what I think should be done, I think something like this really helps to tear the House apart. I know, obviously, what I would favor would be that Rick McIntyre ought to be seated.

I want to again read something that I referred to again today. It was an editorial in today's Washington Post, and it is significant because the Washington Post is an independent newspaper. It is here within Washington, DC; within the Beltway. It responded immediately after the task force made their recommendation.

This is what the Washington Post said:

> The controversy now rapidly coming to a conclusion in the House over who actually won last November in the Eighth District of Indiana inevitably raises one question: Can it ever be determined with certainty who won such a close election? The proceedings before the 3-Member Task Force, which has concluded two-to-one that Democrat Frank McCloskey beat Republican Richard McIntyre by 4 votes suggests that the answer to this question is no.

That means no, it will never be a certainty. It will always be in the minds of everyone. Frankly, I know it will be in the minds of the Members on the other side. It will be in their minds as to whether or not they actually robbed Rick McIntyre of his seat.

Members know how hard it is to run for Congress. I had to run 3 times before I got elected I was defeated in 1976 and 1978, and I did not get here until 1980.

Do you know the hurt, the pain, and the agony when somebody is defeated, particularly in a situation whereby they think they are going to be seated and then they are not seated, and back and forth? Frankly, I would feel the same way. My heart would go to McCloskey if he were in that same situation. I mean it just is not fair. So I think no one in this Chamber will ever know for sure.

The editorial goes on to say: "The House, embroiled in an ear-splitting dispute over the outcome"—and it is ear-splitting—"should in fact declare the seat vacant and let Indiana hold another election."

It concludes by saying: "But when the margin is so close"—as this is, four votes—"doubts inevitably remain"—as I said before, we will always wonder; I think we will wonder who should have been seated and ask, did we do the right thing?—"and the candidate who is declared the winner will hold the office, so far as some of his colleagues and constituents are concerned, under a cloud."

I think, quite frankly, if we do not hold a special election, you will see McIntyre or McCloskey walking around and you will sort of whisper and say, "Hey! I wonder if he really won that election. I wonder, do you think he won that, or did we do the right thing?" You will always wonder. Whether it be McCloskey or McIntyre, as they walk down the corridor of the Capitol, people will say, "There's the guy who won by four votes, and it really didn't count." There will always be this cloud.

The Post goes on to say, and I agree completely: "In these circumstances the by no means unusual or cumbersome remedy of a special election is in order."

Now, I think we ought to seat Rick McIntyre, but certainly I would appeal—and I know we are going to have an opportunity to vote on this next week—to Members, and Members will say, "What is the fairest thing we could do?"

First, I think it is fair to have a special election. Second, if you care, not only about that Indiana Eighth District but care about the traditions of the House and you care about whether or not this body will be torn apart—because, frankly, the Members on my side of the aisle are really angry about this, and I am not sure what is going to be done, but frankly something will be done—I think in order to keep peace and show fairness, the best thing we could do for Rick McIntyre, for Frank McCloskey, and for the Congress is to hold a special election and allow the people of the Eighth District of Indiana to make a decision as to who should sit in this body and forever remove that cloud.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I think the gentleman will agree with me that the one thing that is not fair in this process is the seating of Frank McCloskey when the only way he could win the election is when his buddies in the House did the count. That we know is not fair. There may be other options that would be fair but that we know is not.

Mr. WOLF. I agree.

Mr. WALKER. That is precisely why the minority feels so strongly and so deeply that that process cannot go forward without the minority's reacting in a vehement fashion.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to compliment him for the outstanding effort he has underway here.

I would like to identify myself with the remarks of my predecessor, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia.

There is an ironic twist to this, because I have heard some Members from the other side criticizing the Member in the well for this special order and for the minimal cost of that special order. It just so happens that I have before me on my desk a copy of the Congressional Quarterly for March 30 and there is a story entitled. "House Votes Increase in Committee Funding." The story says, and I quote exactly:

> At the same time many of its members are advocating freezing federal spending programs, the House voted to authorize more money for its own committees March 26.

Now, we are not talking about nickels and dimes because the resolution authorized $48 million for investigative costs of these House committees.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman repeat that figure?

Mr. BOEHLERT. It is $48 million for investigative costs. And that is only the half of it. It is estimated that we will spend $86 million on committees in the House of Representatives during this year when so many people are talking about costs.

Mr. WALKER. Was that $86 million?

Mr. BOEHLERT. That is precisely right. The gentleman is exactly right.

And the interesting twist to this is that some of the Members who were so critical of the gentleman in the well for taking this special order and for giving the minority one of its rare opportunities to speak its will, to address the American people and let them know the seriousness of the matter we are discussing, these very Members, I noticed as I looked back at the scorecard, voted for this.

Mr. WALKER. They voted for $86 million?

Mr. BOEHLERT. Well, they voted for only $48 million in this increment. It is an incremental thing. The House takes very good care of itself, as the gentleman well knows.

I would commend the gentleman in the well. I checked him on this, and he voted no on that resolution.

Mr. WALKER. Thank goodness.

Mr. BOEHLERT. I want the gentleman to know that I also voted no, and a good number of us did because we were concerned about this excessive spending.

But the fact of that matter is that these special orders, I think, are extremely important. They give those of us who are in the minority an opportunity to discuss at some length with reason, with cogent arguments, very important issues like the issue of the race in the Eighth District of Indiana, and I would like to commend the gentleman for what he is doing in this special order.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for yielding.

I would like to point out that I voted with the gentleman in the well last week on a cost-saving measure relative to the NASA Program.

Mr. WALKER. I appreciate that. I noticed that. You and a number of your colleagues voted that way, and we very much appreciate that. We saved a few million bucks there.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. The gentleman is absolutely right.

Mr. Speaker, I only came to the well because I thought there was a nice statement made by our friend, the gentleman from Virginia, who read the first paragraph of the Washington Post editorial, and I was hoping that we would read the second paragraph of the Washington Post editorial, which says this:

> We reach this conclusion not because we think the Task Force acted unfairly or negligently. On the contrary, it seems clear that it counted the votes it believed were cast with great accuracy and that it reached its conclusions as to which votes were cast on principles that can readily be defended as impartial and fair. We don't agree with Republicans who are describing the Task Force's proceedings as a "rape."

That was the next paragraph of the Post editorial.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. It is his time.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, if I might reclaim my time and then yield to the gentleman from Virginia, I would simply say to the gentleman that I have a feeling that the editorial was written or I know it was written before the task force met today or before the House Administration Committee met today, where the official counter for the task force did in fact admit there were ballots that he would have counted that the task force did not count. I wonder if the Post, upon hearing the words of the official counter, will in fact be as confident of the second paragraph that the gentleman read.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I have no idea. I just wanted to read the second paragraph.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOLF. I never used the word that the gentleman made the comment on, and if the gentleman checks the RECORD, he will find I never used that word about the task force.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. What word? I am sorry. I did not use a word.

Mr. WOLF. The editorial goes on to say, if the gentleman wants to read the very next paragraph:

> But at the same time, to decide which votes should be counted, the Task Force had to make exceedingly fine judgments about which, inevitably, fair-minded people might reasonably disagree. By a 2-1 bipartisan vote, for example, the Task Force decided to count absentee ballots that were not notarized and were sent by county clerks to precincts. But by a 2-1 partisan vote, the Task Force decided not to count unnotarized absentee ballots that were retained by county clerks.

Then it ends, as I made the comment before—and the point I was trying to make is for a special election—and it says: "In these circumstances the by no means unusual or cumbersome remedy of a special election is in order."

The point I was trying to make is—and I know the gentleman is a fair-minded person, too—darn, you know you want to do the right thing by both of these people, and reasonably it will make a difference with different counties involved and everything else, but a special election would turn it back to the people of the Eighth District of Indiana and let them make a decision. I think that is fair, and that is the point I was trying to make.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I agree. I just wanted to get the rest of the editorial in.

Would the gentleman agree that a description of the task force's proceedings as a "rape" might not be a fair description, as a fair-minded person?

Mr. WALKER. Yes. The gentleman from Colorado, I think, expressed our sentiments. We think that might be a little mild.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. You think that might be a little mild?

Frankly speaking, I watched the debate last night, and I, frankly, do not know what went on in the task force and I for one am very interested in finding the technicalities.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Just a second. It is his time.

Mr. WALKER. I continue to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I watched it last night. I do not know the technicalities of this question, and I am very interested in finding out the answers to the technicalities of this question. If I think technically the vote was misconstrued, I will vote that way. I do not know the technicalities, and I want to hear them. But there were descriptions last night that were absolutely out of order with the decorum of this House.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I hope the gentleman understands that one of the reasons that is taking place is because there is a very, very strong feeling on our side of the aisle. I am not certain that many of the Members on that side of the aisle understand the depth of concern about this issue. It is a concern with an issue that we feel is fundamental to the minority; that if in fact this process is allowed to go forward conducted in the way it has been conducted thus far, that it runs the risk of perhaps disenfranchising much of the minority over a period of time.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. One of the things I was noticing last night, I happen to be chairman of a small subcommittee. I am proud to be chairman of the small subcommittee. I have an outstanding ranking minority member by the name of JACK FIELDS from Texas. Last night it was consistently said all the time about suppressing the rights of the minority.

Now, I feel pretty confident, to tell you the truth, that the subcommittee that I happen to have the privilege of chairing, that I do not think the minority would say that.

The first bill that will come to this floor out of that subcommittee is the bill sponsored by the excellent ranking minority member, JACK FIELDS from Texas. That is the first bill we acted upon.

I mean, there were descriptions last night saying things we do in the majority that were absolutely inaccurate.

Mr. WALKER. Let me yield to the gentleman from California and then I will get to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Since the gentleman listened to the debate last night——

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Three hours is all.

Mr. HUNTER. Let me just ask the gentleman this. The point of our argument was this. It was that they counted unnotarized absentee ballots that had been distributed to the precincts, which actually was an improper move under the task force analysis; but when Mr. McCloskey got four votes ahead and they had some 29 unnotarized absentee ballots with real people's names on them and real people's addresses on them, the task force says, "Even though there were notarized statements or there were sworn statements from the county clerks that they had secured those ballots, nobody messed with them," they said, "We don't want to count the last 29 ballots."

Now, my question to the gentleman, and he has asked some fair questions of us, would the gentleman have counted the last 29 ballots?

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. It depends on what the certification was. I do not have the information, I do not.

Frankly, if a person was not very close within this task force situation, I, frankly, do not know how we would have the information. I know that the chairman of the task force makes an argument on those 29 ballots. I have not heard that. I think we are going to have a chance to hear that tomorrow. I want to hear that argument. I have heard the argument the gentleman said. I want to hear that other argument.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the gentleman to make that analysis when it comes forth, to look at the facts and come back and tell us he would have counted all the ballots.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I say to my friend from California, I will absolutely do that. I want to have a chance to see all the facts. I have not.

Mr. WALKER. I hope the point is made in the gentleman's caucus tomorrow that the official counter hired by the House at some expense did in fact tell the task force and tell the House Administration Committee today that he would have counted the ballots. That is something that is getting lost in this whole process.

We are dealing in very fine technicalities, but the person that we hired, who supposedly was to tell us how this election should have been conducted, said today on the record, it is on tape of him saying that he would have counted the ballots. It was a task force decision not to count the ballots.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWRY of Washington. I will complete on this and then I will sit and listen some more.

I will make sure I ask that question tomorrow, I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I also want to say that I did not raise the point on the cost of this special order.

I also want to say, the gentleman forgot about that special order. There was a special order here 2 or 3 years ago on behalf of the nuclear weapons freeze. It really was on behalf of the nuclear weapons freeze, but it was the whole nuclear arms race that went all night. I participated in that. I was part of the organizer of that and I thought that was a very good thing to do.

I am not a person that thinks that having a special order on an important issue is wrong. I think it is right; but I do believe that we all have a responsibility to deal with fairness to the facts and try to get as much information as we can.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I thank the gentleman. I think the gentleman makes an excellent point.

The thing is about the special orders is that they do provide an opportunity to discuss in depth a lot of issues. The loss of that by nitpicking, as has been going on, I think would be a tremendous disservice to the House of Representatives and a tremendous disservice to the future of debate of serious issues in the House of Representatives because as the gentleman well knows, even though he is from the majority, there are some issues that sometimes cannot get scheduled for legislative debate and the only way we can deal with those important national issues is to bring them to the floor under procedures such as this. I know the gentleman has done that and I think it is extremely important that in the House we do it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my special order may be taken out of sequence at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE OUTRAGE OF THE INDIANA EIGHTH TASK FORCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. McCANDLESS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, I have a number of people who are interested in participating in that part of the program that I have. I yield first to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN] who has been very patient. I am sure he has something of substance to contribute.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I wonder if I might ask some questions of our colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, regarding this matter, if he would be willing to respond.

I appreciate the gentleman from Pennsylvania being willing to respond to the issue.

As I have listened to the debate on this issue over last night and the preceding weeks, there have been a number of key points that I am not sure have been spelled out clearly in the press.

First of all, if I understand the case correctly, this election was certified and then a recount was taken and it was recertified, that the Democratic candidate had some concerns about the rules that were followed in counting the ballots.

Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the procedure that Indiana used was challenged in court.

Mr. WALKER. It is my understanding that a case could have been brought under the Federal Contested Elections Act if in fact there was a valid court case, but the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. McCloskey, who it seems to me has the burden of proof on him because he was not certified and Mr. McIntyre was, never brought a suit under the Federal Contested Elections Act.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Let me see if I understand this correctly. The House is questioning the validity of the Indiana State laws as to whether or not they are proper and constitutional and yet the loser in that election, the Democratic candidate, chose not to contest those Indiana laws in the courts of this country.

Mr. WALKER. Well, if the gentleman will yield, I would say to the gentleman that that is correct, and not only that, but when we got to the question of whether or not Indiana laws had resulted in fraud, the task force itself reported, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] reported to the task force that they found absolutely no evidence of any kind of fraud within the process, so that in fact we were not dealing with a situation as was described to us on opening day where an election was held under questionable circumstances.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman hold this off for 1 second and yield to me?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Would the other two gentleman from California on the floor please take the microphones? This is very important. There is one open at the Democratic leadership desk.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Are we going to call this the "California connection"?

Mr. DORNAN of California. I wanted to point out to the gentleman from California that the gentleman from California [Mr. McCANDLESS] is now a historical figure. During the gentleman's special order we have now set a House record for the longest continuous session in 197 years and I think that it is a proud moment for the State of California that all of us are here protecting the Constitution under the tutelage of the two distinguished gentlemen whose fascinating conversation I so historically interrupted.

I would just like to say that the questioning and probing of this gentleman and all of us is going to continue to elucidate the facts tonight.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It is quite apparent that more than 150 years of precedent has been set by the decision that was made by this House in not seating a representative from any district, not only the Eighth District.

We all know that precedent indicated that a Member should have been seated and then if there was a question that had taken place as to whether or not that Member had been duly elected, he should have stepped aside.

So while the gentleman says that precedent has been set as far as the length of this special order, it is tragic that the precedent was set in not providing a half million people of the Eighth District of Indiana an opportunity to have a representative in the most important deliberative body in the world.

I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, I thank my two colleagues from California.

I would like to reiterate that it is not with the desire or gladness that we break the record, but it was with the need to express ourselves on a subject that goes far beyond the time that was involved.

I yield again to my colleague, the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California.

I have just two other questions for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if he would be so kind to respond.

We had established that the Democratic candidate who lost the election in Indiana did not object or contest the validity of the Indiana laws in the courts of this country.

Let me ask the House of Representatives. Did the Democratic majority who have thus far set aside the laws of the State of Indiana, can the gentleman tell me the laws that they have set aside, what their purpose was?

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman that I am not familiar in enough detail with the specifics of the task force to know exactly what they set aside.

In adopting their rules, however, they did set aside certain of the procedures in the State of Indiana that I would interpret as being the guards against fraud.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. In other words, the laws that were set aside here were ones that were meant to protect the ballot box against fraud and provide proper authentication and so on?

Mr. WALKER. That would be my interpretation for the reasons for those laws. And most of the ones set aside were in fact in that category.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Do I understand also, were the laws of Indiana set aside by the Democratic majority, do those laws conflict with Federal laws in this area? Is there a Federal statute that outlaws those? Does the Voting Rights Act outlaw the Indiana law?

Mr. WALKER. No. The only thing I would say to the gentleman is that the Federal Contested Elections Act was set up in order to resolve such disputes and that if in fact you believe that the laws of your State have somehow disenfranchised voters, or in some way impacted adversely upon your election, you can take those kinds of contests to the Federal Courts, to the Federal Contested Elections Act. That was the whole reason for putting it into place, and it is passing strange that the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. McCloskey never sought to use that remedy as a part of the case that he made.

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Let me just review the facts if I understand them. If I have misstated them I hope Members of the House will correct me.

But first of all, if I understand correctly, the Democratic candidate did not choose to contest the Indiana laws in court. No challenge was brought to that certification of the Republican candidate in the courts of this country.

Second, those laws were meant to protect the validity of the ballot box and protect the integrity of the process.

Third, the House has chosen to set aside those laws even though they do not conflict with the Federal standards and the Federal statutes that are on the books.

I just would observe one thing. I think it is terribly important that this body, when it makes its final decision, answer the question of why in breaking the rules and setting up new rules they were not applied consistently.

One last thing from the gentleman from California, if I might be permitted just a few seconds more. I would like to observe with regard to the cost of this body, I think it is very appropriate we begin to think about the cost to this body and we ought to talk about specifics. The fact is we have 1,200 policemen that guard this building and our offices, 1,200. If we want to control spending and we are concerned about the costs, let me suggest that we can get by with less than half that.

Mr. DREIER of California. How many elevator operators?

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. We have in the past spent close to a million a year for elevator operators. Actually that sum is down, but there is still a large number of them.

The folks who are listening to these proceedings should understand that those are elevators that are automatic, that require no operator.

I would just mention with regard to the committees, it was mentioned as to the cost of the Congress in the past. The district that I represented when I came to Congress is the Fourth District of Colorado. The chairman for many, many years of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in the House of Representatives was a Democratic Member. When Wayne Aspinall came to Congress there were four full-time staffers on the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee. They did more work when they had four staffers than at any time since. That is not a subjective judgment. I mean the number of bills and the number of bills referred to the committee, and the number of bills passed and acted on, and the legislation performed by four full-time staffers.

I think Americans would be shocked to realize that we had 73 full-time staffers last year and they do less work than the 4 people did.

I mean any time we want to talk about cost around this place, let me assure the gentleman all we have to do is drive in the garage and you pass seven parking attendants to get to your parking spot in this place. Now you know even Members of Congress can find their parking spot after a while.

If we want to talk about waste and extravagance and expense, I think it is an important subject and I would hope that we might deal with that subject directly, because, believe me, there is no part of the Government, the executive, the judicial or anything involved in the legislative process that has overspent and wasted money as badly as this House of Representatives. And I hope that we will take that subject up as we consider the debate.

I thank the gentleman from California for yielding.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I thank the gentleman from Colorado for his comments. They are well taken and I certainly subscribe to some of the cost cutting that I also have observed.

Mr. COBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COBLE] who has been very patient.

Mr. COBLE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania earlier when we were discussing costs indicated that all of the majority have voted to pay two Congressmen or two Members from Indiana. I believe technically there were four or five on the other side who voted with us, so technically they all did not vote in an exercise of extravagance. That is a technical point and I think the gentleman probably did not intend to imply they all did. I think four or five did vote to seat McIntyre.

I will be very brief. I thank the gentleman again for having yielded.

Someone called attention to the fact that the Washington Post did not agree with the descriptions that were used on this floor last evening regarding the rape that was committed against the minority Members of this House in the task force decision to refuse to seat McIntyre in the Indiana contest. I think that is subject to interpretation as to whether or not a rape occurred.

The fact that the Washington Post has in fact called for a special election in the case clearly indicates to me that the Post editorial board was not happy with the manner in which the task force conducted itself. Certainly the majority members of that task force, and I am in agreement, I think perhaps that, as was said earlier, Mr. Speaker, the word "rape" very likely was an appropriate descriptive term as to what occurred to the voters in the Eighth District of Indiana.

I thank the gentleman from California for yielding.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I thank the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DREIER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank my California colleague for yielding. I must say what I said just a few moments ago, that precedent had been set by not seating a Representative from the Eighth District of Indiana. But really there has been a continual performance of abuse by the majority party in several processes. One of the most important was that of the process of redistricting in California.

In the last election we received as Republicans 49.6 percent of the votes to the Democrat's 48.4 percent of the vote. Yet because of that process of gerrymandering we, as Republicans, only hold 40 percent of those seats while the majority party holds 60 percent of the seats.

We have one of the victims, fortunately having returned as a new Member of Congress, but he was a victim of that redistricting process, and that is my good friend from California [Mr. DORNAN]. I would like to hear from him a little assessment of what that process did to him and if there was in fact continued abuse on the part of the majority party.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield to my other colleague from California [Mr. DORNAN]

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman. There is a great sociological as well as adventure work of written art called "Lord of the Rings" by a famous British author, and it shows how a group of young students in an airplane crash on an island, without the benefit of adult supervision passing on tradition to them eventually returned to a barbaric and a primitive state. It has been stated by many anthropologists and sociologists that civilization is only 18 years at any given point from barbarism, assuming that it takes from 1 to 18 years of educating our young daughters and sons into our civilization to save them from reverting to this barbaric state.

Now, if that is true, that means that the depth of our civility, our traditions, and in a House like this the word we discussed at length last night, the comity, the good feeling that we have for one another, those traditions are built up over a long time. And they can unravel very quickly.

I maintain since my distinguished friend from California has brought it up that the reapportionment, butchery would be a better way to describe it than gerrymandering, because Gov. Elbridge Gerry from Massachusetts, who did his handicraft work with maps in the period of 1809, 1810 and gave the name salamander to a district that has a long swooping tail on it and probably included the Cape Cod area, that rough use of the pencil to craft out maps to someone's political advantage is nothing resembling the butchery that took place in California.

Now I maintain that the arrogance of what the Democratic majority got away with in the State of California so impressed, in an ugly and negative way, some of the Members on the majority side of the aisle in this House that it began to desensitize them to civility, to decency, to the comity in the House.

Mr. DREIER. I would like to ask my friend about his particular case. What exactly happened?

Mr. DORNAN of California. My district was a coastal district that had been slowly put together through two prior reapportionments. Because people tend to hold onto their property longer when it is near the ocean and has a beautiful ocean breeze and my prior district with the number of 27, much different than the 27th represented now by MEL LEVINE of California, was really a district that was smog-free because the ocean breezes blowing off beautiful Santa Monica Bay held back the infamous Los Angeles smog. That district was a string of pearls, I call it, of Republican cities along the coast because they had deep tradition of people putting down roots and staying in these beautiful cities.

When it was conceded to the Republican Party, adjoining four Democratic districts as it did, after the 1960 census and the 1970 census I knew getting elected in 1976 that I would be up against it in 1982 to hold onto this seat if the Democratic majority played with it at all.

Now the late gentleman that some Members here are trying to break precedent and name Federal parks after, Mr. Phillip Burton, carried a longstanding grudge against me. I do not mind talking about the past. He is probably in heaven now so he could not care.

He came on my television show in Los Angeles in another life and he accused a great Senator, George Murphy, of being a racist.

Senator Murphy, when he got elected, jerked the appointment of a gentleman who he didn't even know, they were just names on a piece of paper. One of them I believe was called Cecil Poole, who happened to be a fine black attorney from the San Francisco area, a Democrat, an activist. Senator Murphy did not know who he was. He just jerked the name to put in his appointee. After all, he had beaten Pierre Salinger.

With this, Burton, who was either in the assembly in California or just in the State senate, said that George Murphy was a racist. I told him there was not a racist bone in Senator Murphy's body. He is still alive and well and can take care for himself. He was in Washington. This was in Los Angeles.

So I said "Retract that statement and if you do not retract that statement you are not half the man he is and if you do not I will throw you off my television show."

Burton would not retract the statement so I threw him off my television show.

Well, Phil Burton had a long memory. So he told our colleague, JERRY LEWIS, told our colleague, BILL THOMAS, "I am going to get DORNAN if it is the last thing I do." So I got on the train on the way to the Rayburn Building one day and I said, "Phil, tell me, would you really carry a grudge for over a decade? Are you going to do any particular carving on my seat?" And he looked at me with that big innocent look that he could affect and he said "I am a mere servant of the Lord." That is why I have to assume he is in heaven because he is a servant of the Lord.

Mr. DREIER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Well, he proceeded to cut my seat up, if you want to step on my punchline. But no, go ahead. He cut it in three pieces is what he did. And the northern piece is now represented by a fine Congressman, MEL LEVINE, a middle piece is kind of spread out over several areas. The bottom half, beautiful Palos Verdes, is represented by our colleague, DAN LUNGREN, very well. So that was the end of the 27th District. He did me a favor. He pushed me into the U.S. Senate primary. I got to see northern California. That was a delightful year for me. Then I was on the beach for 2 years. I was hanging around the Cloakroom, walking around the floor; sometimes you guys would say hello to me, sometimes you would not. Usually you are nice to me.

Then BILL DANNEMEYER said, "DORNAN, I found your seat. What was left of the 27th District slid into Orange County and some guy named Jerry Patterson has it. Go take it back from him." And I did and it is a happy ending. I was even walking through the halls today thinking what a lucky fellow I am.

Mr. DREIER of California. We are very happy that you took that seat back. I think what you have just demonstrated is the arrogance that we are seeing and the treatment of the election of the Eighth District of Indiana is a continuation of behavioral patterns that we have seen in the past on the part of the majority party.

I thank my friend from California for yielding.

Mr. DORNAN of California. If the gentleman from California would allow me to just bridge this assumption of mine which I think is quite valid, I do believe that that act of arrogance in chopping up our California congressional, senate, and State assembly seats was so overdone that even Phillip Burton in his wildest dreams never thought he would get away with it. They thought with Reagan's big victory in 1980, his tremendous legislative victories in this House in 1981 and 1982 that they were doomed in 1982. Now this is early 1982. They thought they were going to get wiped out again in the 1982 midterm elections.

Well, Burton said, "I will draw the most outlandish district in the history of this Nation in two centuries." And he proceeded to do it and announced to the world, "This is my contribution to abstract modern art." And he laughed, expecting to get his knuckles rapped.

When the American public did nothing, when the Republican Party did nothing, a few thousand dollars were allocated to fight back, and they got away with it, they passed around the maps in the Democratic Cloakroom and they said, "My God, what is this crap? These are your maps in California? Why the Republicans are doormats. Let's walk on their faces. We can get away with anything. Look at these stupid maps."

Mr. DREIER of California. So they are doing the same to us in Indiana right now.

Mr. DORNAN of California. That set the pattern of what we are seeing here with a sleazy three-vote margin. Three votes was not good enough, three. I told TONY COELHO in the hall 2 days earlier, "TONY, you had better come up with five. Anything else really stinks, reeks to high heaven like a rotting fish held up to the moonlight." You know what? They could not quite get it to five because they had the three win and they know that sounds kind of funny. Three, twee. A twee-vote win. They looked at it. They had 22 ballots that cut 11/11. So that would have brought it up, both sides even still with the three spread.

Ask BILL THOMAS about that ugly last session with much yelling. Again they decided, "Well, here is a ballot that has a mark on it. Is that a mark? I don't know. Get the magnifying glass. Yes, it looks like a mark to me. Throw it out. Then it will only come up 10 and 11." Or I think it was 12 and 11. They squeaked out in the last session, THOMAS shouting back no and the other two saying, "Sorry, 2-1, we whipped you." They even took the fourth vote. So then it had the ring of four instead of twee.

And that is the sleazy way this whole operation went. The truth is I am embarrassed for the majority party, I am embarrassed for my friends in that party, I am embarrassed for this House. It seems like a bad dream. I do not believe this is happening.

Mr. DREIER of California. Does it surprise you, though, based on the California redistricting?

Mr. DORNAN of California. Yes, I admit to being stupidly naive. I sat over here with our good friend, HENRY HYDE, when Rick McIntyre was not sworn in and he was seated a few chairs away. I said, "HENRY, I think they have got themselves in a bind. They have got their juices flowing a little overeagerly, It happens sometimes in the NRCC. TONY COELHO is trying to play catch-up with GUY VANDER JAGT in the money department. He is falling way short. He is a little bit jealous and angry. So they are reaching here. The Speaker is a tough Irish politician. I love him because I like to think of myself as a tough Irish politician at least one day a week." And I said further, "The Speaker is uncomfortable with this. So is the very eloquent gentleman, the articulate gentleman from Texas. They are going to go through some motions here and they will eventually seat Rick McIntyre. Why not put up a little fight? The sad thing, it is going to cost them some money."

Now we find out we are going to pay them.

You know what HENRY HYDE did? He pulled back in his chair and he looked at me and he said, "BOB, you have got to be kidding. What is the matter with you? Don't you know they will not go through this operation without stealing this seat? What do you think they did to you in California with these ugly maps out there that you showed me that I still can hardly believe?"

I said, "HENRY, this is before the public. This is a man's congressional seat. No way."

Well, I was wrong. I mean I am shocked, surprised, abused; I feel like a little kid in school who had my balloons blown up in front of me. I do not believe yet that they can pull this off. I still think there is a chance that wiser heads like our great Speaker and our great majority leader will pull back from this and say, "Let's have a special election and let's have Tony and Guy duke it out in the Eighth District of Indiana with great 30-second spots. We'll all go up into the precinct. It will be a great catharsis and we will all be satisfied with whomever wins."

I do not believe they are going to get away with three votes pushed up to four, and pull off this rape. I do not believe they will do it.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of reluctance to subject the citizens of Indiana to more politicking than anyone should have to endure just to have a voice in Congress, there is only one way to settle the mess in the Eighth District of Indiana once and for all.

We must conduct a special election in that district, and if the majority party in this House has any shred of decency and fair play left, they will agree to do so.

From the very beginning, this has been a case which the majority party has used to shatter precedents.

I should note that it hasn't been just Republicans crying foul play on this case. Newspapers all over the country, including the Washington Post, have editorialized that Mr. McIntyre should have been seated regardless of whether the House conducted a recount—for the obvious reason that no district should be denied representation in Congress, regardless of how close the election was.

Unfortunately, it wasn't enough for the House leadership to deny the people of that district representation for 4 months. The task force has held out of the count 29 nonnotarized absentee ballots, even though many other ballots improperly marked and identified have been counted in this recount. It's not surprising to learn that those 29 ballots are held by county clerks in counties that McIntyre won.

Mr. Speaker, this entire episode has reminded me of an Aesop's Fable, a fable that clearly reminds us of the importance of taking responsible action—and having the courage to do what is right.

This fable was recorded more than 2,500 years ago, but its message speaks clearly to our responsibility here today:

A certain cat that lived in a large country house was so vigilant and active, that the mice, finding their numbers grievously thinned, held a council, with closed doors, to consider what they had best do.

Many plans had been started and dismissed, when a young mouse, rising and catching the eye of the president, said that he had proposal to make, that he was sure must meet with the approval of all. "if," said he, "the cat wore around her neck a little bell, every step she took would make it tinkle; then, ever forewarned of her approach, we should have time to reach our holes. By this simple means we should live in safety, and defy her power."

The speaker resumed his seat with a complacent air, and a murmur of applause arose from the audience. An old gray mouse, with a merry twinkle in his eye, now got up, said that the plan of the last speaker was an admirable one; but he feared it had one drawback, He had told them who should put the bell around the cat's neck.

Mr. Speaker, it is time the majority party in this House does what is right—by conducting a special election to settle this matter once and for all.

Together, Mr. Speaker, we must put the bell on the cat.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee.

I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. STRANG. I thank the gentleman from California, and I congratulate those gentlemen from California who were here at this particular historic moment, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that the speaker himself is from California; probably had not planned to spend his time on this historic occasion, but I think it is an important one.

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, we are going to be faced with a decision in the next day or two to decide on whether or not to seat Frank McCloskey from Indiana in a seat which he lost and never contested.

This was an election—and we must remember this—in which the proper procedures in the State of Indiana were followed at all times. The proper Representative was sent here with certification. The loser, Mr. McCloskey, never disputed this election.

The procedures followed by this House of Representatives in counting the ballots have been totally and entirely in contravention of Indiana law. There is no provision in Indiana law for the kinds of procedures and countings that went forth.

The problem comes even beyond that. That was the failure of our Representatives to follow out their own plan of counting. And so we find, we get down to the end, we find ballots that were counted that should not have been counted, ballots that should have been counted that were not counted, and in some cases, more ballots counted then there were people registered on the lists.

Mr. Speaker, this is an appalling charade, and I hope and I trust that the words from the distinguished gentleman from Washington will be heeded by his colleagues.

Let us look at these items one by one by one, and I, for one, will join them in comity to try to resolve this terrible problem.

Mr. McCANDLESS. I thank the gentleman from Colorado for his remarks.

A lot has been said in the prior hours of the special orders, a lot of partisanship has surfaced, unintentionally, and probably will be felt for many years to come.

Unfortunately, what we have here in the way of an issue does have to take on the partisan aspect of the House. It is difficult to work in a subcommittee, to work in a committee, work here on the floor of the House, without the cooperation of your colleagues. That cooperation is essential not only for the legislative process but for the good and long-term benefit of the Nation as well as this House of Representatives. But in this particular case, irrespective of whether this went on all last night, or whatever took place, the subject matter is so deep and so strongly felt by some of us—in my case, a person who spent 12 years in county government responsible for the electoral process—that we had to vent our spleen, so to speak.

But, in summary, I would like to bring up four points that I feel are relevant to the subject that have a direct bearing on why that one straw, when it hit the camel, the camel went down, his back broken. The House Democrats claim that Indiana's election law failed to produce an election result upon which the House can confidently rely. They demand a process that was timely, regular and fair, one untainted by partisan pressures.

The task force failed to meet these standards. But to say they failed to meet these standards, one must say why, and there are four basic reasons. One, inconsistency, the unnotarization of absentee ballots. Let me explain.

In their second hearing when McCloskey was behind 12 votes in the running totals, the task force voted to count unopened, unnotarized, absentee ballots mistakenly sent to precincts on election day. In their final hearing, when McCloskey had moved into a three-vote margin, the task force voted not to count the identical ballots held by and kept secure by county clerks.

Item 2, the ad hoc rulemaking on distinguishing marks. In deciding whether to count more than 30 ballots bearing stray marks, the task force made numerous, subjective and inconsistent decisions. In its final meeting, the task force counted the ballots bearing a large star or an asterisk as the voter's mark, despite the fact that the task force recount director used that very symbol as an example of a prohibited distinguishing mark when instructing the GAO auditors.

Item 3, not a full, fair count ballot reconciliation. In 103 instances, there were more votes than voters or more voters than votes. When McCloskey needed votes, spoiled or invalid ballots were counted, despite this problem. When a McIntyre ballot was at issue, the task force used a reconciliation of the poll book figures and ballots to invalidate the vote.

Four, a blatantly political process, conclusions before reasons. Indiana was never given the opportunity to rebut unsubstantiated charges that its election certification and recount were inconsistent and haphazard. The task force simply adopted so-called counting rules which replaced Indiana election law with procedures claiming to count every ballot on which the intent of the voter could be determined.

When McCloskey took a slim lead, the task force majority concluded that the remaining absentee ballots were of a different class and should not be counted.

So much for the intent of the voters.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

RICK McINTYRE SHOULD HAVE BEEN HERE TO VOTE TODAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, there have been many votes in this House that have been decided by one, two or three votes. It is not just the affront to our Constitution that concerns us about the seating of Rick McIntyre in Indiana's Eighth District; it is the fact that over this next year and 8 months there may be a vote before this distinguished deliberative body that actually will be determined by one vote.

If Mr. Rick McIntyre had been here today—and I have heard the gentleman speak, he is very articulate, he is eloquent—I believe he would have spoken in support of the President.

There is an historical piece out of Time magazine dated May 5, 1947, that I came across today, and it reminded me of two of the beautiful statues, one the heroic figure of a woman and one of a man on the north side of our Archives Building here in Washington, DC. The beautiful statue's base to the east side of the northern facade of the building has emblazoned on the front of the stand, "What is past is prologue." On the other side is the admonition, "Study the past."

Well, as far as studying the past of this House, it was mentioned several times that there was a direct analogy to the debate in this Chamber and the other body over the assistance in 1947 and 1948 to Greece and to Turkey, the Greek freedom fighters being those very people fighting in the shadow of the Acropolis and the beautiful Parthenon to keep Greece part of the free world, and that was a successful struggle.

Here is something to jog our memories in that Time magazine of May 5, 1947 that begins with the vote tally, 67 to 23, in support of Democratic President Harry Truman to help the Greeks and Turks.

It opens up with this paragraph:

If Congress fails to act, aggression will get the green light and the rest of the world, including America, will get the red light.

They way Sen. Arthur Vandenberg defined the issue last week, the Truman Doctrine was sure to win Senate approval. However reluctant some Senators might be, they concurred with Vandenberg's warning against "the cost of noncompliance. Even the opposition floor leader, Sen. Edwin C. Johnson, who charged the $400 million program to bulwark Greece and Turkey against Communist Russia was "in reality a declaration of war"— knew he was fighting a losing battle.

We had our alarmists then, too—

By the way, do you know what $400 million would have been worth in 1947 compared to this paltry $14 million that we are trying to eke out for the Democratic resistance forces fighting for all of us here on North America's soil in the northern and southern parts of the nation in Nicaragua? I believe $400 million in 1947—and this is a wild guess—would be equivalent to about $2 billion of economic and military aid today.

Back to the short Time story:

"Once 2 weeks of soul-searching debate ended on last Tuesday, April 22"—incidentally, Lenin's birthday—"the Senate voted 67-23"—no 10 hours of debate. We thought we were being so gracious here today deciding Nicaragua's fate in 10 hours, they debated 2 weeks in the Senate about the Greek and the Turkish aid. Then once the voting was over, here is the breakdown: 35 Republicans for aid to Greece and Turkey and 32 Democrats. There is a bipartisan foreign policy that stops division once you cross the beach to face out to the rest of the world with a unified foreign policy.

"The noes comprised a rare alliance of 16 Republicans (mostly Midwestern isolationists)"—and we saw a few of those today—"4 conservative Democrats"—names consigned to history—"(Johnson, Kenneth McKellar, Harry S. Byrd"—I overlap him by a few years—"and W. Lee O'Daniel), and 3 Wallace-minded leftwing Democrats . . ." can you believe that Newsweek and Time and the networks used words like "leftwing" in those days? Today they only use words like "rightwing." Everybody else is just an honorable liberal. But three leftwing Wallace-minded Democrats. Get these names: James E. Murray, Glen Taylor and CLAUDE PEPPER.

Senator CLAUDE PEPPER, our own, beloved Congressman CLAUDE PEPPER. It shows that you can mature and change in your positions, because we were pleased to see not only my chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the Honorable DANTE FASCELL, voting with President Reagan today, but there was CLAUDE PEPPER. Educated over the years by all of the great and honorable Cubans who have fled to his beautiful State of Florida, and all of the Nicaraguans that are already there, and the Salvadorans, and the Hondos, and the Tikas and the Nikas and the Guademateks, and all the people fleeing Central America to watch Miami Vice, in Miami, on Friday nights.

Now, the story concludes:

Specifically, the Senate voted, one: To send $150 million in Greek economic rehabilitation; an equal amount for Greek military aid. No pikers then; they know you have to send military aid to protect the economic aid. And $100 million for Turkish military aid. Even then the Greek lobby was stronger than the Turkish lobby here in the Halls of Congress.

Two, furnish military equipment. And three; this would send shivers through some of the majority speakers today; send military missions and civilian supervisory staffs. That was to see where the money was going.

By the way, in those days we all had only two or three staffers, so we needed a little help to see where the money was going. And four, here is the idealism, four: Authorize the United Nations to take over the program should it be willing and able; the United Nations that is.

The concluding paragraph. Broadly, the Senate's vote was a vote against the traditional ideas of isolationism and neutrality. A vote in favor of containing communism; thank you, President Truman. A vote for shouldering international burdens formerly carried by the British Empire. A vote to support President Truman's plan to help free peoples to maintain their free institutions and national integrity against aggressive movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian regimes.

But although the Secretary of State, George C. Marshall, attached the highest order of urgency to immediate passage, the Greek-Turkish aid ran into delay in the House of Representatives because of bitter bickering.

What has changed since 1947? The bickering goes on here; the Contra freedom fighters, the Democratic Resistance in Nicaragua runs lower and lower on ammunition. Some mother's sons are fighting for our freedom down there, and the disinformation goes on.

However, we turned a corner today. El Salvador was not woven into the debate today as an integral part of the debate with much hot rhetoric about right wing death squads and the terrible mess that El Salvador is in. Why? Because Mr. JIM JONES on the other side, with me, and Mr. VIN WEBER of Minnesota saw democracy in action on Palm Sunday. Beautiful processions with Jesus Christ statues being held and palms being laid at the feet of the processionists. No "Turbas Devinas," undevine, ugly mobs beating up on people, practicing their religion as goes on in the neighboring country of Nicaragua.

Intermixed with all of these Palm Sunday processions was the great celebration of a free, open election in the small country named after Jesus Christ himself. The formal name being, "Nuestro Senor El Salvador del Mundo." In that country named, "Our Lord, the Savior of the World," Jose Durate had a great victory, and in the midst of his euphoria reminding me of all of us politicians on our election nights, I asked the President, "Are you having this great election freedom and this fine triumph for you in the National Assembly because kids are dying in Nicaragua taking the pressure off you?"

He said, "That is precisely correct, Congressman." Congressman JIM JONES was sitting there as he said it, and so was VIN WEBER of Minnesota.

I wish that Rick McIntyre had been with us to vote today. Then, although we lost 40 Republicans, that would have been one more Republican with us. It would have made the vote that much closer, because I repeat, we have turned the corner on this.

I think what I will do, out of deference to the great staff that we have here in the House, the unsung heroes in all of the various rooms and performing all of the very necessary functions to make this great Congress of the United States function. I completely associate myself with the words of my distinguished colleague from Arkansas [Mr. BILL ALEXANDER], that everybody has shown great forbearance and respect for the system by just loyally carrying on during this, the longest session in the history of the Congress of the United States in 196½ years.

I hope that the staff knows that although we do not say it nearly as often as we should, we do appreciate their great efforts on our behalf and in working for their country with such diligence.

With those well-deserved words for our great staff here in the Congress of the United States, I would like to move that we adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. BADHAM (at the request of Mr. MICHEL), for today, on account of illness in the family.

Mr. DANIEL (at his own request), until further notice, on account of personal reasons.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. YOUNG of Florida, for 5 minutes, today.

SEC. 128. AN OFFICIAL RESIDENCE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

(a) PROHIBITION.—Until the Congress expressly authorizes such acceptance by law, the United States may not accept a gift of any residence or other structure for the purpose of providing a place of official residence for the Secretary of State or any other official of the Department of State.

(b) STUDY AND REPORT.—The Secretary of State shall conduct a study of any offer of a gift described in subsection (a). Such study shall include an examination of the costs to the United States associated with accepting such gift which relate to the proposed acquisition, maintenance, security, and daily operation of a residence. The Secretary shall transmit the report of any study conducted under this section to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Public Works and Transportation of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

HEALTH CARE HEARING FLOOR STATEMENT

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, in February, my Georgia colleague, Congressman J. ROY ROWLAND and I held an informal hearing at Mercer University's Medical School on the subject of health care.

We heard testimony from 20 expert individuals, representing many facets of our Nation's health care system. The witnesses included physicians, dentists, hospital administrators, home health care professionals, and representatives of insurance companies and health-related Government agencies. We also heard from representatives of associations of older Americans as well as attorneys, businessmen, and educators.

These people raised varying concerns about our Nation's health care system. However, each one of them voiced concern over the continued ability of people to afford adequate health care. As several of the witnesses starkly described the situation, health care is rapidly moving toward the point where it will be available only to the wealthy or it will be completely subsidized by the Government.

Congressman ROWLAND and I are today transmitting this testimony to the Committee on Ways and Means, since we believe that it may benefit the committee. The people who spoke before us are professionals who can offer us practical insight into the problems that face us in health care. They defined for us several of the causes of high health care costs, and also offered several solutions. It is our hope that the committee will carefully consider their suggestions.

One of the witnesses, Charles Foster, Jr., administrator of the West Georgia Medical Center in Lagrange, GA and chairman of the board of the Georgia Hospital Association, made several recommendations which are both cost-effective and workable. He suggests that we consider a plan where hospitals work in conjunction with the Veterans' Administration to provide inpatient and outpatient services for veterans. To quote Mr. Foster, "As the administration is recommending reforms in Veterans' Administration benefits, it is possible that contracts with community hospitals could provide both services and savings under the aegis of the Veterans' Administration." He also offers some insightful advice to all of us in handling future changes in medicare.

I am inserting Mr. Foster's testimony, and I urge all of my colleagues to read and carefully consider his suggestions. We must begin to make commonsense changes if we are to maintain an affordable, private health care system. In my opinion, those changes should be made in coordination with those people who know health care best—those who work in it daily. Mr. Foster is one of these experts, and I commend his testimony to you.

HEALTH CARE HEARING, CHARLES L. FOSTER, JR., ADMINISTRATOR, WEST GEORGIA MEDICAL CENTER

SCHOOL OF MEDICINE, MERCER UNIVERSITY, MACON, GA

Representative Ray, Representative Rowland, fellow speakers and guests, my name is Charles L. Foster, Jr. I am the administrator of West Georgia Medical Center, a 276 bed acute care hospital and 150 bed long-term care facility in LaGrange, Georgia. I currently serve as Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Georgia Hospital Association; as an advisory member to the Board of the Georgia Medical Care Foundation; as a member of the Board of the North Central Georgia Health Systems Agency; and, I was appointed by former Governor George Busbee to the State Council on Maternal and Infant Health. I also served on the Governor's Advisory Task Force which designed the current Medicaid Prospective Payment System for Georgia hospitals. It is my pleasure and privilege to bring to you today the perspective of Georgia hospitals in a rapidly changing health care environment.

The Georgia Hospital Association has prepared a position paper entitled "1985 Health Care Issues." The position paper was delivered to the Georgia Congressional Offices in Washington last week and I invite you to read the issues and their background. Recommendations have been made to assist the state's hospitals in fulfilling their mission to continue providing quality and cost effective health care to Georgians.

For your consideration today, I would like to cover some of the more important national issues affecting the hospital industry.

First, quality hospital services to Medicare patients must be reimbursed adequately by providing realistic annual allowances for inflation in the cost of goods and services, and changes in technology. Congress eliminated excessive increases in hospital payments three years ago by placing hospital inflation caps in the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act of 1982. The Social Security Act of 1983 completely changed the payment mechanism and financial incentives by implementing prospective payments using Diagnostic Related Groups, or DRG's. The phase-in of the DRG system was just under way when Congress again cut hospital payments in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. Due to these new incentives all available information show that Medicare admissions are dropping below projections, Medicare length of stay is down and inflationary costs are now well under control.

In 1985, should Congress pass legislation freezing all federal payments, hospitals will bear their proportionate share of the burden to reduce the federal deficit. However, cutting Medicare payments without dealing systematically with other expenditures, may bring disillusionment with the phase-in of the DRG system. Hospitals will then have to deal individually with the lack of government commitment to adequately fund medical care services. Many will continue to cope with the annual cuts, but in time, most will have to focus on those services that they can support on a long-term basis. We ask that hospitals be dealt with in an equitable manner. If Congress freezes various programs by withholding increases for inflation, the Medicare budget, not the DRG rates, should be frozen. This would allow for continuation of the national phase-in of the DRG system and an in-depth examination of the components of the system.

Second, the deficit problem also will bring up the subject of Medicaid caps on federal matching payments. For the past three years, federal caps have caused the states to ration payments to Medicaid providers. All Medicaid providers including physicians, nursing homes and others, are now being paid only a step or two above the allowable costs in those rationed base year periods.

Georgia has just this year become the 35th state to attempt to improve health care access to a small segment of the indigent population through a medically needy program. Federal formulas to cap costs do not compensate for past inequities in services among states. It is our recommendation that if Congress finds it necessary to reimpose federal expenditure growth caps, that Georgia and the few other states which have just now implemented medically needy programs, be allowed to "grandfather" the annual cost of these programs into the "base cost".

Third, Georgia hospitals are very interested in working with the Veterans Administration to provide inpatient and outpatient services to veterans. Utilization of existing community facilities can save the federal budget millions of dollars in new construction. As the Administration is recommending reforms in veterans administration benefits, it is possible that contracts with community hospitals could provide both services and savings under the aegis of the Veterans Administration.

Fourth, Congress will deal with recommended changes to the Medicare hospital payment system and with other health care issues. The Georgia Hospital Association recommends that the issues of capital costs, medical education costs, payments for transferred patients and outpatient services, swing beds, medical malpractice, and peer review organizations be given due consideration for the impact on Georgia hospitals. These issues and recommendations have been outlined in the earlier mentioned 1985 Health Care Issues position paper.

Fifth, the Health Care Financing Administration has completed a new hospital wage index methodology which will be used to revise Medicare DRG payments in metropolitan statistical areas and rural areas. It appears that, should Congress implement a payment freeze, most hospitals in Georgia will receive 6 to 8 percent less payment per DRG in 1986 due to the revised wage index for Georgia. In addition, legislation passed by Congress last year also provides that the wage adjustment be applied retroactive to October 1, 1983. I would like to recommend today that Congress repeal this retroactive adjustment to a prospective system. If it is not repealed, many Georgia hospitals will be paid up to 12 percent less in 1986, should there be a combined payment freeze and a retroactive pay back.

Sixth, before Congress are proposals to eliminate tax exempt financing, and to increase income tax receipts by adjusting charitable deductions. These proposals should not be adopted as they will immediately and seriously affect the ability of the hospital industry to support unprofitable services and to attract capital for equipment and plant costs. These proposals, if enacted, will immediately escalate interest costs and patient charges, adding to the cost of health care.

I would now like to take this opportunity to address two other very important issues. The first is who will assume the responsibility for indigent care? And the second is the competitive era which hospitals are entering.

On indigent care, the Georgia Hospital Association and a joint house and senate subcommittee of the Georgia General Assembly have independently prepared two reports. A few of the pertinent findings are that:

In the United States 12 percent of the population had income below the poverty level. In Georgia 17 percent of the population is below the poverty level.

Less than one-half of those classified as poor under federal guidelines can be legally covered by Medicaid.

One-third of Georgia's population, 1.8 million people, are uninsured or underinsured for health care.

One-half of the uninsured are employed, yet are not eligible for insurance programs.

When a Georgian uses hospital services, roughly 10 percent or more of the total bill goes to pay for indigent care.

In 1983, hospitals in Georgia lost approximately $188 million in uncollectible accounts and charity care and provided $21 million in free care under the Hill-Burton Act.

Thirty-nine counties have no hospitals, and 66 counties provide no funds to hospitals for indigent care.

And last; the report of The General Assembly's Joint Hospital Care for The Indigent Study Committee recommended that legislation be enacted to create an indigent care fund with financial responsibility to be shared by federal participation, state government, local governments, health care providers and indigent users.

I bring this information to your attention as the problem of indigent care funding is an emerging national issue which deserves your attention. In the past, indigent care was stated to be "the hospital's obligation". As hospitals have not had independent sources of revenues, they have been forced to proportionately increase charges to cover indigent care costs. This ability to cover uncompensated care costs by "cost shifting" is quickly coming to an end as private patients, commercial payers and self-administered employer funds are taking unprecedented steps to control health care outlays.

Consider the impact on the access to care for the poor, if Medicare freezes rates, Medicaid caps payments, third party insurers receive discounts and alternative delivery systems reduce hospital inpatient volume. With all parties cutting back on payments to support the community hospital, either contributions will have to rise to an unimaginable level, or significant local tax assessments will be necessary to provide care for the near poor and medically indigent.

As funding is required to cover indigent care, the federal government should be as cognitive of this issue as any other. For Georgia, federal support should be given to expand limited Medicaid coverage to the medically indigent. As noted earlier, new federal caps on Medicaid expenditures could disproportionately affect the ability of the Georgia provider community to care for a portion of the indigent population.

I have just mentioned third party insurer discounts and alternative delivery systems. I would like for you to know that the competition for the health care dollar, and the pressures that exist to contain costs are the greatest that they have ever been and they are increasing daily. In Georgia there are eight business coalitions, five health maintenance organizations, at least four preferred provider organizations; and unknown quantities of ambulatory surgical centers, minor emergency clinics, and numerous companies providing utilization review and billing audit services. These organizations exist for one reason, to reduce inpatient hospital utilization and related costs. In addition, employers and commercial insurance plans are encouraging cost conscious use of medical care by adding deductibles and coinsurance provisions.

All of these measures are having an effect on the hospital industry. Nationally, for the first nine months of 1984 versus 1983, there were 1.0 percent fewer admissions, 3.5 percent fewer patient days and full-time hospital employees dropped by 2.3 percent.

In the state of Georgia, many hospitals have had to eliminate positions and layoff employees due to a lower use of services. Less equipment is being purchased and increases in prices from suppliers are strongly resisted. Also hospitals are offering more outpatient and alternative health service, as well as participating with HMOs, PPOs, and the business coalitions to produce lower cost care.

My interest in addressing the changing environment of health care services is that some parties feel that the only solution to the high cost of health care is rate regulation of the hospital industry. The Georgia Hospital Association and its member institutions are vigorously opposed to rate setting and I have included with my testimony today a position paper of the GHA on this subject.

I would like to note that the Georgia Hospital Association is proud of the cost effectiveness of their member institutions and close by citing some data from the position paper:

Nationally the hospital cost per patient admission is 31 percent higher than in Georgia. In 1980, 41 other states had higher costs per stay, compared to 1983 when 44 states had higher costs per stay.

Georgia is the 19th lowest cost state on a per capita basis. The national average cost of $502 per capita is 20 percent higher than the cost of $420 in Georgia.

Georgia is the sixth lowest state in its daily semi-private room charge. According to the July, 1984 survey by the Health Insurance Association of America, the national average rate is $207 per day. This is 42 percent higher than Georgia's rate of $146 per day.

Of the 11 states whose average cost per case exceeds $3,000, five are from the group of nine mandatory rate setting states; and those rate setting programs have been in effect about seven years.

In a comparison of education costs and hospital costs to national expenditures, 37 states have a higher average teachers salary than in Georgia, but 42 states pay their hospital employees more. In both professions, the average Georgia salary is 84 percent of the national average. Compared on a per capita basis, educational costs in Georgia are 83 percent of the national average while hospital costs are 84 percent of the average.

Rate setting proponents may cite "rate of increase statistics", however, I think these hard facts show that bureaucratic agencies with their formulas and statistics cannot match our performance in Georgia. In addition, it would be a grave mistake at this time to impose regulatory controls on the hospital industry which is faced with independent and competitive forces, requiring even greater cost efficiency efforts.

I would like to thank you for this opportunity to express the views of the Georgia Hospital Association on the direction of the hospital industry. We solicit your support and pledge to work with the public and private sectors to improve upon the Georgia health care delivery system as it exists today.●

CUTS IN HIGHER EDUCATION

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, for most families and individuals paying for college will continue to be the ultimate test of the ability to plan and provide for children. However, if President Reagan has his way, many families will be forced to fail this test.

President Reagan's budget calls for a $2.3 billion reduction in financial aid for college students, largely through the elimination of federally subsidized loans to students from families whose gross income is more than $32,500 a year. Senate Republicans have subsequently offered their own compromise budget plan. The Senate plan includes deeper cuts in higher education than the Budget Committee had originally proposed. However, before the Reagan administration or this Congress seeks to limit student financial aid, particularly guaranteed student loans, each should make sure that the benefits are worth the costs.

I firmly believe that economic well-being should be among our first and most important virtues. Education has yet to be proven to be detrimental to our economy in any way. Indeed, I fully believe that education is a priceless investment in our country's future financial and national security. Education has been the key to this country's technological prowess, cultural excellence, and national superiority. Student financial assistance, such as guaranteed student loans, are an excellent vehicle through which this Nation's youth, regardless of financial status, may help to improve not only their own well-being, but also that of their country's. Because of the grave consequences any abrogation from our country's commitment to excellence in education may have, I implore my colleagues to fully investigate whether the policies proposed are worth the costs which are likely to be accrued.

Consequently, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared on Higher Education and National Affairs on April 8, 1985. The article outlines the expected benefits and costs of the budget proposals which have thus far been outlined in regard to limiting Federal assistance for student financial aid.

[From the Higher Education & National Affairs, Apr. 8, 1985]

NEW BUDGET PLAN CUTS DEEPER INTO HIGHER ED

On the eve of the congressional Easter recess, Senate Republicans and the Reagan Administration agreed on a fiscal 1986 budget compromise that would make cuts in military spending and social programs and eliminate several federal programs.

Higher education's share of the agreement includes deeper cuts than the budget committee had originally proposed (see HENA, March 25, page 1), although the cuts would not be as drastic as those the President had first requested. Congress returns April 15, and the budget is expected to move onto the Senate floor for debate the week of April 22.

According to the Office of Management and Budget (OMB), the new proposal would limit eligibility for Guaranteed Student Loans (GSLs) to families with adjusted gross incomes of $60,000. The Administration has originally proposed a $32,500 income limit.

In addition, OMB said an $8,000 annual cap would be placed on the amount of college costs that would be allowed for purposes of determining federal support. For example, if school costs amounted to $12,000 and a family could contribute only $1,000, the student could receive no more than $7,000 in federal aid. The initial Reagan budget proposal sought a $4,000 annual cap for total federal support.

OMB said the entire agreement sought a reduction in funding of $350 million in fiscal year 1986, $822 million in 1987, and $1.049 billion in 1988, amounting to a three-year total funding cut of $2.2 billion. The budget committee resolution had sought $900 million in GSL savings over the three years.

The budget compromise is expected to run into serious opposition on the Senate floor. Sen. Robert T. Stafford (R-VT), chairman of the Senate subcommittee on education, has said he will oppose the $8,000 cap, which will penalize needy students attending private institutions. Those close to the issue say they expect floor amendments to increase education funding during floor debate and that the plan will have an even rougher time in the House.●

COMMENDING WAL-MART'S "BUY AMERICA" PROGRAM

HON. JOE BARTON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend and call to the attention of the American people and the retailing community an effort by a major department store chain to keep Americans at work.

Sunday's Washington Post profiled the Wal-Mart Stores' "Buy America" program whereby the 753-store chain is making a determined effort to buy products that are made in the United States, instead of abroad.

In the words of company officials, the effort is to prove that American manufacturers can produce the quality of goods at prices comparable to imported goods.

There are many Wal-Mart stores in my congressional district in Texas and I believe consumers who are aware of our serious imbalance in trade will be aware buying at these stores will be restoring or saving jobs of their fellow Americans.

The Bentonville, AR firm which bought about 5 percent of its merchandise last year from foreign manufacturers, want to reduce that to 4 percent this year and even lower percentages in future years.

I am hopeful the chief executive officers of other retail chains will follow the lead of Wal-Mart Chairman Sam Walton.

I want to share the Post article with you and I wish Wal-Mart much success in their efforts.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 21, 1985]

WAL-MART FLYS THE FLAG IN IMPORT BATTLE—PRODS U.S. PRODUCERS WITH FAVORABLE TERMS

(By Caroline E. Mayer)

Late last year, Sam Walton, the chairman of Wal-Mart Stores Inc., gave his merchandise buyers an order: Think of a product that American manufacturers have given up on because of competition from cheaper imports.

An apparel buyer suggested inexpensive flannel shirts, virtually all of which are now made outside the United States.

Today, the 753-store discount chain has a $600,000 contract with a small Brinkley, Ark., manufacturer for 240,000 flannel shirts—one-tenth of what the company anticipates it will sell next winter.

"We've set out to prove that American manufacturers can make merchandise we sell on a competitive basis with the same quality and value as products made overseas," said David D. Glass, president of Wal-Mart, one of the nation's fastest-growing and most successful discount chains, second to K mart Corp. in size.

"As a company, we are tremendously concerned with the trade deficit" Glass said. "We see a tremendous erosion of manufacturing jobs in this country as manufacturers accelerate the movement to go offshore to make their goods. None of us will believe what this country will be like five to 10 years from now if we continue to let this happen."

Between 1981 and 1984, an estimated 1.6 million American jobs were lost to imports, Walton recently pointed out in a letter to his suppliers. "In one year [1983 to 1984], non-oil-related imports grew $70 billion, an increase of 33 percent. The trade deficit reached $123.3 billion, an increase of 78 percent. Something can and must be done to reverse this very serious threat to our free enterprise system and our great country," he wrote.

Now Walton wants to try to turn the tide. Last month the company officially launched a novel and ambitious Buy-American campaign to prod domestic manufacturers to produce more goods at home. Last year the company purchased about 5 percent of its goods from foreign manufacturers. This year, Walton said he hopes to reduce that to 4 percent through his campaign, with further reductions in the years ahead.

By offering unusual favorable terms—including longer lead times and more advantageous financial agreements—Wal-Mart hopes to prove that American manufacturers can make quality products that will match or beat the prices of imported goods.

"We are willing to work with the domestic manufacturers to a greater extent than we have done before," Glass said.

Also, Wal-Mart is willing to lower its margins to sell the goods at a competitive price, Walton said. "We are asking our manufacturers to lower their margins; in turn, we will lower ours."

However, Walton contended that profitability for the company—which earned $240 million last year on sales of $6 billion—should improve because it will force the company to make better buys. Perhaps even more significantly, the campaign will be promoted in Wal-Mart's stores, creating more "enthusiastic and appreciative customers," Walton noted.

The contract for flannel shirts with Farris Fashions Inc. is the first test of Wal-Mart's resolve.

To help Farris Fashions Inc. be price-competitive, Wal-Mart has helped locate and finance the flannel material it needed to meet the contract. "Without Wal-Mart's help, I would have given up on the project long ago," noted Farris' president, Farris Burroughs. "I kept beating my head to find piece goods and financing," he said, noting that he had called every textile manufacturer he knew, unsuccessfully looking for material. Ultimately, Wal-Mart called manufacturers to find goods and promised favorable financing terms for the goods to help Farris get a start.

Additionally, Wal-Mart "has agreed to pay us a little quicker than normal," Burroughs said.

"If I didn't have that work, I'd be hard pressed to keep my 100 employees busy," said Burroughs. "Without that contract, I'd be out beating the bushes. And with business now very slow in the shirt and blouse business, those bushes are almost all beat out."

Wal-Mart didn't have to make these arrangements, Burroughs said. "People are beating down Wal-Mart's doors to sell them goods," he asserted. "All Mr. Walton has to do is to say 'give me so many dozen.' He doesn't need to worry about" where his goods are being manufactured.

Yet he said Walton does have a direct interest in the import problem: A lot of the Americans who are losing jobs as a result of import competition are Wal-Mart customers.

"If his people are not working, they can't be buying anything. It's as simple as that," Burroughs noted.

Wal-Mart's campaign comes at the same time other major retailers are pressing the federal government to relax its import quotas on apparel. The retailers argue that the quotas hurt consumers by restricting the amount of lower-priced foreign-made goods, while raising the price of those goods that do reach this country.

"We're swimming upstream," Glass said.

Wal-Mart's Buy-American campaign was launched in a letter Walton sent to his major suppliers last month. To date, it has resulted in about half a dozen new contracts with American manufacturers, some of which already had been producing goods for Wal-Mart's stores. Most of the contracts are for work at plants in Wal-Mart's selling area in the South.

Julie Girl—which has four plants in the Southeast—has been making ladies sportswear and loungewear for Wal-Mart for the past 13 years. But under the Buy-American campaign, the company has entered into new agreements that, among other things, give Julie Girl more time to meet Wal-Mart's orders.

"Normally, big retailers go overseas and commit their orders a year in advance and then come back here and domestically place their orders closer to their needs," explained Louis Perlman, president of Julie Girl. "Wal-Mart is now making their commitments to us about the same time they make their commitments overseas. The longer lead time enables us to make better deals with domestic piece-good mills. It also gives us better production planning and allows us to become more efficient in our plants, thereby lowering our overhead and our costs."

The new Wal-Mart contracts will create about 200 more jobs for Julie Girl, Perlman said. At the same time, he added, it may have a snowball effect on Julie Girl's suppliers as they, too, are given a longer lead time in filling the manufacturers' orders.

Wal-Mart's Buy-American drive comes at a good time, noted Robert Welsh, president of Capital Mercury Shirt Corp., which has been one of Wal-Mart's longtime suppliers.

"A year ago, two years ago, even three years ago, it wouldn't be the right time because the prices overseas were very depressed," Walsh said. Today, higher labor costs and the quotas are pushing overseas prices up, "making it feasible for American manufacturers to be within striking distance," he said.

As a result of Wal-Mart's drive, Capital Mercury, which makes many of its men's shirts outside the United States, decided to bring some production back to this country and even expand some of its facilities in the hope that Wal-Mart's efforts will prod other retailers also to buy from domestic shirt makers.

"With Wal-Mart's advanced commitments as the nucleus of the Buy-American program, we believe we will now be able, on certain items, to equal or beat the offshore manufacturers—but not for all items," Welsh said.

Wal-Mart's drive goes beyond apparel. It also has entered into contracts to buy American-made electric fans and bicycles, and it has signed a $469,000 contract with a Ft. Smith, Ark., manufacturer of casual furniture to make outdoor stacking chairs that will be sold for about $15 each. Wal-Mart's had been importing the chairs from Taiwan. They've elected to give us the same arrangements they make overseas," said Don Flanders, chairman of Flanders Industries, a company with 100 employes and sales of $7 million a year. "They will make their commitments further ahead and they will pay us faster."

Typically, retailers agree to pay domestic manufacturers 30 days after an order is shipped, while they pay offshore producers at the time it is shipped, Flanders noted. By agreeing to pay Flanders when the chairs are shipped, Wal-Mart is enabling the company to produce the chairs "at less of a competitive disadvantage than an offshore firm." At the same time, the contract has created about 30 more jobs a year, Flanders said.

Until Wal-Mart offered to grant these favorable terms, Flanders said he would not have been able to include them in any of his contracts—even though they are standard provisions for his foreign counterparts.

"There are too many domestic manufacturers who compete with us that are not willing to make demands so they could get the business." Flanders said. "Only if we all went together and said, 'No, we won't do this unless you agree to this,' would it work—and that's against the law."

Not all manufacturers are enthusiastic about Wal-Mart's drive.

"One of the disappointing things is when a manufacturer says he doesn't want to participate," Glass said. "Some manufacturers who produce many of their goods offshore say 'why should I have the headaches managing people and running a plant? I'd rather contract offshore and have the goods manufactured by someone else.' "

The Buy-American drive is "more work," Glass acknowledged. "You have to work with a manufacturer—meet with him and visit his plant to inspect it for quality control. But we do it abroad."

The campaign is also a gamble, Glass noted. "Retailers are generally reluctant to commit to longer lead times to guard against economic downturns or changes in fashion. So we are taking some risks. . . .

"It is not a quick fix. Down the road, we may get to the point where we feel we are beating our head against the wall because, by ourselves, we won't make a difference."

Yet manufacturers say Wal-Mart's drive already is beginning to have an impact.

"We're getting rumblings from other retailers," said Capital Mercury's Welsh. "They won't let Mr. Walton steal the march on them because it's going to catch them."

One of the interested retailers is Wal-Mart's midwestern rival, Venture Stores, a 60-store discount chain owned by the May Co.

"Mr. Walton is absolutely right," said Julian M. Seeherman, Venture's chief executive officer. Buy-American "is the kind of statement we've been making but not getting publicity on," he added plaintively. Nonetheless, he said, Venture is contacting some of the same manufacturers Wal-Mart is doing new business with—and its own suppliers as well.

"We would be willing to help these people," he said. "One way would be to give them a guaranteed order before they buy the first dollar's worth of material."

In addition to retailers, some of the manufacturers also are receiving inquiries from outside investors.

"A New York financier called me to say he would like to get involved in helping me finance my purchases of raw material," said Farris' Burroughs.

So far, Wal-Mart's agreements have been relatively small, considering its annual purchases amount to $8.5 billion a year, noted Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, who has played an active role in Wal-Mart's campaign, partly because Wal-Mart is based in his state and partly because of the state's high unemployment rate. Among other things, Clinton was instrumental in linking Wal-Mart with Farris.

"I think this will take off. But it will have to have a slow start—because they need successes at the beginning," Clinton said.

Glass, Wal-Mart's president, said, "We don't think we're going to make a major influence in changing the trade balance in the country, but some one has to start."●

THE UNITED STATES AND ISRAEL: PARTNERS FOR PEACE AND FREEDOM

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, Secretary of State George P. Shultz delivered an outstanding speech at the Annual Policy Conference of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

He said on that occasion:

In the years to come, Israel and the United States will stand together in defense of our shared values and in support of our common goals. Our two peoples have the same vision of a better world—a world of peace and freedom, where the dignity of all men and women is respected by all nations.

In the spirit of a bipartisan foreign policy, which all of us agree is essential to the success of our international policies, I commend this excellent speech to my colleagues.

The text of the speech follows:

THE UNITED STATES AND ISRAEL: PARTNERS FOR PEACE AND FREEDOM

(Address by the Honorable George P. Shultz, Secretary of State)

We Americans are united by values and ideals that have guided us since the founding of this nation. We seek to preserve and promote freedom—freedom to vote, freedom to speak, write, think, and worship as one chooses. We believe in tolerance, and religious tolerance in particular. We believe in justice and equality under the law. We are committed to democratic government as the best, if not the only way to protect the rights, well-being, and dignity of all men and women.

We have also understood that to pursue these noble goals, we have to be strong enough to defend our country and our way of life against aggression. And we must have an equally strong commitment to international peace and security. A world of peace offers the best hope for the spread of freedom; and a world of freedom offers the best hope for lasting peace.

In the latter half of this century, both the defense of freedom and the achievement of peace have come to depend on American strength. There can only be peace when potential aggressors know that they cannot hope to achieve their aims through war. In the modern world, that means that America, as the strongest democracy on earth, has a responsibility to stand with those who share our hopes and dreams.

These principles inform every action we take in our foreign policy. Today, I would like to talk about how our ideals, our morality, and our responsibilities in the world apply to our relationship with Israel and to our hopes for peace in the Middle East.

The United States supported the creation of the State of Israel, almost four decades ago, because of moral convictions deeply rooted in the American character. We knew of the centuries of persecution suffered by the Jews, and we had witnessed the horror of the Nazi Holocaust. No decent American could fail to see the justice and necessity of a Jewish state where Jews could live without fear.

But the founding of the State of Israel also had a wider significance. Certainly, America's support for Israel has been a moral response to centuries of persecution. But the birth of Israel also marked the entrance onto the world stage of a new democracy, a new defender of liberty, a new nation committed to human progress and peace. In a world where such nations have always been the exception rather than the rule, the creation of Israel was a historic and blessed event.

When Lincoln spoke at Gettysburg of rededication to the cause of freedom, he was saying that the survival of liberty depended on peoples' faith in liberty. Israel's success as a thriving democracy helps sustain our faith in the democratic way of life not only in America but throughout the world. Today the principles of freedom and democracy are more alive than when Israel was founded. The number of countries around the world that are democratic or on the road to democracy is growing. I believe the example of Israel and the United States has something to do with this heartening trend.

No wonder, then, that the friendship between the American people and the people of Israel has grown so strong over the years. Our original moral commitment to Israel has never wavered, but over the years Americans have also come to recognize the enormous importance of Israel—as a partner in the pursuit of freedom and democracy, as a people who share our highest ideals, and as a vital strategic ally in an important part of the world. The moral and personal bonds that tie us together have strengthened us both.

AMERICA'S COMMITMENT TO ISRAEL'S SECURITY

For all these reasons, the United States has maintained its unwavering support for Israel's security for nearly four decades. Until peace was made with Egypt, Israel was completely surrounded by hostile forces since its birth, and it has had to fight four wars in less than forty years to defend its very existence. We know that the goals we share with the people of Israel—freedom, and peace—cannot be achieved unless both America and Israel are strong. That is why we are committed, and always will be committed, to helping Israel protect itself against any combination of potential aggressors. And that is why we must always make clear to the world—through our material and moral support for Israel, our votes at the United Nations, and our efforts for peace—that we are a permanent, steadfast, and unshakable ally of the State of Israel.

Every year we provide more security assistance to Israel than to any other nation. We consider that aid to be one of the best investments we could make—not only for Israel's security, but for ours as well. Even as we developed our own budget and worked with Israel on its economic program, we nonetheless went ahead with a major increase in our security assistance for Israel.

This is a statement of our commitment; it reflects our understanding of who our friends in the world are, who can be counted upon in times of crisis. Americans know that we have no more reliable friend in the world than Israel.

Our common interests afford us an opportunity—and a necessity—to work together on many issues.

We face, for example, the common threat posed by the Soviet Union. The American people and the people of Israel both know what is at stake in the struggle against the spread of Soviet power—not just territory and natural resources, but the very way of life for which both our nations have shed so much blood and made so many sacrifices.

The continuing persecution of Jews and other minorities by the Soviet government is an abomination. And we in America know that a threat to the rights of Jews anywhere is a threat to the rights of all peoples everywhere. In the Soviet Union today, Jews are not free to practice their religion, or to teach Hebrew or Yiddish to their children; they are actively discriminated against throughout the government and society.

In the face of this injustice, hundreds of thousands of Jews seek to leave the Soviet Union. Many want to settle in Israel. But Soviet authorities continue to restrict Jewish emigration, and only a tiny number are allowed to leave. Those who have sought emigration and been denied exit visas often suffer additional persecution; those who stand up for their rights risk prison, or confinement in so-called "psychiatric hospitals." The United States is doing all it can to urge the Soviet Union to set the Jews free. Nothing the Soviets could do would more convince us of their desire to improve relations than to release Anatoly Shcharansky, and others, and grant Soviet Jews their right to emigrate.

In addition to denying human rights at home, the Soviet Union has also consistently sought to undermine the strategic interests of both Israel and the United States. Today they seek to increase their influence in every corner of the globe, including within this hemisphere.

Today we are trying to check Soviet-backed aggression in Central America. Everyone in this audience, and supporters of Israel across the country, know that in the Middle East America is committed to the security of its democratic ally.

We all understand the need to negotiate from strength, not from weakness. We all understand the need for constant vigilance against aggressors heavily armed by the Soviet Union. Those who truly uphold these principles, which are the foundation of Israel's security, will see the vital importance of supporting these same principles elsewhere. The security of so vital a region as Central America is crucial to the global position of the United States. Let there be no illusions: A failure to contain Communist aggression so close to home will only erode the security of all our allies and friends around the world.

In the Middle East today, the Soviet Union and its radical allies continue to block peace and to threaten those who seek it. They exert influence by their ability to intimidate with guns and through the terrorists they sponsor and direct. The United States and Israel can work together to help ensure that such attempts fail.

Strategic cooperation between the United States and Israel has become a formal, institutionalized process. We have established the Joint Political-Military Group to improve cooperation so that we can resist threats to our common interests in the Middle East.

This kind of cooperation has been long overdue. Today it is an important part of our strategic relationship.

THE CHALLENGE OF PEACE

Americans are committed to the security of Israel because we want to ensure that the Jewish nation, and the Jewish people, never again face a threat to their very existence. But our permanent commitment to Israel's security serves another, related goal, as well: the goal of peace.

Military might has prevented defeat on the battlefield, but true security and peace can come only when Israel has gained the acceptance and recognition of its neighbors. That is why, even as we assist Israel's capacity to defend itself, the top priority of our efforts in the Middle East is to promote Arab-Israeli peace through negotiations.

We have learned many important lessons over the years. One of them is that a strong, visible, and permanent American commitment to Israel offers the best hope for peace. The history of the Arab-Israeli conflict shows, without question, that movement in the peace process can only come when there is no doubt of our commitment to Israel.

It can only come when no one in the Arab world or elsewhere has any delusions about the central reality that America's support for Israel can never be weakened. Israel has demonstrated beyond doubt that it will not bend or change its policies in the face of military or terrorist threats. Nor will the policies of the United States ever yield to terror or intimidation. On this principle, the United States and Israel stand together solid as a rock. So others should not miss the point: There are no military options. There are no terrorist options. The only path to progress, justice and peace in the Middle East is that of direct negotiations.

Negotiations work. We have tangible evidence of this today in the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt. This relationship is the cornerstone of the peace process. We must build upon it. The Egyptian-Israeli relationship itself must grow and be strengthened. And others must learn from the example that Egypt and Israel have set. President Mubarak is committed to peace. Others must join him. We are glad that King Hussein has re-established Jordan's diplomatic relations with Egypt. The process of building peace must continue, and the United States is committed to helping the parties move forward.

In recent months there has been much activity. Many people on both sides are working to further the peace process.

Today, for the first time in years, there are signs of a new realism and a new commitment on the part of key regional actors.

Prime Minister Peres has made clear Israel's desire to negotiate with Jordan without preconditions, and he has expressed his great respect for King Hussein. The King has also called for peace; he has undertaken an effort to organize the Arab side to negotiate peace with Israel on the basis of Security Council Resolution 242. There is also movement in the Palestinian community toward greater realism, and President Mubarak has played a constructive role in promoting negotiations.

Both Arabs and Israelis trust us, and they seek our help. They find reassurance in our participation as they face the risks and challenges of peace. Such an American role is indispensable.

We also know that those Arab nations that are moving toward peace are taking risks. Radical forces in the region use terrorism and threats of war not only against Americans and Israelis, but against responsible Arabs who have worked to bring Egypt back in the Arab fold and who have sought to promote negotiations with Israel.

As King Hussein took steps to move with the Palestinians to the negotiating table, we saw Jordanian diplomats killed; we saw Jordanian Airlines offices bombed. Those who take risks for peace should know that the United States will help them defend themselves. The United States must continue to support those who seek negotiations and peaceful solutions against those who promote violence and oppose peace.

Assistant Secretary of State Richard Murphy is now in the region, on the President's behalf, exploring practical steps that might be taken toward peace. But whatever opportunities may emerge, no one in the region or throughout the world can have the slightest doubt about America's policy: Israel's vital interests will never be compromised; Israel's survival and security will never be put at risk.

At the same time, we have also made clear our concern for the Palestinian people. Lasting peace and security for Israel will require a just settlement for the Palestinians that assures their dignity and legitimate rights. How ironic and tragic it is, therefore, that those who claim to act on behalf of the Palestinians have continued to block negotiations—the only course that can achieve a just settlement for the Palestinians.

Now is the time for the Arabs to let negotiations proceed. Now is the time for the Arabs to let King Hussein come forward. There is no alternative to direct negotiation; the longer this truth is evaded, the longer the Palestinian people are the victim. Those who chased illusions of "armed struggle," those who engaged in terrorism, those who thought that Soviet support would intimidate the United States and Israel, have only brought death to innocents and prolonged the suffering of the Palestinian people. Such methods have achieved nothing constructive, and never will.

But the way is open for progress—even early progress—and we know what that way is. President Reagan's initiative of September 1, 1982 remains the most promising route to a solution. Our policy will continue to be guided by six fundamental principles in the years to come:

First we will continue to seek a lasting peace that respects the legitimate concerns of all the parties.

Second, the United States will oppose violent and radical challenges to peace and security. We will oppose governments or terrorist organizations of whatever stripe in their efforts to undermine the State of Israel and our Arab friends in the region.

Third, United States policy toward the PLO is unchanged: We will never recognize or negotiate with any group that espouses violent solutions or refuses to accept Resolutions 242 and 338 or recognize Israel's right to exist.

Fourth, the only way to achieve a genuine, lasting peace is through direct negotiations between the Arab states and Israel. No other procedures can substitute. No other approach will get anywhere. No further plans or preliminaries are needed. There is one and only one place to negotiate—at the table, face to face.

Fifth, we will support a negotiated settlement by which the Palestinian people can achieve their legitimate rights and just requirements. We will not support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, nor will we support annexation or permanent control by Israel.

Sixth, and finally, we will always insist on Israel's right to exist in peace behind secure and recognized borders. As President Reagan said on September 1, 1982, "In the pre-1967 borders, Israel was barely 10 miles wide at its narrowest point.

The bulk of Israel's population lived within artillery range of hostile Arab armies. I am not about to ask Israel to live that way again." The United States stands firmly behind that solemn commitment.

If Israel and the United States continue to work together, we can make progress toward peace.

THE ECONOMIC CHALLENGE

We know that peace is essential to Israel's security. But there is another important element to that security. The strength of Israel also depends on the strength of its economy. Israel must work to overcome its economic problems. Because of our own deep interest in a strong, healthy, and secure Israel, we will also do our part in ways we can be most helpful.

We in America know what it is like to live through difficult economic times. Only in the past three years have we begun to pull ourselves out of the spiraling stagflation of the late '70s. We also know how hard it is to make the tough political decisions and the sacrifices needed to put an economy on a stable path of growth without inflation.

We know first-hand how tough it is to cut the budget. Yet these tough decisions must be made.

The Israeli economy is a spectacular success story. The Israeli standard of living has risen steadily and remarkably. Israeli goods compete successfully in the major international markets. In fact, in 1984 Israel increased its exports by 12.5 percent, while simultaneously reducing its imports by 2.5 percent. If the United States had done the same, our trade deficit would be more than $80 billion lower than it is today.

Still, the Israeli economy faces real problems. Israel is consuming more than it produces and its economy is beset by a large national debt, untenable budget deficits, structural rigidities, and powerful inflationary forces. There are no quick solutions to these problems—yet Israelis have proved during the State's early decades that they could pull together to build and maintain a dynamic, growing economy. Israel has all the qualities needed for economic success: an educated, dynamic people; impressive capacities for research and development of new technologies, and outstanding universities. Israel's economic achievements in previous years were a testament to the public spirit, bravery, creativity, and talents of its people. I have no doubt that those same qualities today hold out the promise of future prosperity.

But Israel must pull itself out of its present economic trauma. And the Israeli people must do it themselves; no one can do it for them. Israel will need support as it makes the needed adjustments, and here the United States can and must help. But our help will be of little avail if Israel does not take the necessary steps to cut government spending, improve productivity, open up its economy, and strengthen the mechanisms of economic policy. Israel and its government must make the hard decisions. Prime Minister Peres and Finance Minister Modai have shown courageous leadership; they deserve support, here and in Israel, for this effort.

From 1981 to 1984, the United States has provided almost $9.5 billion dollars in aid to Israel. In 1984, aid to Israel made up more than a quarter of our entire foreign aid program. Yet we must all understand that this aid cannot really help unless Israel makes hard and far-reaching decisions for structural adjustment.

The United States can also help Israel in other ways, over the long term, to achieve the economic success Israel is capable of achieving. Tomorrow, for instance, the United States and Israel will sign the Free Trade Area Agreement. This will guarantee Israel completely open access to the world's largest and most diverse market.

In 1983, the United States imported almost $1.5 billion worth of Israeli products. The Free Trade Area Agreement will strengthen our trade partnership even further.

And we have created a Joint Economic Development Group for a continuing dialogue on the problems of the Israeli economy and on ways that our cooperation can help.

The future belongs to the free, the venturesome, the educated, and the creative. The Israeli people are all of these. Their future is bright.

AMERICA'S PLEDGE

In the years to come, Israel and the United States will stand together in defense of our shared values and in support of our common goals. Our two peoples have the same vision of a better world—a world of peace and freedom, where the dignity of all men and women is respected by all nations. The evils we see all around us today— terrorism and the states that sponsor it, the persecution of Jews and other minorities in the Soviet Union, the outrages against Israel in the United Nations—these only strengthen our determination.

Every year thousands of Americans visit Yad Vashem—the memorial to the victims of the Holocaust. I will go there again next month. The images of Jewish suffering at Nazi hands still burn in our memories. Our pledge at the end of World Ware II was simple: Never again. And our support for Israel is the lasting embodiment of that pledge.

Our two nations know that eternal vigilance is indeed the price of liberty. The world will be safe for decency only if men and women of decency have the courage to defend what they cherish. Security and strength are the foundation of survival—and of any serious foreign policy. They are essential not only for the defense of liberty but for any hopes for peace. Those who would threaten peace and freedom must know that the champions of peace and freedom stand strong, and united.

America and Israel have learned this lesson. Together, we will set an example for all free peoples: We will work tirelessly for peace and for a better world.●

RUTH GREENFIELD: STANDING HER GROUND DOWNTOWN

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, some people talk and wring their hands about the need to revitalize the downtowns of our cities.

In downtown Miami, Ruth Greenfield has worked to improve the cultural climate by presenting to those who live and work in the area free lunchtime live arts concerts for public viewing and listening.

This determined and gifted native south Floridian has made a substantial difference in the community. In 1951 she founded the Fine Arts Conservatory which was the first integrated school in Dade County. Only when the public school system began to provide cultural arts courses in 1978 did the conservatory close and Ruth Greenfield moved on to other projects.

For all of her life downtown Miami has been important to Ruth. She has taught English and music classes in empty downtown store fronts. Passing along the spirit of music to others is a natural gift that Mrs. Greenfield possesses.

Although it is not mentioned in the following article, I want to bring to my colleagues' attention a very special effort that the Greenfield family made on behalf of the starving in Africa.

A few years ago I made a guest appearance at Ruth's mid-day downtown class. There I read passages from Matthew Arnold's poem, "Dover Beach." A line from that poem read: "With tremulous cadence slow, and bring the eternal note of sadness." Ruth does just the opposite. She brings the eternal note of gladness into our city.

A Miami Herald article about Mrs. Greenfield follows:

STANDING HER GROUND DOWNTOWN

(By Margaret Landers)

It is 11:40 a.m. on a Wednesday and a sea of gray and white-haired culture vultures are surging at the crimson velvet rope that separates the rococo lobby from the equally ornate anterooms at Gusman Cultural Center in downtown Miami. When the rope is lifted, as it always is at precisely 11:45 a.m., "it's like a burst of water," Ruth Greenfield says with an expectant twinkle in her eye.

She is ready. She has switched to the second of her two pairs of shoes, her "stage shoes," a respectable pair of strappy heels, and has stashed her cloddish rubber-soled walking shoes into the faded cotton tote that seems to grow, like a primeval appendage, from her shoulder. Inside the tote, along with the shoes and the extra concert programs ("just in case") are the four Baby Ruths she bought at Walgreen's ("I'm a sweets junkie") and eight 16-ounce plastic cups she brought along in case the dancers need more than a sip of water from the fountain.

Like a proud and generous mother, Greenfield welcomes her brood of regulars to the free Lunchtime Lively Arts concert/dance/lecture series she founded 13 years ago. She moves constantly, greeting people by name, grabbing their hands, asking about their health, answering their questions about the New Budapest String Quartet which will perform at noon today in the auditorium of the Downtown Campus of Miami-Dade Community College.

Close to half a million people have found their way to downtown Miami (she pronounces it "My-am-ma") to see the 431 performances that have taken place over the years—the first on a flatbed truck in the middle of Flagler Street, the second on the Dade County Courthouse steps. Every one of those concerts was held downtown.

It is downtown Miami, with its distinctly urban smells, its clash of old and new buildings and its steady stream of pedestrian humanity that triggers something special in the soul of Ruth Greenfield.

"You almost feel like a person downtown," she says.

"Even though my father's gone, I can still see him walking up and down the streets. I see the youth and the smallness of the city in those streets."

That's why she laces-up her rubber-soled walking shoes each Wednesday to trudge the five or so blocks from the Downtown Campus of Miami-Dade to Gusman Cultural Center on Flagler Street.

It's why she produced a three-day literary event downtown in 1980.

It is why she gladly taught English and music in empty downtown storefronts before the Mitchell Wolfson New World Center Campus was built. Budgets were so tight then that the music classes didn't even have stereos. Greenfield used to pull her car up on the curb so students could listen to symphonies on her car's cassette tape player.

"I don't feel part of any other area in Miami except for downtown," says the 61-year-old Key West native, who grew up in Miami when a telephone call to Coral Gables was long distance and homes along the "boulevard" (Biscayne Boulevard) were large and well-cared-for and the lawns were lush.

The old homestead may be gone, but she is happy to announce that downtown is beginning to flourish again. "I thought I had lost it for awhile."

So much else has been lost over the years. The house she grew up in has been torn down; Omni International now stands in its vicinity. The Fine Arts Conservatory she founded in 1951—the first integrated school in Dade County, established two years before the Supreme Court's decision requiring integration—closed its doors in 1978 when public schools finally got around to offering the kinds of arts and music classes the Conservatory already had offered for 27 years.

She lives, with her husband, Arnold, and two weimaraners, in a rambling, two-story gray wood house her grandmother built in 1911 "out in the country"—an area just on the north side of the Miami River now imprisoned by the concrete overpasses and underpasses of Overtown. The Greenfields reared four children in that house. They never once considered leaving it—not after the 1980 Overtown riots and the enforced curfews that followed, and not after losing innumberable party guests who were too timid to drive at night into the no-man's land surrounding the faded Spring Gardens neighborhood.

Indeed, Ruth Greenfield—a child prodigy who played her first piano concert in Bayfront Park at the age of 8—is wrapped in a cocoon of old-time connections, a strong thread of continuity that leads forward, not backward. Hers is a progressive nostalgia; always has been.

It might have been a yearning for the small-town Miami of her childhood—"When my sister got married, my father invited everyone in the telephone book"—that firmed her resolve in 1951. McCarthyism was raging then, Communists were feared to be hiding under every bed, and anyone espousing anything as radical as racial equality was considered suspect. Greenfield took the cause of a 13-year-old black boy who was denied the opportunity to play in a Miami Music Teacher's Association recital for National Music Week.

She brought the incident to the attention of the local media, which eventually shamed the Teachers' Association into letting him play. When she later founded the Fine Arts Conservatory and provided some full scholarships for children of all colors, her efforts got her blackballed from the Miami Music Teachers' Association, the local chapter of the National Music Sorority and most other music organizations in town. This, despite her own credentials—studies at the Conservetoire Nationale in Paris with Nadia Boulanger, Antoinette Dieudonne and world-famous pianist Robert Casadesus.

"When they asked me years later to join, I said I'd rather not."

Neighbors on Palm Island, where the Greenfields lived in the early '50s, tried to have them arrested when old, creaky buses from Booker T. Washington Junior High School pulled up to deposit more than 80 members of the school's Glee Club for an afternoon recital.

Conservatory students over the years included Sen. Carrie Meek's children and Wendell Graham who grew up to marry Judge Leah Simms. Teachers included sculptor Duane Hanson "before he got famous."

In many ways, Greenfield's background prepared her for the controversy she faced in the '50s and early '60s, especially the two post-World War II years spent in Paris with her husband. They were glorious bohemians then—she, the concert pianist; he, the Harvard Law School graduate who really wanted to paint. Both grew up in Miami, met again in Paris and married there. An oil portrait of the Place Odeon, as Arnold saw it from their tiny apartment, hangs over their living room sofa. The house is filled with mementos from their almost constant global wanderings, as well as photographs taken by their semi-famous 32-year-old son, Tim Greenfield-Sanders, whose fashion photography takes up six pages in the current issue of GQ magazine.

Her heady headline-making days may be over, but neither then nor now does Ruth Greenfield enjoy the spotlight. "Don't make me into a Pollyanna," she says. "I was a very selfish person. I did it because it gave me pleasure. I don't think we should be heroes because we want to be part of progress. There were a lot of people trying many ways to improve relationships. The arts provided an easy way for me."

It is 1:30 p.m. and a few stragglers are left in the cavernous coolness of the Gusman, Greenfield among them. She stands alone on the second-floor balcony of what was once the grand old Olympia movie theater. The Olympia had been downtown in Miami's glittering attraction in the '30s, much as The Gusman is one of downtown's big attractions in the '80s. Only back then, she was Ruth Wolkowsky, Isaac's daughter, the little girl who couldn't stay away from the nine-cent hot fudge sundaes at the Red Cross Drug Store (now J. Byron's Department Store).

Greenfield's face brightens and a slow smile spreads across her unwrinkled contenance like warm butter melting.

"We've all gotten old together," she says.●

INEQUALITY IN EDUCATION PROPOSAL

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, equal opportunity for all Americans has been a policy commitment of our country for the past two decades. Nowhere has this commitment been more prevalent, intensified or important as in our Federal commitment to excellence in education for all Americans.

However, with the recent educational budget proposals of the Reagan administration, our one time policy of equal opportunity will seemingly be replaced because of budget priorities. Despite the political rhetoric of the Reagan administration, its claim that higher educational budget cuts will affect only middle and upper income students with incomes of more than $25,000 is false. In fact, the proposed cuts would reduce Federal student aid for more than 105,000 minority students from families with incomes below $25,000. Therefore, the question of the hour is, will the American people once again be deceived by a policy which is not supposed to harm minority and less advantaged citizens? Or will the people of the United States, and their elected officials, finally see both the errors in such recent political chicanery as well as the merits of past educational policies?

Education has consistently been viewed as a ladder out of disparity and into the technical, cultural, and professional world of affluence and well-being for less financially advantaged citizens. The rationale for abrogating our commitment to equal opportunity in higher education is being disguised behind the political rhetoric of fiscal conservatism. Such budget demagoguery may appear politically convenient in the short term, but its tragic consequences for the dreams and hopes of minorities and less financially advantaged citizens seems inexorable. Poverty and ignorance are not susceptible to change when left alone. Instead, both must be combatted with enormous conviction, energy, and effort by the American people and their elected officials. In offering easy answers to complex issues, President Reagan's budget proposal does a serious damage and disservice to a two-decade commitment to quality higher education for all Americans.

In this regard, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article which appeared in the April 8, 1985, issue of Higher Education and National Affairs. It explicitly uncovers the faults and consequences of the Reagan administration's proposals for minorities and the financially disadvantaged.

[From the American Council on Education Newsletter, April 8, 1985]

POLICY TRENDS ERODE MINORITY GAINS IN EDUCATION

The outlook for black and Hispanic Americans in higher education continues to appear bleak, says the latest report on the status of educational opportunities for minorities.

The report by the College Board, due out this month, says current social, economic, and policy trends threaten to wipe out the strides in educational opportunity and attainment blacks have made since 1960.

(In a related matter, the American Association of State Colleges and Universities late last week reported that thousands of low-income and minority students would be affected by the Reagan Administration's proposed cuts in student aid. See story on page 4.)

Titled "Equality and Excellence: The Educational Status of Black Americans," the College Board report was prepared for a conference of 47 prominent and predominantly black educators convened by the organization's Office of Academic Affairs.

It found that educational gains by black students have eroded since 1975 and that current policy trends—reductions in education funding, increased graduation and other requirements for students, and emerging teacher shortages—"threaten to reverse the movement toward equality.

"Excellence for black students will not become a reality unless and until they receive enriched curricular opportunities in elementary and secondary schools, sufficient financial assistance to pursue higher education opportunities, and instruction from well-qualified teachers," the report said.

An American Council on Education Office of Minority Concerns (OMC) report released last fall cited smiliar findings and warned of "devastating consequences" unless all Americans receive a quality education.

The OMC report, which found a leveling off in participation in higher education by minorities, said, "Obviously, the legislation of the '60s and '70s, designed to provide equal access, has not worked equally well for all minority groups."

Other barriers to blacks' educational achievement reflect social and economic changes over the past decade, the College Board said. For instance, female-headed households increased from 28 percent to 41 percent of all black families between 1970 and 1982, the report said, Also nearly half (47.6 percent) of all black children 18 years of age and younger lived in households below the poverty line in 1982, compared to 34 percent between 1970 and 1981.

Among the trends noted in the report are the following:

College attendance and completion rates have dropped for black students since 1975, despite the fact that high school graduation rates have improved for blacks over the past two decades.

This trend was corroborated by a report on student aid and minority enrollment released recently by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities (AASCU). The report found that although the number of black high school graduates increased by 29 percent between 1975 and 1981, their college participation rate dropped by 11 percent. The number of Hispanic high school graduates increased by 38 percent between 1975 and 1981, but their college participation rate dropped by 16 percent, AASCU said.

Financial aid greatly affects college retention rates, particularly for black students, who are nearly twice as likely to stay in four-year colleges with aid than without. A National Student Aid Coalition study has found, however, that disadvantaged and minority students often are unaware of their eligibility for student aid programs. The information simply does not reach them.

Black students are "seriously underrepresented" in graduate and professional schools, and their participation in postgraduate education has dropped since the early 1970's.

Compared to all students, black students continually lose ground in their progress through the educational pipeline. For example, in 1972 blacks represented 12.7 percent of all 18-year olds, 10.5 percent of all 1972 high school graduates, 8.7 percent of all college freshmen, and, four years later, 6.5 percent of all B.A. recipients. By 1979, blacks represented only about 4 percent of all professional and doctoral degree recipients.

SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, consistent with his great reputation for articulate and thorough presentation of the issues, Asian and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee Chairman STEPHEN SOLARZ has once again produced an inciteful discussion worthy of wide attention. In the April 8 issue of The New Republic, Chairman SOLARZ offered a concise, yet comprehensive, description of the troubling situation in the Philippines and the real problems this poses for the people of that land and for the United States. His article also provides a useful explanation of considerations taken into account as the Foreign Affairs Committee adopted provisions concerning the Philippines in the bill H.R. 1555, foreign assistance legislation that just passed the committee.

Since this bill will be considered soon on the floor of the House, this is an appropriate occasion for all Members to give due attention to matters affecting United States-Philippines relations. Therefore, I ask that the recent article by Chairman SOLARZ be included in the RECORD at this point and urge my colleagues to give appropriate attention to his thoughts.

LAST CHANCE FOR THE PHILIPPINES

(By Stephen J. Solarz)

(Congressman Stephen J. Solarz, Democrat of New York, is chairman of the House Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs.)

The script is painfully familiar: a vain and increasingly isolated leader, an ineffectual and autocratic regime, a people plagued by poverty and deprived of democracy, a Communist movement mounting a potent political and military challenge. This time the scene is the Philippines, where the ghosts of Chiang Kai-shek, Fulgencio Batista, Ngo Dinh Diem, Nguyen Van Thieu, and Anastasio Somoza haunt the Malacanang Palace of Ferdinand Marcos.

The 10,000 to 20,000 peasant guerrillas of the Communist New People's Army are not yet in a position to take over Manila. But the guerrillas do not lack for recruits, and their leaders have skillfully shaped a strategy of rural revolution and urban encirclement. If current political and economic trends continue, by the end of the decade these Filipino Maoists are likely to pose a serious and perhaps irresistible challenge to the government of the Philippines.

A victory by the Communist guerrillas would eliminate whatever hope there is in the Philippines for the restoration of democracy. In power the Communist forces would surely carry out a far more systematic campaign of repression than the episodic variety practiced by Ferdinand Marcos. For the United States, a guerrilla triumph would destroy a historically close relationship with the Philippines, and would close off access to Clark Field and Subic Bay. These two facilities form the key element of our forward defense strategy in the Pacific. They play an essential role in our ability to preserve the peace and maintain a balance of power in Asia. The loss of Clark and Subic would generate—in Washington, Moscow, and all Asian capitals—a rapid rethinking of the Pacific security equation, with results potentially far more serious than those following the fall of Saigon in 1975.

Because of the unique and long-standing ties between our two peoples, the United States is inextricably involved and inevitably influential in the Philippines. The Filipino people will determine their own future, but the United States, no matter what it does, will exert a strong influence. The Reagan administration now seems to have awakened to the seriousness of the crisis in the Philippines, but it will probably be up to Congress to shape an American policy that can avoid disaster.

President Marcos's power base has now shrunk to the point where his support is largely restricted to his own family, a handful of close associates, and a few favored military and political appointees. The virtually complete collapse of confidence in his regime can be traced to several factors. A principal cause has been the system of "crony capitalism" he has established to enrich his political allies. Perfecting the art of politically connected plunder to a degree undreamed of by President Mobutu of Zaire and other expert practitioners of the trade, Ferdinand Marcos and his associates have directed millions of dollars from critical development needs for their private purposes. (See "The Marcos Mafia" by Robert A. Manning, June 25, 1984.) Over half the Filipinos live in poverty, but intimates of the first family have been able to live in imperial splendor.

Jaime Cardinal Sin, the head of the Catholic Church in the Philippines, summed up the sentiments of many Filipinos when he recalled the statement of Manuel Quezon, the Philippines' first president, who once said, "I would rather have a government run like hell by Filipinos than a government run like heaven by Americans." The cardinal then added, "Today . . . it would seem his wish has been fulfilled." Responding to this and other frequent criticisms by the cardinal, Marcos publicly complained that the cardinal was beginning to sound like the Ayatollah Khomeini. To which Cardinal Sin retorted, "If I am the ayatollah, then Marcos must be the shah."

Economic policy-making in the House of Marcos resembles the mercantilist dynasties of late medieval Europe. Individuals who demonstrate their fealty to the first family are granted resources or foreign-lona guarantees for investment projects they propose with little regard to the feasibility of the ventures or the managerial ability of their sponsors. When projects run into financial trouble, the government usually makes new loans or buys out the enterprises outright, saddling itself with bad debts or unprofitable companies.

The most egregious manifestation of crony capitalism is found in the economic monopolies. By presidential decree Marcos imposed a 75-percent tariff on imported cigarette filters, benefiting a palace intimate who owned most of the local cigarette manufacturing factories. For coconuts and sugar, presidential favorites enjoy the sole right of distribution, and are free to determine the spread between the price at which crops are purchased from growers and the rate at which they are sold on the market. The livelihood of 15 million to 20 million people—one-third of the populace—depends on coconut production. Enormous sums of money that otherwise would have been available to coconut farmers have instead been siphoned off by associates of the president.

The rise of crony capitalism has been one of the fundamental factors in the decline of the Philippines' economy. In the last year its free-market neighbors have enjoyed a dynamic economic growth; the Philippines have experienced a decline of five-and-a-half percent in GNP. At the same time, income inequality has become even more pronounced. Nevertheless, President Marcos has continued to spend huge sums to replicate the external trappings of far more developed countries: lavish government offices, large cultural showplaces, and highly specialized medical centers.

History demonstrates, however, that the poor do not rebel solely because of economic misery and willful mismanagement. Political repression is usually required for spontaneous social combustion. Here, too, the Marcos regime has created the conditions for its own demise.

Until the late 1960s the Philippines had a working democratic system, although one plagued by corruption and violence. Then in the early 1970s instability spread as radical university students demonstrated for a variety of causes, and separatist Moslems on the southern island of Mindanao fought for an independent state. Many Filipinos came to believe that the existing system was too corrupt and ineffective to handle the mounting problems. In September 1972, seven years after Marcos assumed the presidency, he declared martial law.

Had Marcos been content to purge the system of its anarchic tendencies and restore democracy, he would be regarded today as a national hero. He did take positive steps such as the confiscation of privately owned arms and the dissolution of local politicians' private militias. But he and his retainers chose also to use their extraordinary powers to perpetuate the rule of the Marcos dynasty. Thousands of government critics—including the charismatic Benigno Aquino—were arrested. Civilian courts were supplanted by military tribunals oblivious of due process of law. Freedom of assembly, speech, and the press ceased to exist.

Since 1972 political repression has spread through the countryside. To cope with the Moslem separatists and the nascent Communist New People's Army, the armed forces of the Philippines increased from 50,000 to 150,000 between 1972 and 1977. Quality declined as quantity grew. The professionalism of the Philippine officer corps gave way to factionalism and corruption. Within the ranks, training, discipline, and morale have suffered. Standards have also sunk in the constabulary, the government's first line of defense in rural areas.

Attempting to end the rural insurgency, the armed forces and the constabulary have usually shot first and asked questions later. Suspected Communists are given no mercy, and the word "salvaging" (a Filipino phrase meaning summary execution) has become part of the village vocabulary. The government borrowed the idea of strategic hamlets (employed unsuccessfully by the United States in Vietnam) in order to cut off the guerrillas from the civilian populace. The effect has been to disrupt village life and impose harsh restrictions on farm families already suffering from misguided economic policies. The guerrillas could not have asked for a better stimulus to recruitment than the pervasive pattern of human rights abuses by government forces.

The Communist Party of the Philippines was founded in December 1968, a Maoist splinter of the long-established, Moscow-oriented party. Adopting Mao's strategy of a rural-based people's war, the Communist Party created the New People's Army a few months later. Over the last decade, the Communists have transformed their movement from a tiny insurgency, with a force of a few hundred troops limited to the island of Luzon, into a nationwide insurrection.

Today the Communist Party has a membership of 30,000 and the guerrilla army has from 10,000 to 15,000 men under arms. The guerrillas are active in over two-thirds of the country's provinces, and have established a presence in one-third of the barangays, the lowest administrative unit in the Philippines. In the last year alone the number of military incidents initiated by the guerrilla army almost double. In the cities, the Communist Party's National Democratic Front can mobilize non-Communist student, human rights, and church-related organizations—and up to a million people—for demonstrations and other anti-government activities.

This degree of Communist success is remarkable for two reasons. First, it goes against the democratic grain of Filipino culture and political history. Second, there is no evidence of financial or weapons support from foreign governments, although the Soviet Union and China would undoubtedly compete to establish control over the party if it seemed on the verge of victory.

The guerrilla army's appeal in rural areas is not based on ideology, but on the sense of grievance that the government's brutality, corruption, and inefficiency have created. In addition, the guerrillas often provide the basic services to the poor that Manila seems incapable of delivering. Like the security forces, the guerrilla army engages in violence. But unlike the Philippine military, which is random in its brutality, it directs its violence against officials and soldiers known to be corrupt and ordinary citizens who actively oppose its aims and activities. Guerrilla units recently have targeted the properties of Marcos' cronies for destruction, with telling political effect.

In the Philippines, as in medieval monarchies, the health of the ruler becomes the engine of change. It was Marcos' deteriorating medical condition that both moved Aquino to return to his homeland and presumably provoked elements in the Philippine government to engineer his assassination on the tarmac of the Manila airport. That event galvanized the democratic opposition, energized the previously apathetic masses, and thrust the government into a political and economic crisis from which it has yet to emerge. Marcos came under intense pressure to allow an open and objective investigation of the murder, to ensure that the May 1984 elections to the National Assembly would be free and fair, to institute the austerity measures necessary to get an agreement from the International Monetary Fund as well as new external loans, to make clearer arrangements for presidential succession should he die, and even to resign from office.

The concessions were made grudgingly and constituted the minimum necessary to satisfy the demands made. Nevertheless, the measures adopted were not trivial. The constitution was amended to clarify succession procedures. An investigating board charged Fabian Ver, a Marcos loyalist and armed forces chief of staff, with complicity in the assassination and subsequent cover-up. And the Philippines reached an agreement with the IMF and commercial banks that should stop the downward economic spiral.

Perhaps most important, elections conducted last May were reasonably fair in two-thirds to three-quarters of the election districts, primarily because 150,000 citizens volunteered to prevent government abuse. Yet irregularities in the remaining districts had a profound effect on the results. Candidates of the democratic opposition captured one-third of the assembly seats; a citizen poll-watchers group concluded that had the tally been totally honest, they would have won a majority. The May 1984 elections demonstrated that the Filipino people want democracy, not that democracy has been restored.

For the democratic opposition, the Aquino assassination meant the loss of a leader and the creation of an imperishable political symbol. Roughly four million Filipinos participated in some way in Aquino's funeral, and the democratic opposition has worked to channel that profound emotional outpouring into effective political action. In this effort, Marcos's democratic opponents have taken advantage of a significant relaxation of the restrictions on expression and assembly.

For the United States the assassination provoked a reassessment of policy. Before the tragedy the Reagan administration believed that "constructive engagement," Philippine-style, was ensuring cordial relations and the speedy conclusion of a new base-and-aid agreement. In 1981 Vice President Bush went so far as to toast Marcos with the ludicrous avowal, "We love your adherence to democratic principles and to democratic processes." Roused from its complacency by Aquino's murder and the unmistakable evidence that the House of Marcos was beginning to crumble, the administration had a change of heart. It feared that a continued embrace of the Marcos government would be more likely to jeopardize than guarantee our long-term access to the facilities at Clark and Subic.

There are many countries where our strategic interests clash with our human rights concerns, and where overriding national security objectives make it difficult to effectively promote our democratic beliefs. In the Philippines, however, the best and perhaps the only means of protecting our strategic interests is by advancing the process of democratization.

The United States must first recognize what it ought not to do. Recalling the lessons of Iran, Nicaragua, and other American foreign policy debacles, the U.S. should repudiate any notion of propping up Ferdinand Marcos. Not only would such a policy be doomed to failure, but it would also alienate the Filipino people, thereby undermining our ability to continue operations at Clark and Subic. (The current base agreement between the United States and the Philippines expires in 1991.) Our capacity to remain at those facilities rests ultimately upon the willingness of the Filipino people to have us there.

At the other extreme, the United States should reject any notion of removing President Marcos from power, either by organizing a coup against him or by eliminating the aid program. U.S. participation in the coup against President Diem in Vietnam hardly constitutes a promising precedent on which to act in the Philippines. Overthrowing a government we do not like is no more justified in Manila than in Managua. The withholding of funds is likely to bring down the Marcos regime, given that the total American military and economic assistance program accounts for only three percent of the Philippines' budget. Cutting off American aid would also harm millions of desperately poor Filipinos who benefit from our assistance. In addition, terminating our assistance could potentially jeopardize our access to the bases, inasmuch as President Marcos might be tempted to take a nationalist tack and close them down, on the grounds that we had violated the base agreement.

Nor would it be useful to legislatively condition our aid on the achievement of essential reforms. Based on our experience with conditionality in El Salvador, the Reagan administration would undoubtedly certify that the prescribed conditions had been met, no matter how little actual progress had occurred. President Marcos could then claim the official American seal of approval, while the democratic opposition would find new evidence for its suspicion that the United States cares more for Marcos than for its country.

In the second presidential debate last October with Walter Mondale, President Reagan claimed that Communism was the only alternative to Ferdinand Marcos. The president's simplistic statement ignores the fact that the real alternative to Communism is not a continuation of the present regime, but a restoration of democracy. Indeed, posing the choice as the president did can only increase the prospects for an eventual Communist victory.

The United States can improve the prospects for democracy by strongly encouraging fundamental economic, political, and military reforms. This will help to destory the roots of the guerrilla army's appeal and demonstrate to the Filipino people that U.S. policy is designed to help them rather than to embrace their embattled government. We should press for the dismantling of the monopolies that lie at the heart of crony capitalism. The International Monetary Fund and the World Bank are already insisting upon structural economic reform as a condition for new assistance, and the United States should continue to vigorously support that approach.

Specific political reforms should include the repeal of President Marcos' decree-making powers; the reconstitution of an independent elections commission and the resumption of free and fair elections; the revival of a genuinely free press, in which the opposition is assured access to the electronic media; guarantees of free expression and free association; and the restoration of an independent judiciary.

Finally, the United States should seek an end to military abuses that have driven thousands of Filipinos into the arms of the guerrillas. The Philippine government must be pressured to rigorously improve training and instill discipline and decency in its armed forces. Corrupt officers must be dismissed and a special inspectorate should be created to investigate military corruption and human rights abuses.

To date, the Marcos regime has been unwilling to make politically painful reforms. In the twilight of his career, Marcos seems to be unaware of his country's desperate straits. For one thing, he has said that he will reinstate Chief of Staff Fabian Ver if he is acquitted in the Aquino assassination trial. Such an action would be a signal that President Marcos intends to conduct business as usual, and would probably rule out the chances of any genuine military reform.

The most effective way to persuade President Marcos to initiate reforms and convince the Filipino people that the United States is committed to their economic well-being and political freedom is through the restructuring of the American aid program. Last year Congress, convinced that the problems of the Philippines are primarily social and economic, transferred $45 million of the administration's aid request from military to economic assistance. The shift sent a signal to Marcos that significant reforms would be necessary before additional military assistance would be extended. Although Marcos has not yet heeded the message, most Filipinos seemed to regard it as a salutary effort to bring pressure on the Manila government.

President Reagan appears intent on sending a very different signal. One year later, despite the lack of significant reforms, the administration is proposing an extraordinary 150 percent increase in military assistance. Congress should sharply cut this request and sharply increase economic assistance. What's more, military aid should be limited to nonlethal purposes, and economic aid should be largely directed through the Catholic church and private voluntary organizations rather than through the Marcos regime.

There is no guarantee that an American policy structured in this fashion will succeed. But it represents perhaps the only way of influencing events in the Philippines in a manner compatible with both our interests and our ideals.●

EASTPORT ON THE MOVE

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, the city of Eastport, ME, has faced tough economic problems in recent years, including the complete collapse of the sardine canning industry at the hands of foreign competitors. The people of Eastport might well have lost hope in any economic regeneration.

Fortunately, they did not, and there now exists a growing community because of their efforts. The proud and determined nature of Maine's citizens was proven once again as Eastport developed its harbor into one of the deepest on the east coast, creating new jobs and injecting new vitality into the city. As the following article says, Eastport is working to "pull itself up by the bootstraps, fighting its long history of economic defeatism."

Mr. Speaker, I salute the people of Eastport, for having had faith in themselves and in their hometown.

I ask that a Boston Globe article on Eastport be included with my remarks.

EASTPORT IS LOOKING TO THE SEA—AGAIN

(By Brad Pokorny, Globe Staff)

EASTPORT, MAINE.—As its name might suggest, the sea has always been important to this isolated community in Down East Maine. In the 1800s, the island city was a bustling sailing stopover, a rival to Portland and Portsmouth.

As sailing faded, sardine canning boomed. By 1882, 18 sardine factories operated here, and the population reached 5000. But after World War II, the domestic sardine industry declined rapidly, battered by foreign competition and declining fish stocks. The last factory closed two years ago.

With its unemployment rate running at nearly double the state average in recent years and per capita income about 25 percent below what most Mainers earn, the city of 2000 has looked desperately for a way to boost its fortunes.

The sea, officials say, once again may provide the answer.

Last month, Eastport passed a major milestone on its comeback trail with completion of a $3.5 million pier extension that gives the harbor a full 40 feet of water for cargo ships that tie up to its wharf. That, officials say, allows world-class freighters to load in Eastport and enables the city to compete with major ports in Canada for a share of the paper pulp trade to Europe and the Far East.

It may seem a small thing to outsiders, but the project shows how a small community, with a little help from state and federal agencies is working to pull itself up by the bootstraps, fighting its long history of economic defeatism.

"The attitude here for years and years has been very negative," City Council President George Townsend said. "But then people just got together and said we're not going to have anything here unless the attitude changes."

Four years ago, the city began promoting the use of its wharf as a loading dock for the region's chief export: paper pulp. A port authority was established. A small, independent longshoremen's union was formed. Georgia Pacific, the region's largest pulp producer, was lobbied for its shipping business. Much of this was done by volunteer committees.

The key was to capitalize on existing resources. With the addition of a 50-foot extension to the wharf, the dockside now stands in 40 feet of water instead of 22—and that makes all the difference.

UP THERE WITH THE BIG PORTS

Since March, three large freighters have docked at Eastport, taking on roughly 10,000 tons of highly valued hardwood paper pulp. Marine specialists say 40 feet of navigable water puts Eastport on par with major seaports on the East Coast. Boston Harbor, for example, runs 40 feet deep at mean low tide, according to Rex Sherman at the American Assn. of Port Authorities in Washington. New York Harbor is the East Coast's deepest, with 45 feet of navigable water, Sherman said.

"It's a small project when you compare it to Massport or the Port of New York, but for Maine it is meaningful," said Robert Elder, director of ports for the Maine Transportation Department. His department helped obtain the $3.5 million in federal grants and state bond issues that financed the Eastport project.

Before the extension was completed, the port had already increased its export tonnage from nothing in 1980 to almost 60,000 tons in 1984. That was done by servicing shallow draft freighters and specialized barge-carriers that anchor offshore and receive fully loaded lighters. With the pier extension, tonnage is expected to double or even triple within two years.

"There is a lot of room to grow down there," Elder said. "I think they could get up to 150,000 tons if everything goes right for them." That compares favorably, he said, with Maine's two other international ports. Searsport and Portland, which handled 325,000 and 200,000 tons of cargo last year respectively.

OFFERS SHIPPERS LOWER COSTS

For Eastporters, the work translates into jobs. Since Eastport began shipping paper pulp four years ago, an independent longshoremen's union has been established, offering intermittent employment to roughly 40 men and women. With their own union, stevedores are able to offer shippers flexible work hours, and smaller, less costly loading gangs. Those jobs should expand and become full-time as tonnage increases.

"The bottom line for the shipper is it's cheaper here," said Bob Wallace, manager of Federal Marine Terminals Inc., Eastport's private cargo handler.

Wallace and others said that, for pulp and lumber mills as well, shipping through Eastport offers substantial savings in trucking costs. For example, most of the pulp output of a mill in nearby Woodland is shipped through the Canadian port of Saint John in New Brunswick, which is about 120 miles from the mill, "Eastport is 40 miles from the mill." Wallace said.

Trucking companies, merchants and restaurants also are getting spin-off business. "Every time a ship comes in, we get a lot more business." said Barbara Price, manager of the Schooner II, noting two Dutch sailors in her Water Street bar.

Eastport began looking to harbor expansion after plans for a major oil refinery faltered because of environmentalists opposition. "The difference was the other projects were all other people's ideas," Townsend said. "They came in and tried to sell things to the town. We had tremendous help from the state, but this has been pretty much a grassroots operation."

Buoyed by their success, some city officials are already talking about expanding the port, perhaps by building a second pier and adding a few warehouses. "You can't stand still," said City Councilor Nathan Cohen. "You've either got to go ahead or you've got to drop off behind."●

OUTSTANDING CITIZENS' AWARDS TO BE MADE AT McDOWELL POST VFW MARKING LOYALTY DAY

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to let my colleagues know of the awards ceremonies to be conducted by an outstanding veterans' organization, namely the Edward McDowell Post No. 2648, Veterans of Foreign Wars, at their post rooms, 510 81st Street, North Bergen, NJ.

These ceremonies will be held on Sunday, April 28 at 7 p.m. as part of the national program of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, which is ongoing annually, aimed at counteracting the menace of communism.

Marking May 1 as Loyalty Day and also Law Day and combining it with their Awards Night program, the McDowell Post is very adequately honoring citizens who have participated in preserving our American way of life during their joint ceremony.

Post Commander Albert Fischbach, and Ladies' Auxiliary President Theresa Grazicso are working closely with Post Commander Thomas Carli, who is chairman of this program.

New Jersey State Commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars John T. Doonan will travel from Kenville, NJ, for this function, as will Rev. George (Beachhead) Gorman former State chaplain.

Aiding Past Commander Carli in the arrangements are George Parks, Marie Clegg, Exq., and Past Commander James Fitzgerald, who are working with a large committee.

Spotlighting the program will be outstanding citizens' awards made to members of the community who have, for many years, been guiding lights to all persons of good will advocating brotherhood, inspiration, and service.

The principal award will go to Joseph Coviello, who has been named outstanding citizen of Hudson County for VFW District 3 competition. He also has won the McDowell Post No. 2648 award and is now in State competition.

Joseph Coviello is best known as a football coach since 1937.

Born in 1914 in New York City, he moved to west New York in 1920 and was educated in that community's school system. He attended Public School No. 5 and Memorial High School where he was president of the 1932 class.

The next 4 years saw Joe Coviello at Columbia University, where he earned his bachelor of arts in history while playing under the immortal coach, Lou Little.

In 1936 he was captain of the famous team and was named All-East guard.

In 1937 he earned his master's degree in history from Columbia, and continued his educational program at Teacher's College and at the same institution earned an A.B.D.

In 1941 he married Catherine Telsca and they were blessed with a daughter, MaryLu who was born on September 8, 1949.

Coviello was a history teacher for 6 years in Berwick, PA, before he entered the U.S. naval service where he saw active duty in the Atlantic and Pacific theaters and earned the rank of lieutenant.

He returned to west New York, taught at Memorial High School for 14 years and then became vice principal and principal of North Bergen High School from 1960 to 1973.

From 1973 to 1985 he was the principal of Memorial High School, west New York, which in 1983 earned the coveted title of "Top Urban High School in New Jersey."

It was during his football coaching days at Memorial High School, from 1946 to 1961, where his teams earned a record of 117-18-1. His team won 13 Hudson County championships and 7 State championships. They compiled a State record for consecutive victories of 40 wins in a row, losing only once in 72 games.

On eight occasions he was named Hudson County "Coach of the Year" and New Jersey "State Coach of the Year" three times.

UNICO National saw fit to proclaim him the "Man of the Year" for 1957.

From 1962 to 1972 he was head football coach at North Bergen High School, earning five Hudson County championships with a record of 79-19-6.

From 1974 to 1978 he tried coaching at St. Peter's College, Jersey City, where his record was 20-20.

His overall football record was 243-15-10 in high school coaching, with a remarkable victory rate of 83 percent.

In December 1984 he received the New Jersey State Interscholastic Atlantic Association honor award for 1984 and was inducted into the National High School Sports Hall of Fame, the first New Jersey coach to be so honored. Only three football coaches nationally have been given this coveted award.

Other awards are to be given to Rabbi Emeritus Sidney Nissenbaum, retired from Temple Beth-el, North Bergen, and Rev. Howard L. Wilcomes, of Community Church of God, North Bergen, for their assistance in helping veterans' organizations with patriotic events for many years during Veterans' Day and Memorial Day ceremonies.

They will receive their awards from New Jersey State VFW Chaplain Fred W. Christiansen.

Also to be honored are two men of the North Bergen Police Department; namely, Police Chief George Lehman, who has given 40 years as a police officer, and John Broking, deputy police chief, who has helped the North Bergen post conduct its safety campaign.

During the ceremonies Marie Clegg, Esq., post ladies' auxiliary member, will speak on Law Day.

The McDowell Post must be commended for their patriotism and tenacity, constantly beating the drums of freedom in their Loyality Day and Law Day programs. Their post stands like a bastion in New Jersey, ever vigilant regarding movements which seek to undermine our American way of life.

In addition to service and comradeship, the McDowell Post live brotherhood. They work to remember forgotten veterans and their families. They teach love of God and country. They work for all segments of our society. In addition to veterans and their families, they provide programs of cheer for the young and cooperate in programs aimed at serving our older Americans.

Every member of the McDowell Post and its Ladies' Auxiliary echo the words of Franklin Delano Roosevelt in "The Four Freedoms":

In the future days, which we seek to make secure, we look forward to a world founded upon four essential human freedoms.

The first is freedom of speech and expression—everyhere in the world.

The second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world.

The third is freedom from want—which, translated into world terms, means economic understandings which will secure to every nation a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants—everywhere in the world.

The fourth is freedom from fear—which, translated into world terms, means a worldwide reduction of armaments to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no nation will be in a position to commit an act of physical aggression against any neighbor—anywhere in the world.

That is no vision of a distant millennium. It is a definite basis for a kind of world attainable in our own time and generation. That kind of world is the very antithesis of the so-called new order of tyranny which the dictators seek to create with the crash of a bomb.

The McDowell Post, and indeed the entire Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other organizations are reminders of:

PRIVILEGE AND OBLIGATION

To millions of people all over the world America is a magic name. Here are schools, roads, parks, libraries, and playgrounds; peaceful living and the right to choose our jobs and plan our lives. Such an ample way of life we may too readily assume to be our natural right. But every benefit, every right, was bought for us—at a price. When we think of the cost paid by our forefathers, we begin to realize that living in a great land is a responsibility as well as a privilege. As we share the experiences of Americans past and present, we may discover new reasons for wanting to keep our country the home of the brave and the free and the good.

I am certain that my colleagues here in the House of Representatives wish to join me in a well-deserved salute to those we have honored and to members of the McDowell Post.●

REPRESENTATIVE HYDE ANNOUNCES ESSAY CONTEST WINNERS

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, April 22, 1985

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I recently conducted my annual Sixth District Congressional Essay Contest for junior and senior high school students in my district, and today I am very pleased to announce to my colleagues the names of the junior high school winners. The first place winner is Sally Niermann of Zion Lutheran School in Bensenville; the second place winner is Scott Pettingill of St. Zachary School in Des Plaines; and the third place winner is Rob Ochonicky of Blackhawk Junior High School in Bensenville.

The essay contest theme I asked our junior high school participants to expound on was "What Are the President's Responsibilities in Our Government, and What Power Does the Constitution Provide to Meet Those Responsibilities?"

All three students have written excellent essays on the constitutional role of the President, and on the importance of leadership from our Chief Executive.

I commend all three students for their insightful essays, and am pleased to include them in the RECORD:

WHAT THE PRESIDENT CAN AND SHOULD DO ACCORDING TO THE CONSTITUTION

(By Sally Niermann, Zion Lutheran School, Bensenville, IL)

The powers and responsibilities of the President may be divided into two main groups. The first group are those specifically listed in the constitution itself, and the second are those the President takes upon himself within the limits of the constitution.

There are many specifically listed responsibilities such as the following: enforce laws, handle foreign affairs, keep our country strong, and act on bills already introduced and/or propose new ones.

The powers to meet these responsibilites are also listed in the constitution. For example, the President has power to appoint officials, cabinet members, and all federal judges which helps him to enforce laws. He/she may also recognize foreign governments and meet with representatives of other countries so as to handle foreign affairs. In order to keep our country strong, the President is Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces of the United States including the national guard when it is called into national service.

The President also has authority to act on bills already passed by congress either by vetoing them or by signing them into law. He/she may also propose new legislation of his own.

All of these responsibilities and powers are very important. But there is another kind that is just as or even more important. It is not listed in the constitution but is one which the President takes upon himself. He has the responsibility to give leadership, direction, and inspiration to the country. He does this by using all the powers of the office, but still not making himself above the law.

Examples of presidents who showed great leadership qualities were, of course, Washington and Lincoln. Franklin Roosevelt gave much inspiration during the great depression.

More modern day examples of presidents who have been effective leaders are John F. Kennedy and Dwight D. Eisenhower. Many people also think that President Reagan will be remembered as this kind of President.

For by using the responsibilities of his office wisely the President can and should make the country as a whole feel united and strong.

WHAT ARE THE PRESIDENT'S RESPONSIBILITIES IN OUR GOVERNMENT AND WHAT POWER DOES THE CONSTITUTION PROVIDE TO MEET THOSE RESPONSIBILITIES?

(By Scott Pettingill, St. Zachary School, Des Plaines, IL)

The President is leader of the Executive Branch of our government. To the extent that our Federal Civil Servants have need of common guidance, he alone is in a position to provide it, we can't realize the fullness of the President's duties unless we recall that he is held primarily accountable for the ethics, loyalty, efficiency, frugality and responsiveness to the public's wishes of the two and one-third million Americans in the national administration.

Both the Constitution and Congress have recognized his power to guide the day-to-day activities of the Executive Branch, strained and restrained though his leadership may be in practice, from the Constitution, clear or implied, he receives the twin powers of appointment and removal, as well as the primary duty, which no law or plan or circumstances can ever take away from him, to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed". From Congress, through such legislative mandates as the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 and the succession of Reorganization Acts, the President has received further acknowledgment of his administrative leadership.

Although independent agencies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the National Labor Relations Board operate by design outside his immediate area of responsibility, most of the government's administrative tasks are still carried on within the fuzzy, edged pyramid that has the Office of President at its lonely peak. The laws executed daily, in the name of the president and under his general supervision number in the hundreds.

Article II of the Constitution summarized describes the office of President and Vice President. Included therein is specific information regarding length of term, method of election, qualifications for office and method of succession. It also prescribes the "oath of office", lists specific presidential duties and powers and tells how (when necessary) the President may be removed from office.

The President's responsibilities are vast and probably quite awesome to the average American Citizen. We must often wonder how any one man can accept this position as leader of the Executive Branch of our government and constantly strive to see that the laws of our country are faithfully executed. The office of President is a powerful one, therefore we should always strive to elect someone to this office whom we truly believe is concerned with the welfare of All People at All Times.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE PRESIDENT IN OUR GOVERNMENT AND CONSTITUTIONAL POWER PROVIDED TO MEET THOSE RESPONSIBILITIES

(By Rob Ochonicky, Blackhawk Junior High School, (Bensenville, IL)

The President of the United States is the chosen leader and representative of the people of our country. The Constitution gives him the responsibility of preserving, protecting and defending its articles and amendments through the functions of government agencies. Some duties of his office are stated in the Constitution, some are required by law, and others are simply a result of custom. However, they all work together to make him one of the most powerful figures in the world.

As Head of State and Chief Diplomat, he is a living symbol of the nation. Along with the Secretary of State and other advisors, he determines what foreign policy should be, appoints ambassadors, makes treaties (with Senate approval), and receives foreign representatives. President Reagan is presently planning arms control talks with the Soviet Union.

In the area of Domestic Administration he is Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces (including state militia). The Constitution states that only Congress can declare war, but the President can order troops sent to any part of the world. Domestic powers also include appointments of many domestic officials, and preparation of the national budget for Congressional approval. President Reagan is trying to improve the economy by controlling inflation, unemployment and taxes.

Another duty of the President is to be the Legislative Leader. He may call both Houses into special session, recommend measures to Congress and veto bills. He informs Congress of the nation's needs and how it is progressing through the State of the Union speech. He is also political leader of the party in power, and campaigns for party members who have supported his policies. This last function is not mentioned in the Constitution, and is based on custom alone.

As Chief Executive, the President appoints many officials in the Executive and Judicial branches. These include judges, cabinet members, advisors and department heads, all of whom must be approved by a majority vote in the Senate. He may also grant pardons and reprieves for federal offenses.

The Constitution states that the President must see that the laws are faithfully executed. A system of checks and balances helps him to monitor the other branches of government, and they in turn keep the Executive Branch from becoming all powerful. This arrangement allows our President to carry out his responsibilities within a well structured government that follows the guidelines drawn up in our Constitution. It is unique blending of power and balance that allows this nation's leader to be as big a man as he can be.●

SENATE—Wednesday, April 24, 1985

(Legislative day of Monday, April 15, 1985)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

God of grace, we thank You for the memories of Senator Sam Ervin and commend his family to Your gracious care in their loss.

Father in Heaven, the Senate has completed difficult debate and made a hard choice, only to confront challenging deliberation and elusive decisions. Refresh weary minds, bodies, and emotions as they seek a goal on which all agree while they struggle with the means about which there is much controversy. As the process unfolds, grant that truth will prevail rather than power. Millions depend upon 100 Senators to do what is right. Help them to remember that—and do it! Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished majority leader is recognized.

SCHEDULE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, under the standing order, the leaders have 10 minutes each, to be followed by special orders in favor of Senators PROXMIRE, LEVIN, SPECTER, D'AMATO, BOSCHWITZ, and METZENBAUM for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Special orders will be followed by routine morning business until the hour of 1:45 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

Pursuant to provision of Senate Resolution 100, the official photograph of the Senate will be taken at 2 o'clock today. All Senators are asked to be in the Chamber and in their seats by 1:50 p.m.

Following the photograph, it is the intention of the majority leader to turn to Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the budget resolution. We hope we might work out some agreement with the distinguished minority leader later on by which we will not have any amendments or votes today, but general debate.

Also, the Senate could turn to any Legislative or Executive Calendar items cleared for action by unanimous consent.

ORDER FOR CONTROL OF CERTAIN SPECIAL ORDERS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that special orders in favor of Senators D'AMATO, BOSCHWITZ, and METZENBAUM be under the control of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDWATER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

EFFECTIVE ARMS CONTROL REQUIRES AN END TO NUCLEAR WEAPONS TESTING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this is the third in my series of speeches on the conditions necessary for negotiation of successful arms control agreements with the Soviet Union. In my first speech, I outlined the overall conditions necessary for arms control to succeed. In my second speech, I discussed the first condition, which was a recognition that an arms control agreement by the United States required the commitment of one institution, in fact of one person, and that person alone. That person is the President. There is no possibility of success in arms control without the President's leadership. It is his exclusive ball game.

In this third speech on arms control, I advance the thesis that the control of nuclear weapons can only succeed if arms control stops the testing of all nuclear weapons anywhere and at any level of explosion. The 1963 treaty between the United States and the Soviet Union blazed the way. That treaty stopped testing nuclear weapons in the atmosphere, in outer space, or under the oceans. It specifically permitted underground testing. In 1974, the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to a second treaty to limit underground testing to explosions of 150 kilotons or less. Those two treaties protected the atmosphere, but they did little to end the arms race because tests of 150 kilotons underground permitted both superpowers to continue their technological advance at a rapid pace.

Indeed, the two superpowers have engaged in more than 1,000 tests since the 1974 agreement. The 150 kiloton limit and the confinement to underground testing means that the test ban treaty does nothing to slow the on-rushing between the superpowers to advance nuclear weapons with an even more devastating technology.

Far and away the most important element in both the 1963 and 1974 treaty was a pledge committed by both parties to the treaty to negotiate an end to all nuclear weapons testing. That was a solemn promise that the superpowers have never kept. Both nations have walked out on their pledge. Why is this commitment so critical? It is critical because an end to nuclear testing would, in the words of the head of the Livermore Nuclear Weapons Testing Laboratory, perform a frontal lobotomy on nuclear weapons research.

Why would the end of nuclear weapons testing stop the technological arms race in nuclear weapons? Because that arms race depends crucially on research, new breakthroughs, new developments which research alone can promise. As any high school freshman studying chemistry or any Nobel Prize winner in science can tell you, you stop testing and you inhibit research. Without testing we have theories, but unless we test those theories, they are empty and useless. This principle especially applies to nuclear weapons testing.

All of our Presidents since President Kennedy negotiated that 1963 treaty have failed to keep the promise of that treaty. This includes: Presidents Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and Carter, as well as Reagan. Why have they failed to keep our promise? The reason is easily understandable. This country has immense technological and scientific advantages over the Soviet Union.

In his recent statement to Congress the Under Secretary of Research for research and engineering disclosed that in comparing the United States and the U.S.S.R. in 20 basic technologies, the United States is today superior in 15. The Soviet Union and the United States are equal in five. The Soviet Union is superior in none—not any. Furthermore, in deployed military systems out of 30 weapon systems, the United States is superior in 17. The two superpowers are equal in eight and the Soviet Union is superior in only five.

So, yes, indeed, this country does have a clear scientific, technological weapons superiority, for this reason Presidents have been persuaded that we should do what comes naturally for those with a superior advantage over an adversary in any respect. Exploit it, use it, take advantage of it. Why not? Why should we not continue to take advantage of our technological superiority? Why should we give it up by stopping testing? Do we not win by continuing this part of the arms race where we excel?

Sounds good. But, Mr. President, we must recognize that this is one race no one wins unless both stop. Unless both stop, both lose. Can anyone argue that if both the Soviet Union and the United States stop right now, right where we are in the testing production and deployment of nuclear weapons, we won't be better off than if we continue this arms race? This Senator thinks so. And the consistent expression of the American people in statewide referenda, in professional polls, and in town meetings shows an overwhelming three to one or more support for stopping the arms race now with a freeze that would include nuclear weapons testing.

Can we not stop short of stopping nuclear arms testing? Can't we simply agree to reduce the number of nuclear weapons on both sides? Can we not simply cut the megatonnage? Can we not just retire our intercontinental ballistic missiles or our submarine missiles or our cruise missiles? Will that not accomplish an effective basis for arms control?

The answer, Mr. President, is "No." The answer is that new technological developments in nuclear weapons can destroy the nuclear balance between the two superpowers that has kept the nuclear peace for the past 30 years. Yes, indeed, we are more likely than the Soviets to make the kind of nuclear weapons breakthrough that would give us a temporary advantage. That is probable. It is far from certain. The best chance for continued peace lies—as the overwhelming majority of the American believe—in stopping the arms race now.

RESIGNATION OF DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION AIDES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last week's incident regarding the resignation of two aides from the Department of Education is past history. Before the final curtain drops, however, I want to express my admiration over the manner in which my colleague, LOWELL WEICKER, handled this situation. He was the first to raise any questions in the Congress regarding the suitability of these individuals at a recent hearing before his Appropriations Subcommittee on the Education Budget. Senator WEICKER acted responsibly that day and, in my judgment, fairly—making it very clear why the two aides, particularly in light of their extremist views regarding disabled Americans, should not be part of the Federal educational landscape.

I support the Senator's actions. We do not always vote the same way but I'm behind him all the way with this one.

A WRONGHEADED IDEA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there are many reasons people oppose the Genocide Convention. One reason is the wrongheaded idea that the Genocide Convention's ratification would override American law and threaten the constitutional rights of U.S. citizens. John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State in the Eisenhower administration, made the argument quite well.

> Under our Constitution, treaties become supreme law of the land. They are indeed more supreme than ordinary laws, for congressional laws are invalid if they do not conform to the Constitution, whereas treaty laws can override the Constitution.

The statement provides an interesting clue to the solution to the problem. The words "under our Constitution" dictate that treaty guidelines are spelled out by the Constitution, which sets the rules by which treaties are enforced.

The Supreme Court has consistently held that the Constitution is superior to all laws and treaties. Reid against Covert (1957) is an excellent example of the Court's attitude on this issue. In that case the Court held that "no agreement with a foreign nation can confer power on the Congress, or on any other branch of government, which is free from the restraints of the Constitution."

The Genocide Convention would require passage of legislation that was in accordance with the Constitution. The laws that would be enacted would be congressional laws making genocide a domestic crime. Being congressional law, as Mr. Dulles pointed out, they would have to conform to the Constitution. Any laws enacted for the purpose of making the convention functional must meet the test of constitutionality. The argument that the Genocide Convention would override American law and threaten the constitutional rights of U.S. citizens holds little water and is not a basis for opposition to the convention.

The Genocide Convention meets the test of constitutionality. The Supreme Court in Reid against Covert (1957) held the authority of the Constitution over all laws and treaties. The American Bar Association has endorsed the constitutionality of the convention.

One of the most conservative Justices of the Supreme Court, William Rehnquist, who is an eminent constitutional authority, testified on the Genocide Convention, on this very point. He testified to the Foreign Relations Committee that the Constitution is supreme and that there is no way any provision of the genocide treaty or any other treaty can override it. He did that, of course, in supporting the Genocide Convention.

Mr. President, now it is time for this body to take action on the convention. The Genocide Convention's time is due; it is time for the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR LEVIN

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Michigan want the remainder of my time?

Mr. LEVIN. I would appreciate it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am happy to yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under the previous order, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank the Chair.

COMMEMORATION OF ARMENIAN MARTYR'S DAY

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am, once again, pleased to sponsor the Senate's commemoration of Armenian Martyr's Day. This year's commemoration is particularly significant for a number of reasons. Today is the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the 20th century's first genocide. This is a day that Armenians all over the world take pause to honor the memory of the 1.5 million Armenians massacred between 1915 and 1923 by the Turkish Ottoman Empire, a tragic event which is recorded by eyewitness accounts in historical archives throughout the world.

This week, many of the survivors of the Turkish atrocities against the Armenian people have traveled to Washington to pay tribute to the memory of those who perished. They will be participating in a weeklong series of events as part of a national gathering of survivors sponsored by the Prelacy of the Armenian Apostolic Church of America. Just this past weekend, we say thousands of Armenian-Americans and survivors of the genocide gather on New York's Times Square and commemorate the genocide as part of a rally sponsored by the diocese of the Armenian Church of America.

Let those who deny the genocide of the Armenian people tell those who survived—men and women—in their 70's, 80's, 90's, and even 100's—that there was no genocide. The survivors should not have to respond to such a preposterous charge. Indeed, the look of sorrow in their eyes tells the stories of horror and grief of the loss of loved ones—stories that will live through the ages because we will not allow those who deny the genocide to change history.

This day also serves as a tragic reminder that the first genocide of the 20th century became the precedent for the Holocaust of World War II. The line from Armenia to Auschwitz is a direct one. As Adolf Hitler planned his invasion of Poland and the destruction of the Jewish people, he was able to scornfully state, "Who, after all, speaks today of the annihilation of the Armenians?" The world did not learn a lesson from the Armenian genocide. By commemorating the memory of these victims, we can try to prevent history from again repeating itself. Such tragedies can only be prevented in the future if they are remembered. This is the legacy our ancestors left to the surviving generations—a legacy to which we pay tribute today.

Mr. President, we also honor the memory of those victims of the genocide today. And it is the memory of those victims that we seek to honor with Senate Joint Resolution 101, a resolution that would designate today—April 24—as "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man," that Senator D'AMATO and I introduced on March 28 and a number of our colleagues have already cosponsored. It is identical to House Joint Resolution 192, introduced March 19. This would be a day of remembrance for all victims of genocide, especially the 1.5 million people of Armenian ancestry who were victims of the genocide perpetrated in Turkey between 1915 and 1923.

We expected opposition to Senate Joint Resolution 101 from the Turkish Embassy, which has mounted a campaign to deny Ottoman Turkey's role in the Armenian genocide. And we expected opposition from the State Department, whose policies are similar to the positions taken by Turkey relative to the Armenian genocide. But, quite frankly, we were saddened when President Reagan said on April 1 during meetings with Turkish Prime Minister Turgut Ozal:

> My Administration opposes Congressional action (on resolutions that commemorate the Armenian genocide). We are concerned such resolutions might inadvertently encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turkish-Americans. We also oppose them because they could harm relations with an important ally.

It is ironic that, while this body is being urged by the President to ratify the Genocide Convention, we are also being urged by the same President to withhold acknowledgement that the first genocide of the 20th century ever happened. It also contradicts two previous statements by President Reagan in 1980 and 1981 which clearly recognized the existence and contemporary relevance of the Armenian genocide.

Mr. President, we deplore acts of terrorism against Turkish officials and condemn the use of violence in international affairs. However, our mutual abhorrence of terrorism and our common security interests cannot be invoked to justify denial of American and Armenian history.

Just as the President has dismayed many Americans with his planned visit next month to Bitburg Cemetery in West Germany where soldiers of the Nazi SS are buried, the President dismayed us with his insensitive statements on congressional attempts to commemorate the Armenian genocide. I do not understand the President's logic in which he links terrorist attacks on Turkish officials with rejections of these resolutions. However, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger attempted to define the administration's position when he said:

> This resolution would embarrass the United States and strain relations with this critical ally (Turkey).

Well, Mr. President, the United States has been embarrassed all right, and the administration's position has strained relations—between this Government and its own citizens. And as to the President's suggestion that these resolutions encourage terrorist attacks, quite the opposite is true. The current Turkish Government should acknowledge the role of its predecessor government—the Ottoman Turkish Government—in the Armenian genocide, just as the present West German Government has done about the Nazi crimes. If the Turkish Government would do this, if would make a real contribution to getting some of the terrorism behind us because it is the Turkish denial of history which is creating the frustration.

The Armenian genocide is a historical fact. Our American Ambassador to Ottoman Turkey, Henry Morgenthau, stated:

> I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared with the sufferings of the Armenian race in 1915.

Armenian-Americans point proudly to the fact that it was our own Ambassador Morgenthau who led the international outcry against the destruction that was taking place in Ottoman Turkey during World War I. As a Jewish-American, Morgenthau understood the parallel between earlier Jewish programs and the persecution of the Armenians. He used every tool available to him, including secret diplomatic cables, personal entreaties to Ottoman leaders and their allied German counterparts, and appeals to the international public to bring the wholesale slaughters to a halt.

Mirroring Morgenthau's efforts, the then-allied Governments of France, Great Britain, and Russia issued a declaration on May 24, 1915, denouncing the massacres of the Armenian population "as crimes against humanity and civilization for which all members of the Turkish Government will be held responsible together with its agents implicated in the massacres." These World War I American Allies, like Ambassador Morgenthau, understood that the Ottoman government was committing a crime of a type that the world had not yet encountered. While their phrase "crimes against humanity" was to be used later to describe the Nazi Holocaust, it was not until 1944 that the word "genocide" was coined by Prof. Raphael Lemkin. Lemkin, a lawyer who escaped Poland during the Nazi invasion of 1939, was the key figure in the history of making genocide a crime under international law. He lost 49 members of his own family in the Holocaust and worked tirelessly until his death in 1959 toward the adoption of the Genocide Convention.

Having been profoundly affected by the extermination of the Armenians in Ottoman Turkey in 1915, Lemkin first proposed "to declare the destruction of racial, religious, or social collectivities" an international crime at the International Conference on the Unification of Criminal Law held at Madrid in 1933 under the auspices of the League of Nations. Although at first rejected, his proposal gained new significance after the destruction of European Jewry in World War II and led to the drafting of the Genocide Convention by a United Nations committee in 1947-48. In his decade-long effort to obtain ratification of the treaty, Lemkin repeatedly noted the Armenian atrocities, together with the Holocaust, as prototypes of the crime of genocide.

Recognizing this progression of 20th century genocide, Professor Lemkin dedicated himself to ensure that individuals such as Talaat, Enver, and Jemal—the Young Turk triumvirate—would never again be permitted to conduct the wholesale destruction of a people, without accountability to the world.

Calls for such accountability has now been linked to the founder of modern Turkey, who acknowledged the truth of the mass slaughter of Armenians in Ottoman Turkey. A newly discovered interview with Mustapha Kemal—commonly known as "Ataturk"—published in the August 1, 1926, issue of the Los Angeles Examiner, documents Kemal's recognition that his predecessor regime, the Young Turk Party, "should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our Christian subjects who were ruthlessly driven en masse from their homes and massacred." This acknowledgment is particularly significant because it constitutes highly placed, significant Turkish admission of the Ottoman crimes against Armenians and directly contradicts current Turkish denial of the genocide.

Mr. President, every April 24, Armenians all over the world reflect on the proud heritage and rich culture—from the time of St. Gregory the Illuminator, who led Armenia to become the first Christian nation of the world in A.D. 301, to the present, where Armenians make important contributions to the world of business, philanthropy, academia, the arts and sciences, and yes, politics. It it through such reflections that we are able to appreciate the reasons which have kept the Armenian people so vital a community and so valuable a part of our Nation.

While the survivors of the genocide mourn their lost ones, they also must pass along their stories of tragedy so that the memory of those who perished are not forgotten by the world. The martyrs live on through them—through each and all of us who remember. Those of the younger generation should never forget the sacrifice of the ancestors. They, also, should never forget the rich culture which has contributed so much to the world community. And together, they should perpetuate the story of the Armenian people and share its lessons with all the people of the world. Only in that way can some of the suffering of the genocide be redeemed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a factsheet on Raphael Lemkin from the Armenian Assembly, a national nonprofit organization representing views of the Armenian-American community.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARMENIAN ASSEMBLY OF AMERICA—RAPHAEL LEMKIN, THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE, AND THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Professor Raphael Lemkin, a lawyer who escaped Poland during the Nazi invasion of 1939, was the key figure in the history of making genocide a crime under international law. Having lost 49 members of his own family in the Holocaust, he coined the term "genocide" in 1944 and worked tirelessly until his death in 1959 toward the adoption of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

Having been profoundly affected by the extermination of the Armenians in Ottoman Turkey from 1915 to 1923, Lemkin first proposed "to declare the destruction of racial, religious, or social collectivities' an international crime at the International Conference on the Unification of Criminal Law held in Madrid under the auspices of the League of Nations in 1933. Although at first rejected, his proposal gained new significance after the destruction of European Jewry in World War II and lead to the drafting of the Genocide Convention by a United Nations committee in 1947-48.

After coining the term "genocide" to describe the deliberate destruction of a people, Lemkin became the first person to characterize the atrocities of 1915-23 as the "Armenian Genocide." In his decade-long effort to obtain ratification of the Genocide Convention, Lemkin repeatedly noted the Armenian Genocide, together with the Holocaust, as a prototype of the crime of genocide.

QUOTATIONS BY RAPHAEL LEMKIN

(1) From letter to Mrs. Thelma Stevens, Methodist Women's Council, July 26, 1950:

"This Convention is a matter of conscience and is a test of our personal relationship to evil. I know it is very hot in July and August for work and planning, but without becoming sentimental or trying to use colorful speech, let us not forget that the heat of this month is less unbearable to us than the heat in the ovens of Auschwitz and Dachau and more lenient than the murderous heat in the desert of Aleppo which burned to death the bodies of hundreds of thousands of Christian Armenian victims of genocide in 1915."

(2) From Totally Unofficial, the autobiography (unpublished) of Raphael Lemkin:

(a) "In 1915, the Germans occupied the city of W. and the entire area. I used this time to read more history, to study and to watch whether national, religious or racial groups are being destroyed. The truth came out only after the war. In Turkey, more than 1,200,000 Armenians were put to death for no other reason than they were Christians . . . After the end of the war, some 150 Turkish war criminals were arrested and interned by the British Government on the island of Malta. The Armenians sent a delegation to the peace conference at Versailles. They were demanding justice. Then one day, the delegation read in the newspapers that all Turkish war criminals were released. I was shocked. A nation was killed and the guilty persons were set free. Why is a man punished when he kills another man? Why is the killing of a million a lesser crime than the killing of a single individual?"

(b) "I identified myself more and more with the sufferings of the victims, whose numbers grew, as I continued my study of history. I understood that the function of memory is not only to register past events, but to stimulate human conscience. Soon contemporary examples of Genocide followed, such as the slaughter of the Armenians in 1915. It became clear to me that the diversity of nations, religious groups and races is essential to civilization because every one of these groups has a mission to fulfill and a contribution to make in terms of culture . . . I decided to become a lawyer and work for the outlawing of Genocide and for its prevention through the cooperation of nations."

(c) ". . . A bold plan was formulated in my mind. This consisted (of) obtaining the ratification by Turkey among the first twenty founding nations. This would be an atonement for (the) genocide of the Armenians. But how could this be achieved? . . . The Turks are proud of their republican form of government and of progressive concepts, which helped them in replacing the rule of the Ottoman Empire. The genocide convention must be put within the framework of social and international progress. I knew however that in this conversation both sides will have to avoid speaking about one thing, although it would be constantly in their minds; the Armenians."

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Detroit News "Michigan" magazine article about three survivors of the Armenian genocide living in the Detroit area be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 24, 1915

(By Florence Mazian)

As an Armenian-American, I feel the pain and pride of my heritage. Pride in being descended from an ancient people who lived in the biblical land of Ararat. And pride at living in America—a country that permits us to remember who we were, as well as who we are.

But I also feel the pain of my people's past. For some 3,700 years, the Armenians—the first people to embrace Christianity as a state religion—lived in Ararat, which was occupied by the Turks in the 1600s. Tensions grew between the two sects over the next 300 years, finally culminating in a series of massacres that began in the late 1800s and climaxed on April 24, 1915—a day Armenians claim marked the Turks' "final solution." In Istanbul, teachers and priests were carted off, never to be heard from again. Killings spread to villages and towns throughout the land, with as many as 1½ million Armenians reportedly deported and killed.

Today, the Turkish government continues to deny that any of this occurred. However, a number of historians, diplomats and missionaries—William Gladstone of England, George Clemenceau of France, historian Arnold Toynbee, German missionary Johannes Lepsius and American medical director Dr. Mabel Elliot—corroborate the Armenian claims of genocide. Henry Morgenthau, U.S. ambassador to Turkey in 1915, documents the nightmare in his book, Ambassador Morgenthau's Story. Morgenthau says he pleaded with the Turkish government to stop the genocide, believing the Christian Armenians and Moslem Turks could live peaceably together. Talaat Pasha, head of the Turkish government, told him: "We have already disposed of three-quarters of the Armenians . . . we have got to finish with them."

Perhaps the most compelling evidence, however, is the stories of those who left Armenia in 1915. A number of them live in the Metro area today. The following stories are typical of the many I heard from the old Armenians who came to visit our home in Detroit as I was growing up. As a child, I did not understand the tragedy behind their tales. Today, I do.

LEVONTI AZADIAN

(Levonti Azadian was born in 1907. After the genocide, she lived in Lebanon. She moved to Southfield in 1974 and lives there now with her children and grandchildren. A gentle, soft-spoken woman, she had an extended family that numbered 42 before the nightmare of 1915. Afterward, there were four.)

"When survivors like me die, the nightmare of the genocide passes before our eyes as we are dying. I will die like that, too. Even today, I feel fear when I think about it. I have horrible dreams. I will not sleep tonight. My heart will be pounding. When I talk about it, I am there. I am afraid, just as I was then.

"The Turkish police came to our houses with guns. They forced us to leave, and they locked the doors to our houses behind us. They told us that we had to go away for 15 days and then we could come back. They claimed that they were 'deporting' us to protect us, because the war was coming in our direction. Even before we were out of the city of Adana, a blind Turkish beggar who the Armenians, including my family, used to give food to, said: 'Bring me an Armenian, and hold him down across my knee, so that I might stab and kill a Christian and go to heaven.'

"Before we were marched out of Adana, my grandfather's throat was slit, and his body was thrown in a well. Then we were taken out of the city. Immediately, they began to steal everything we had, even our clothes. As we were marched along, Turkish villagers would come and take away the pretty girls. We would never see them anymore. We were marched into the desert to Aleppo, Syria, the men, women and children wearing nothing more than a small cloth over their hips—nothing more. The sun burned your face and your body so badly that you did not even look the same. When we came to water, we were forced to walk past it but not allowed to drink it. Those who bent over to get a drink were knocked out and their bodies would float way into the river.

"There were dead bodies everywhere we walked. They were from the Armenians who had been marched through before us. We tried to cover their bodies as we passed—the bodies of little children. At night, dogs from nearby villages would come out and dig up the bodies, chewing them up.

"A Turkish man was taking away my cousin—a girl. She was 15. Her mother grabbed her and embraced her. At that moment, during the embrace, a Turk stabbed the mother in the back, and she fell to the ground."

Even as she reflects on these tragedies, Levonti Azadian recalls something else that makes her smile: the nickname of one young Armenian girl. "We used to call her 'the millionaire.' She was a beautiful girl, about 18 years old. But she had so many lice—we used to say that she had a million lice. During the marches, people became dirty and diseased. This beauty had sores all over her mouth from being dirty and eating pieces of hard wheat found in the fecal matter of the Turks' horses. When you are starving, you eat anything. One day we saw a Turk take her away. Even with the sores, she was still stunningly beautiful.

"My father had a young brother, 28—very handsome. He was thrown to the ground, and the Turks took knives and cut him all over—his back was all cut up. He was so skinny and had so little fluid left in his body that only a little blood ran out of him. His throat was all swollen, and the Turks thought that he was dead. They left him there. We were hidden at a distance, and after they left, we went to him and gave him what little food we had. After three or four days, he started to improve, but he was left deaf and almost blind. Another of my father's brothers was hit on the head and died immediately.

"Later, in Syria, we were all taken to a valley. It was easy to kill us there because the Turkish soldiers could attack from all sides. There was a family from Zeitioun, an Armenian city in Cilicia. I remember that they put that whole family into a cave and sealed off the entrance to the cave. Guards were posted outside. They were buried alive in that cave. The Turks came and told them, 'You are going to be buried like Jesus Christ.'

"You know, I saw death all around me, but I never thought that I was going to die. Maybe it was because I was a child that I didn't think it could happen to me. I was always optimistic. But I prayed a lot not to die. Everyone did. While being forced into the deserts, we sang church hymns and prayed. Everyone who died, died praying. Armenians were killed while they were on their knees praying. I saw so much that I can't tell it all, but I remember it all of the time—day and night.

"Some years ago, I went back to Adana to see my family's house. Turks live there now. I could not stay there at all. After days, I started to feel sick. I began to see my dead family before my eyes. I remembered how we were driven out to our deaths. I met older Turkish people who still remembered my family. I recalled how the Turks had laughed when they were killing us. I left."

VERKIN KEVORKIAN

(Verkin Kevorkian was born in 1905. After the genocide, she lived in Canada. She came to the United States in 1949. She currently lives in a senior citizen residence in Dearborn. Before the genocide, her extended family numbered 51. Afterward, there was just one.)

"I used to be beautiful, you know," she says. Despite her disclaimer, she is still strikingly beautiful. She is a tall, stately woman. As we speak, she is seated comfortably on the sofa in her small apartment.

Verkin Kevorkian was 10 years old at the time the genocide began. Recalling that day, she says, "My father had never hit me, but that day he slapped me. 'Don't go far away from home, my child; it's very dangerous,' he said." Very softly, as though to herself, she repeats, "It's very dangerous." Today she understands why her father slapped her. It was for the first and last time. She would be the sole survivor of her family.

She tells how the Turks and Kurds came to each house, forcing out all of the occupants. "Someone came to our house and forced us to leave. With only a few clothes, you were forced to go. Someone came and hit me and took me away. For three days, they made us walk—thousands of us—not only people from my village of Osnag but also from many villages and cities in different provinces—Erzeroum, Erzingan, Trebizond. You know who some of the people were who were taking us to be killed—Turks from our village, people that I knew, neighbors, friends. They thought they could take our houses, our belongings and our lands.

"There were thousands of us! Then they found the place where they wanted to kill us—a big, big valley. Suddenly from all sides thousands of Turks and Kurds descended upon us. They were all over. You couldn't do anything. You didn't have a weapon to fight back with. They killed all of the Armenians. They killed everybody. The dead bodies, the dead bodies, all over the place. Within half an hour, I had lost my family—completely. I lost all of them. And I was left there—alive under all of those dead bodies.

"The bodies were too heavy, so I couldn't get out. Somebody pulled me out. I don't know who or why. If they didn't pull me out, I would have died. When I looked around I couldn't see anything except dead girls, dead people, just piled up—all over, all over. As far as I looked, I saw dead bodies. I was covered with blood, crying and crying, looking for my mother. I couldn't find her. No one. I had lost all of them. I lost them.

"I saw a man on the ground. His throat was slit, yet he was still mumbling. He was my cousin's husband. I saw it with my own eyes."

Now, Verkin Kevorkian stands and begins pacing back and forth within a 4- to 5-foot space. Her eyes reflect the terror she is reliving 70 years later. Her eyes grow large and disbelieving as the past flits through her mind. Shock, terror, fear—all are alive in her again. She has become a shadow of the past, of that day in 1915. For a matter of seconds, she is not in her apartment, but under the dead bodies in Turkey. Abruptly, she stops pacing. "I went crazy. I didn't know what to do. I didn't know where to go. Every time I go back, back, back, I go crazy.

"They took the beautiful girls away. If you wouldn't go with them, they would kill you. My aunt was one such woman. When she said that she would not go with a Turk, they wrapped her long hair around her neck and strangled her with it. Then they cut off her fingers to take gold rings that her husband had sent her from America. The Turks and Kurds didn't care if a girl was young, even if she was only 9 or 10 years old. They raped girls of any age.

"When the genocide began, they kidnaped our priest. They would not kill priests right away, because they wanted to torture them. They would make them suffer. My mother's brother was one of the priests in our village. I have forgotten his name. There were always priests on my mother's side. Before, in 1895, the Turks had killed another priest in my family.

"I walked and walked and walked. I went to Harpert, to Zaboot, to Paloo and many other places. I never spoke Armenian. I heard that they would kill me if I spoke Armenian. I spoke Kurdish and a little Turkish. I was forgetting Armenian. I was hungry. I had no shoes. My feet were bleeding. I met up with an old Kurdish woman who fed me. Later, an Armenian woman who had been forced to marry a Turk kept me. Her husband wanted me to marry a Turk so I ran away. I didn't even know where I was going.

"There were three soldiers behind me. I started running and crying. They yelled, 'Don't run. You can't get away. We're going to kill you.' I kept crying and running, even though my feet were bleeding. I stopped and collapsed by a big stone. I thought, 'I don't care. I'll sit here. They're going to kill me. I don't care.' I wanted them to come and kill me, to get it over with. You see, I couldn't run anymore.

"I started to pray. I said, 'Oh, God. Please help me. I can't run anymore. I can't walk or run. I'm going to die.' Suddenly it seemed as if someone hid me, as if something made me invisible. I didn't see those soldiers anymore. They disappeared. Something happened. God heard me! God heard me! It was a miracle.

"When I got up later, I started walking and walking. I met a woman who asked me if I was Kurdish. 'Yes,' I responded, 'I'm Kurdish, too.' I was afraid to say that I'm Armenian. I said to her, 'You be my mother, I'll be your daughter. Let's go together.' But I ended up with a Turkish family. The lady was nice, but her son hated Armenians and used to beat me all of the time. This nice woman felt sorry for me and sent me to another Turkish family. There, the woman of the house cut my hair off completely so that I would not look good. She said that her husband was a dirty man and went after young girls. She also covered my face. I didn't mind. One day her husband offered me gold to sleep with him, so I ran away—back to the nice lady whose son beat me.

"While I was there, two Armenian guys found me and said that they would smuggle me to an Armenian orphanage in Merzin. Next morning, I got up and left with them. The Turkish woman came and yelled after me, crying, but it was too late. I wanted to go to the orphanage where there were Armenians. There were Protestant Armenian and Apostolic Armenian orphanages for homeless Armenian children. I went to the Apostolic Armenian one.

"In the genocide, they killed poor innocent people. They killed kids. They killed women, almost all of the women. If she were pregnant, they would cut her belly open and take the baby out on a sword. Then they would say, 'Where is your Jesus? Why doesn't he come to help you?" We were Christians, and the Turkish and Kurdish Moslems hate us. They completely butchered our people—with knives and swords. They cut people to pieces. That's what pains me.

"Today no Armenians live where I came from. Now our country is all empty. No Armenians. All empty."

MICHAEL NISHANIAN

(Michael Nishanian was born in 1901. He came to Detroit in 1920 and now lives in Southfield. His extended family numbered 44 people before the genocide; 11 after.)

"Someone yelled at me: 'Come and become a Turk. Your brother will never come back.' That same morning, when I was at the mill early in the morning with my brother, a policeman came. He took my brother and left. I was left alone. Alone, I was sitting and waiting. They told me that they took my father, too. I said, 'But my father is very old. You can't take him, too.' 'We took him, too,' they said. The police had gone to each house, one by one, each family, and took them into custody.

"I lived in a town called Choroum when the genocide began. That was our home. Now I had no home. Now I had nowhere to go. I was roaming around dazed, like I was half drunk.

"That night, I was on a mountain. Suddenly I saw a man coming toward me. I thought he was my brother and I ran to him. It was a Turk, our mayor's son, coming toward me. He had our donkey. He said that they had taken all of the men and killed them. Only the women and children were left. He told me that they wanted to kill me now, too. He tied my hands together so that people would think that he captured me. Then he took me to my home. Everybody was crying. This boy was a very good boy. He saved my life.

"I remember that they separated Armenians at one place we stopped. They said, 'Whoever will change to be a Moslem, stay on this side of the room. Whoever remains a Christian, go to the other side.' I remembered what my father always told me: 'If they try to force you, never say that you'll be a Moslem. You were born a Christian, and you will die a Christian.' 'All right, papa,' I said. 'All right.'

"Almost no one converted. The Turks did not kill you if you converted. That was at the beginning. That too passed. Later, a command came to the Turks not to force Armenians to convert but to kill all Armenians, including those who had converted. Soon we began to walk and walk. We were being 'deported' from our homeland—our homeland. This word 'deported'—it's a joke. They began killing us and marching us to death.

"They were deporting everybody—from Kayseri, Yozgat and all over and sending them to the Arabian deserts. I went with them. I was dressed like a girl, because if you were a 12-or 13-year-old boy they would kill you right away since you were old enough to fight back. You were dangerous. Later on the death march, when they found out I was a boy, they decided not to kill me because they could use me to do some dirty work.

"They wanted to send us to the deserts because they were told that a lot of dead bodies would cause disease, and many Turks might themselves die from disease. So it would be better if the Armenians were killed or died in the deserts.

"While we were being marched, I saw the first real massacre on the road. The Turks were killing Armenians, chopping off their heads, hands and feet. We kept going. I saw lots of things along the way. Many people died from thirst and starvation. . . .

"I will never forget what happened at a place called Bobb, near Aleppo. At that time, Aleppo belonged to Turkey. All of the Armenians were dying, and the Turks told me to pick up the dead bodies of Armenians, the 'dirt.' I was given a one-horse wagon.

"Chris was another Armenian boy about my age. We used to pile up three or four bodies in the wagon and take them to a huge hole in the ground—a dump. We threw 200 or 300 bodies in each dump and covered them up a little bit. The next day we did the same thing. Again and again, day after day. That's what I don't forget. I don't know how I lived through it. Just lucky, I guess.

"But there was much to suffer through yet. It seems I wasn't meant to die. Chris and I ran away. We had nothing to eat, nothing to drink. The desert was hot. Hot.

"One day, Chris sat down and couldn't move anymore. I thought, 'What am I going to do?' By now we had one horse. But the horse was no good. When you sat on the horse, the horse sat down, too. Before, near Der Zor (in the Syrian desert), I had seen some water. I told Chris, 'Don't move. You lay here.' Then I ran, ran, ran. I found water. I begged for bread from a passerby.

"I went back to Chris and told him I found water. 'No,' he said. 'Your're fooling me.' I had a tough time getting him to water, but we made it. Only then could we eat the piece of bread I got when I was begging. You know, when you're real thirsty you can't swallow bread. It won't go down.

"Chris and me. We went through so many things. We saw a lot worse things than burying bodies. But we both made it to America together. He died a few years ago.

"As I think back on my experiences in Turkey, I don't feel that the everyday, ordinary Turkish people wanted to kill us Armenians. They were always stirred up by government propaganda to be very anti-Christian. They were told that if you kill a Christian, you would go to heaven.

"Mind control is the worst thing in the world. It's dangerous, frightening. Even today."

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield briefly?

Mr. LEVIN. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, first I commend my good friend from Michigan on a superlative speech. It is an excellent speech and it does recall, as the Senator points out, the genocide in which the Turks killed 1½ million Armenians. No question about it. Our Ambassador Morgenthau, as the Senator points out, was a witness to much of this.

The New York Times in 1915—I went through a series of references—reported in our most reliable newspaper one atrocity after another and the fact that hundreds and hundreds of thousands of Armenians are being killed.

The Senator so well recalls that Hitler did indeed say in 1938, "Who remembers the Armenians," at the time the final solution was in process and the Jews were being exterminated in Europe, "Who remembers that genocide?"

And as the distinguished Senator points out, Raphael Lemkin was the man who in the thirties began to expose and talk about the Armenian genocide, and he was also the man who coined the word "genocide" and he was also the man, as the Senator points out, who lost all of his family except his brother in the persecution of the Jews in Europe.

Finally, I think the Senator is exactly right in disavowing any terrorist attacks against Turks at the present time. I think both of us deplore any such attacks and would agree that remembering the genocide, remembering the awful violence and the terrible lessons of that time should discourage people from engaging in this kind of violence, exactly the opposite of what the Turks and the State Department now seem to believe.

But I thank the Senator for an excellent address and a memorable one.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, before my friend leaves the Chamber, let me just tell him that someday there will be a pantheon of heroes who finally brought to the Senate floor—that will happen—the Genocide Convention. Lemkin is one and in that pantheon the name "Proxmire" will be high up there.

I know of no Senator who has so unequivocally and I may say relentlessly pursued an objective and a goal as the Senator from Wisconsin relative to bringing the Genocide Treaty to the floor of the Senate.

This is, I think, probably unheard of in the history of the Senate where a Senator almost every day—every day that I have listened—brings to the attention the genocides that have occurred in this world and the need to take action to punish those who perpetrate them and participate in them. And the Senator from Wisconsin is that Senator who has taken unto himself that extraordinary obligation to be sure that in our lifetimes—hopefully in this session of this Congress—we finally will vote on the question of ratification of the Genocide Treaty. Everybody that feels deeply about this issue is very deeply and permanently in his debt.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank my good friend.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I join my colleagues and Armenian-Americans throughout our Nation today to mark the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the Armenian massacre and to honor the memory of the 1½ million men, women, and children who lost their lives between 1915 and 1923.

The anguish suffered by the relatives and descendants of those who perished as well as those who were displaced from their homeland during this terrible episode of history continues undiminished. It is intensified by the longstanding refusal of the Turkish Government to acknowledge that the Armenian genocide ever occurred, in the face of clear and ample documentation to the contrary.

I am again a cosponsor of the resolution designating April 24 as "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man." While the resolution elegizes all victims of genocide, it commemorates in particular those who were victims of the Armenian genocide.

Last year, action on a similar resolution in the Senate was blocked by the Reagan administration. To the survivors and to the relatives of the victims of this genocide, a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man is little enough to ask of the American people. That the Reagan administration felt compelled to withhold its support from this resolution—and indeed continues to do so—is an example of incredible insensitivity.

I strongly urge my colleagues in this body to support this resolution and to press for its prompt passage.

Earlier this month, I joined some of my colleagues in sending a letter to the Prime Minister of Turkey urging the Turkish Government to reassess its position on the Armenian genocide. I ask unanimous consent that our letter be printed in the RECORD, together with an excellent Boston Globe editorial on this matter which I commend to my colleagues.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 1, 1985.

HIS EXCELLENCY TURGUT OZAL,
Prime Minister of the Turkish Republic, Embassy of Turkey, 1606 23rd St., NW, Washington, DC.

DEAR PRIME MINISTER OZAL: We note with considerable concern that your government continues the policy of urging that the United States refrain from any recognition or remembrance of the Armenian Genocide. We sincerely regret that you continue to misinterpret the clear intent of Congress in commemorating the Armenian Genocide and that you have failed to acknowledge the consistent record of the United States in recognition of this historical fact.

There is ample, reliable, and unbiased documentary evidence from the archives of Ottoman Turkey's friends and foes alike detailing the attempted annihilation and displacement of the Armenian people. The same archival material conclusively identified the central role of the Young Turk government in the planning and execution of what U.S. Ambassador Morgenthau referred to as "a campaign of race extermination".

The Armenian Genocide is a historical fact. To deny that fact is to deny also the unprecedented assistance extended by the United States in an attempt to end the carnage and to aid those who survived. Recalling these facts does not, under any reasonable interpretation, imply disregard for Turkish lives lost today. We deplore, as you do, acts of terrorism against Turkish officials and condemn the use of violence in international affairs.

However, our mutual abhorrence of terrorism and our common security interests cannot be invoked by your government to justify denial of American and Armenian history. The unambiguous record of the Armenian Genocide and contemporary reaffirmations by President Reagan, former President Carter, the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, are realities based on an objective review of the subject.

We urge your government to reassess its position on the Armenian Genocide. The first step in this process must be an acceptance by your government that the United States has recognized and will ultimately reaffirm its historic position on this matter.

Sincerely,

TONY COELHO.
CARL LEVIN.

ARMENIA, HISTORY AND GUILT

President Reagan shocked many Americans with his explanation of why he thought he should not visit Dachau during his trip to Germany in May. The President said the German people have "a guilt feeling that's been imposed upon them, and I just think it's unnecessary." He intimated that Americans are wrong to expect German guilt for the Holocaust: that the Germans themselves feel no guilt; or that there was never anything for anyone to be guilty of.

The President displayed a similar confusion about history and morality earlier this month, before the visit of Turkey's prime minister. The White House released the text of a statement Reagan made to a Turkish interviewer in which he dissociated his Administration from a unanimous congressional resolution commemorating April 24th, the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, as a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man.

The Turkish slaughter of 1,500,000 Armenians from 1915 to 1918 was a ghastly crime against humanity, the great precedent for 20th-century genocide. "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?" was the rhetorical question Hitler posed to his top commanders on Aug. 22, 1939, as they prepared for the invasion of Poland.

This week, in response to public dismay, Reagan changed his mind and decided to make a symbolic visit to a concentration camp site. Generosity requires that Americans assume their President merely became confused and misspoke when he made his strange remarks about the imposition of guilt.

In his remarks to the Turkish interviewer, Reagan said: "I sympathize with all those who suffered during the tragic events of 1915. I also profoundly regret that Turks and Armenians have so far not been able to resolve their differences." This was a way of saying he would not contradict Turkey's official denial that the Armenian genocide even took place. He then said that he opposed the congressional resolution because it "might inadvertently encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turkish-Americans" and because it "could harm relations with an important ally."

The world can only deplore the insane acts of a few Armenian terrorists. They harm the just cause of the Armenian people. Nevertheless, Reagan violates logic when he pretends that the existence of Armenian terrorists constitutes a reason for rejecting the resolution.

Testifying against the resolution in February, Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger asserted that "such resolutions are counterproductive in that they serve to encourage Armenian terrorists." Like the President, Weinberger revealed his true motive when he said, "This resolution would embarrass the United States and strain relations with this critical ally (Turkey)."

For reasons of State, Weinberger and Reagan have distorted history and offended the victims of genocide. The American people owe an apology to Armenians for the callousness of American officials.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues in remembering the Armenian genocide on this the 70th anniversary of the first, but sadly not the last, genocide of the 20th century. Some have asked why do we bother to remember a long ago event in a faraway land. I believe it is imperative that we remember, partly to pay tribute to the memory of the victims, but more importantly to rededicate ourselves to insuring that such instances of man's inhumanity to men are not repeated. To date, we have not been successful in eradicating the scourge of genocide from our planet. The Armenian genocide was followed by the horrors of the Holocaust and the massacre of Cambodians. But because our century has seen such horrors is, in my mind, not an argument for trying to forget, it impels us to remember. For if you truly contemplate the unthinkable, the systematic annihilation of well over 1 million people, you cannot help but be moved to vow never again. And if the Armenian genocide is to be more than a tragic fact of history, its horrors must remain ever before us so that our vigilance and resolve do not falter.

I salute those of Armenian descent who have worked hard to ensure that the genocide of their people does not fade into historical irrelevance but remains a shocking lesson and horrendous example of the inhumanity of man to man. And I make common cause with them in remembering today the victims of the Armenian genocide and in pledging our every effort to ensure that such a tragedy is never again visited upon any people anywhere on this Earth.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, today I join my colleagues on Armenian Martyrs' Day in commemorating the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the genocide in the Ottoman Empire. It is a day of remembrance for victims of all genocides, but especially for the nearly 1.5 million Armenians who were mercilessly persecuted for 8 long years between 1915 and 1923.

The senseless persecution and slaughter of Armenians during the outbreak of World War I, resulted in the banishment of thousands more Armenians, scattered into a diaspora, forming a worldwide community who, today, urge all people of good faith and conscience never to forget this tragedy. We must never lend credibility to the all too frequently lamented remark that the Armenian genocide is the "forgotten genocide." Because of the war and the isolationist attitude of the United States, at that time, our Government did not, unfortunately, more forcefully protest the actions of the Ottoman Empire. Sadly, the Armenian genocide was not the last but the first of many—too many—acts of genocide which have been perpetrated in this century. Six million Jews under Hitler, untold numbers of Soviet citizens in the Gulag under Stalin, and countless Cambodians under Pol Pot were also victims of the atrocity of genocide. To remember these victims is to make a statement. It is to say, I will not shut my eyes to the pleas of my brethren, for to stand by is to be an accomplice to a crime as serious as the act of genocide itself. To remember these victims is, most importantly, to move toward a better future, a safer future, for our children and the generations to come.

While I look forward to the future, I am concerned. I am concerned that President Reagan's upcoming trip to Germany, which includes a visit to the Bitburg Cemetery where so many Nazi-SS men are buried, overlooks the fact that when the lesson of history's mistakes is not learned well, history becomes reality once again. President Reagan's visit to Bitburg negates a statement which he himself made in a proclamation for the Days of Remembrance for Victims of the Holocaust on April 22, 1981. He said: "Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other people—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten." Let us not forget and let us not lay a wreath on the graves of those who committed the heinous crime of genocide against innocent people.

It is also a great disappointment to me that the Reagan administration cannot support a resolution, indeed an active lobby against a resolution, which recognizes and condemns man's inhumanity to man. To say that this would harm relations with an ally does not recognize the extent of the atrocity that we gather here today to remember.

The purpose of Armenians Martyrs' Day is just that—to never allow the atrocity of genocide to be forgotten. And so, on this day, I honor those innocent dead. I extend my sincerest sympathy to those Armenians who were victims of ruthless murder, and to their descendants and the descendants of all people who have fallen to genocide. And I pledge that we never will forget.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, April 1985 may someday be recorded as the month in which the current administration established an all-time record for callous insensitivity.

April 1985 is the cruel month in which the President of the United States equated the murdered innocents of the Holocaust with the brutal executioners of the Waffen SS.

And it is also the month in which the President opposed a congressional resolution commemorating the terrible massacre in the early years of this century of 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children at the hands of the Ottomon Turks.

Why is the President opposed to this resolution?

Because, he says, passage of the resolution "might inadvertently encourage or reward terrorist attacks on Turks and Turkish Americans."

And also, says the President, the resolution "could harm relations with an important ally."

That is an outrageous statement.

Yes, there have been terrorist attacks by Armenian extremists against Turkish individuals and installations.

These attacks are insane—they are criminal—and they ill-serve the Armenian cause.

I condemn without equivocation the perpetrators of those atrocities—and so do the leading Armenian-American civic and religious organizations.

But to say that because of these terrorists, we should ignore the historical reality of the Armenian genocide—that is totally unacceptable.

We have in Northern Ireland today groups that are addicted to the politics of the gun and the bomb.

Does that mean that we should ignore or deny the tragic history of Ireland?

Of course it does not.

And it is a disservice to the American people and, in fact, to our Turkish friends to go along for political reasons with the sadly misguided efforts of the Turkish Government to deny a monumental atrocity—but one for which the Turks of today cannot be held accountable.

The President describes Turkey as "an important ally."

But, Mr. President, the Federal Republic of Germany is also an important ally.

And just as we cannot for political reasons deny that today's democratic Federal Republic was built on the ashes of the Third Reich, we cannot diminish, deny or demean the agony, suffering, and death inflicted by Ottoman Turkey upon the Armenian people.

I am very much ashamed, Mr. President, that the leaders of our Government have once again paid more attention to politics and to lobbyists than to the cause of justice and truth. And I hope that the Senate will demonstrate by passing this commemorative resolution that we, at least, respect the memory of the martyrs of Armenia.

COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, today we pay tribute to all the victims of genocide, particularly the 1.5 million Armenians who suffered at the hands of the Turkish authorities. As part of that tribute, today has been designated as a "National Day of Man's Inhumanity to Man." The leadership of my colleague from Michigan, Senator LEVIN and his staff member, Steve Serkaian, in focusing the Senate's attention on this important issue year after year is commendable. For only through commemoration of these victims can we educate the American people about the Armenian experience and prevent history from repeating itself.

This year is particularly significant because it marks the 70th anniversary of the beginning of the genocide perpetrated in the Turkish Ottoman empire between 1915 and 1923. As many of the survivors of the genocide travel to Washington on this day, we join with them in honoring the memory of those who perished.

The genocide began on April 24, 1915, when hundreds of Armenian religious, political and intellectual leaders were rounded up, exiled and eventually murdered in remote places in Anatolia. Within several months, the approximately 250,000 Armenians serving in the Ottoman Army during World War I were disarmed and placed in forced labor battalions where they were either starved or executed. The Armenian people, deprived of their leadership and young able-bodied men, were disarmed under threat of severe punishment, and then deported from every city, town, and village of Asia minor and Turkish minor. The majortiy of the deportees died on the marches from starvation, disease, and massacre. Approximately 500,000 refugees escaped to the north across the Russian border, south into Arab countries, or to Europe and the United States. Thus, the Armenian community of the Ottoman empire was virtually eliminated as the result of a carefully executed plan of genocide.

As we recall this brutal massacre of 1.5 million men, women and children, we are reminded that this first genocide of the 10th century became the precedent of the Holocaust of World War II. In observing this national day of man's inhumanity to man, we seek to insure that this massacre will not be forgotten.

Despite the overwhelming evidence documenting the awful events of 1915 through 1923, the Turkish Government continues to deny or distort the truth. This toleration of genocide and its acceptance as a solution leads only to its repeated use, just as the aftermath of the Armenian genocide led Hitler to cite it as a precedent and justification for his own crimes.

The use of genocide as an instrument of national policy, by any nation at any time, is a crime against all humanity, and it must be universally condemned. There can be no statute of limitations on the crime of genocide.

Ratification of the genocide convention would be a positive step for the Senate to take in reaffirming its commitment to guard against the recurrence of genocide. The convention seeks to outlaw genocide and guarantee the rights of survival for all ethnic, racial, religious, and national groups. To date, 96 other nations have ratified the measue. Ratification now is essential in order to ensure that the United States maintains its position as a leader in defending the basic human rights of all the world's people.

Finally, the genocide of the Armenians has very real and immediate implications that involve the United States and require serious consideration. This country has an obligation to maintain pressure on our Turkish ally to acknowledge the reality of the Armenian genocide and deal with it constructively. We have been waiting too long for an end to the campaign of denial, distortion, and harassment which continues to be directed at Armenian communities around the world.

To honor all victims of genocide and to protect future generations from sharing their awful fate, all the world must speak with one voice in condemning that crime and preserving the truth of these tragedies, so that future generations may know of the dangers and be watchful.

70TH ANNIVERSARY OF ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, let me note in much the same fashion that April 24 marks the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide when an estimated 1.5 million Armenian people perished as victims of another unfathomable holocaust. I rise today to support a resolution which places the United States on record so that this tragedy will continue to live in the memories and writings of mankind. If we learn nothing else from the 20th century, from this holocaust, from the one that followed it, it must be that never again can decent people simply ignore the kind of oppression, the kind of genocide, that we have seen at least twice in this century.

Let us be instructed and admonished by the Polish writer Yashinsky who survived a Nazi concentration camp only to die in a Russian gulag. He said:

> Fear not your enemies for they can only kill you. Fear not your friends for they can only betray you. Fear the indifferent who permit the slayers and betrayers to walk safely on Earth.

Mr. President, that is not a cynical comment. It is a sentiment that came from the tragic experience that has been shared by all too many innocent victims, victims not only of the manifest cruelty which they suffered, but victims of the indifference of good people who simply lack the awareness or lack the courage to intervene at a time when they might have made a difference.

In the proper act of remembering the injustice of the past, we must be sensitive to the concerns of today.

Mr. President, in no way does the raising of a historical truth undermine the solid relationship that the United States enjoys with our present Turkish allies any more than we remember the inhumanity of the Nazi generation in any way undermines the value that we place upon the character and courage of present day West Germany.

Indeed, we celebrate and value our West German allies. They are essential to our alliance.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe and cannot believe that the Government of Turkey, which has made giant strides in recent years toward the kind of democracy and justice that we would hope for all people, because of a simple, straightforward resolution, will fail to continue in that progress or fail in their adherence to the principles which make of them staunch allies in our NATO alliance.

Mr. President, Turkey and the United States today are solid friends who can withstand the judgments of history.

There is not a people whose history does not bear some blemish. There is not a people whose history does not hold forth some episode that makes them not proud but sorrowful. It is in no one's interest that the story of the Armenian tragedy be buried and forgotten. It should and must be told—not to stir up division—but to encourage reconciliation. Not just to recall the suffering of the past, but to strengthen the commitment to standards for today of decency and humanity.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I join with my colleagues in solemnly commemorating one of the dark moments in history, the senseless slaughter of 1.5 million Armenians from 1915 to 1918. We stand here today to commemorate the 70th anniversary of this heinous crime against humanity, and we look back in the hope that our collective conscience will not let this grave episode in history repeat itself.

We all deplore genocide and condemn those who have perpetuated this act, whenever and against whomever it has been committed. We must stand firmly against those who have practiced this systematic policy to destroy their fellow man, be it because of race, creed, or some other distinguishing characteristic.

Today we recall the tragedy which befell the Armenians early in this century. History has shown, Mr. President, that some have a very short memory. Just two decades later, in 1939, Adolph Hitler rhetorically asked his top commanders, "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians"? Well, today we cannot forget what happened to the Armenians, just as we do not—indeed, we cannot—forget what happened to 6 million Jews 40 years ago. Those that forget the past are condemned to repeat it.

Countless times in the past, this Nation, assuming its role as the guardian of liberty, has demonstrated its indignation against such acts of injustice. We must continue to condemn and deplore barbaric acts in the future. The moral integrity of our great Nation must never be compromised, and we must lead the world community in expressing our outrage at the inhumane and deplorable act of genocide.

We solemnly commemorate this 70th anniversary. We remember those who have perished so that the world will never forget. We show our resolve to prevent tragedies such as that which befell the Armenians from ever happening again.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, Adolf Hitler's most notorious pronouncement was "Who, today, remembers the Armenians?"

Hitler asked that rhetorical question when he was planning the central crime of our century, the liquidation of Europe's Jews.

Only the combined might of the Western Allies and the Soviet Union was able to put an end to the nightmare of the Holocaust and not before 6 million defenseless men, woman, and children had been slaughtered and centuries-old Jewish communities had been obliterated from the face of the Earth.

From the experience of the Holocaust arose the determination among the survivors, their children, and their liberators never to permit the knowledge of this crime to be forgotten by the nations and people of the Earth.

It was a determination to put to the lie Hitler's easy assumption that in time, even the most horrendous crimes are forgotten, their outrages softened by distance, their victims silenced forever.

It is therefore a source of deep regret to me that our Nation's President, who represents the collective spirit of all our people, should have so misread the purposes and sufferings of the Second World War as to be able to say, as he recently did, that both Jews and SS stormtroopers were, in a sense, victims of the Nazis.

The survivors of the camps are more than simply victims along with wounded soldiers and displaced persons and bombed out civilians. The survivors are our witnesses to the depths of evil of which human beings are capable.

The camps stand as a grim reminder that, no matter what the reason or the provocation, we must not be seduced into believing that we are forever immune to that evil.

The camps and those slaughtered in them were not murdered by uniquely evil people. If they had been, this occasion would not be necessary. But the camps were administered, the poison gas was sold, and the furnaces were built by ordinary people. It is that distressing fact—the knowledge that in certain circumstances otherwise normal periods are capable of the most horrible crimes—that makes remembrance of the Holocaust so imperative.

It is right and just to commemorate and celebrate the 40 years of German democracy since 1945. It is right and just to strengthen our alliance and our friendship.

But German democracy can be honored and our friendship can be strengthened without denigrating the meaning of the Holocaust or its central role in the history of our times.

This observance of the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the camps comes as the survivors are meeting in Philadelphia. Today, these American men and women relive in their own minds the horrors through which they passed. A man describes how he is haunted by the vision of his son's face with blood streaming from an SS bullet hole. A woman describes seeing a stormtrooper kick another to death.

These memories and the horror of which they are representative remain the fabric of life for 200,000 survivors worldwide. It is vital that we others preserve the memory of their agony so that when no survivors remain, the terrible warning that is the Holocaust will not be forgotten.

Only through such a living memory can the civilized world ensure that, in truth, such a thing can never again happen.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleagues in commemorating the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide. We must never forget the 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children who perished in the early part of this century. Today we honor these courageous people who were exterminated in the same century as the Holocaust. The Holocaust is a reminder to the fact that those who have forgotten history are condemned to repeat it. Both the Armenian genocide and the Holocaust show us the insensitivity and cruelty man is capable of. We can never forget the horrible treatment experienced by the Armenians and the Jews. We must keep remembering so that history does not continue to repeat itself. Only when we recognize the past violations of innocent people's rights can we understand the need for treating others as individuals whose hopes and desires are as worthwhile as our own. We cannot erase the past horrors that remain with Armenians wherever they might be. It is a travesty that such genocide continues in this world. We must rededicate ourselves, as individuals and as a country, to learn from these hard lessons and do what we can so that it will never happen again in this world.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to add my name as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 101, which designates April 24, 1985, the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, as "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man."

Today we recall with deep sorrow the Armenians who were victims of the first genocide of the 20th century. Between 1915 and 1923, over 1½ million Armenians perished from starvation and butchery at the hands of the Ottoman Turks. For the last 14 years, Congress has set aside a special day to commemorate and reflect upon this ghastly crime against humanity. Our remembrance and acknowledgement of the Armenian genocide is particularly fitting this year, since 1985 not only marks the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide, but the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps which ended the tragic genocide of the Jews.

We must be ever vigilant against those who would deny the truth or downgrade the horror of the Armenian genocide. It is our responsibility, year after year, to help keep its memory alive and vivid for future generations. This resolution affirms that the lessons of the past will not be forgotten, and that we will never waver in our determination to fight against persecution and inhumanity in the world today.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, today we mark the 70th anniversary of the Armenian genocide as a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man. This day has profound significance: We commemorate the Armenian genocide in part to pay tribute to its survivors and to the memory of its victims, and in part to reinforce our own determination to insure such acts of inhumanity will not be repeated. This year especially it has great meaning for all of us. One must not forget one of this century's most appalling human tragedies.

In the wake of that tragedy, many of the survivors settled in this Nation and America has been greatly enriched by the contributions of the Armenian-American citizens. Armenian principles of devotion to family, religion, and hard work are reflected in every aspect of American life. The diversity of achievement is remarkable: George Deukmejian, the Governor of California, Vartan Gregorian, distinguished president of the New York Public Library, and the late William Saroyan, an author who brought to life for millions of Americans the reality of his Armenian heritage. These achievements express the high character, courage, and perseverance of the Armenian people. Armenian-American Marylanders in the Baltimore and Washington metropolitan areas and throughout Maryland daily make valuable contributions to the vitality of our State.

All of us as citizens of a nation founded on the ideals of human dignity and freedom, have a solemn responsibility to uphold the principles on which this Nation was founded and which, in a very real sense, order our daily lives. As self-respecting human beings we can never remain indifferent or impassive in the face of an assault like the Ottoman assault of 1915. The Boston Globe made this point recently in an editorial recalling the events of 1915–18:

> The Turkish slaughter of 1,500,000 Armenians from 1915 to 1918 was a ghastly crime against humanity, the great precedent for 20th-century genocide. "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?" was the rhetorical question Hitler posed to his top commanders on August 22, 1939, as they prepared for the invasion of Poland.

This day has meaning everywhere for Armenians, a people who have lived with tragedy, and are committed to the proposition that the world will comprehend, as they do, and it cannot be stated too often that the Armenian tragedy does indeed have meaning for all of us. Remembrance and understanding are universal imperatives, essential to decent people and decent societies everywhere; they are not the special province of the victims of the genocide who lived to talk and write about it.

It is now 70 years since the Armenian tragedy. In one sense, of course, the past is behind us; but in certain fundamental ways it is not, nor should it be. To ignore or forget the past is to remain its prisoner. Only remembrance and understanding offer us the means of coming to grips with its legacy. Mr. President, I ask that the views of my colleague, Senator PELL, and those of my own, as printed in the Foreign Relations Committee report on Senate Resolution 241, a resolution to express the sense of the Senate that the foreign policy of the United States should take account of the genocide of the Armenian people, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF SENATORS PELL AND SARBANES

As cosponsors of Senate Resolution 241 and as Members working vigorously to bring about the long-overdue ratification of the Genocide Convention by the United States, we believe that the record should show clearly that the United States recognized the campaign against the Armenian people as "genocide" not only in recent years but also at the time that it took place. For example, in June 1915, the U.S. Consul in Aleppo, Syria—one of the stopping points along the deportation routes—reported that it was "without a doubt a carefully planned scheme to thoroughly extinguish the Armenian race." The following month, Henry Morganthau, the American Ambassador in Constantinople, sent a cable to the Secretary of State which stated in part:

"Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and, from harrowing reports of eye witnesses, it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisals against rebellion."

In April 1920, Major General John G. Harboard, head of the American Military Mission to Armenia, reported to the Senate that the deportations and massacres in 1915 were organized "under definite system, the soldiers going from town to town"; characterized them as a "wholesale attempt on the race * * *"; and, stated that "the massacres have always been ordered from Constantinople."

In introducing Senate Resolution 241, Senator Levin mentioned recent "inconsistencies" in the position taken by the United States on the Armenian genocide. Senator Levin was referring to a "note" which was appended to an article in the August 1982 Department of State Bulletin. This note read, in part: "Because the historical record of the 1915 events in Asia Minor is ambiguous, the Department of State does not endorse allegations that the Turkish Government committed a genocide against the Armenian people." In view of the historical record as cited above, we and many other Members of Congress were deeply concerned about this "note."

The Department of State issued a clarification of U.S. policy in the May 1983 issue of the Bulletin: "The article * * * which appeared in the August 1982 issue of the Bulletin, and its accompanying note and footnotes were not intended as statements of policy of the United States, nor did they represent any change in U.S policy." On April 24, 1984, the 69th anniversary of Armenian Martyrs Day, Senator Levin noted that the historical record "documents the crime perpetrated against the Armenian nation and people by the Turkish Ottoman Government as the first genocide of the 20th century" and stated that the State Department's clarification "should not have been necessary to make in the first place." We wholeheartedly share this view.

REMEMBERING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 101, I would like to say a few words in honor of the memory of the 1.5 million Armenians who perished in the tragic events taking place between 1915 and 1923.

This day—April 24, 1985—represents a terrible confluence in the history of man's inhumanity to man. As if to remind us of the inexorable link between two of the greatest tragedies this century has witnessed, history has juxtaposed them: at the same time as we pause to reflect on the horror of the Nazi Holocaust, we also pay homage to the victims and survivors of the Armenian genocide—the century's first, but sadly not its last.

Testimony to this link is found in the words of Hitler himself. In a 1938 speech exhorting his SS commanders to carry out the terrible course he had set, he asked the rhetorical question: "After all, gentlemen, who today speaks of the annihilation of the Armenians?"

Today in my home State, survivors of the massacres will visit the Armenian Martyr's Memorial at the north burial ground in Providence to grieve for those who lost their lives. I ask unanimous consent that an account from the Providence Journal of one of this week's memorial ceremonies be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER without objection, it is so ordered. (See exhibit 1.)

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, in the face of such monumental tragedies, remembrance is a duty we must bear, for we can do nothing more. To fail to do so would be to shirk the elemental responsibility we have to future generations. Let us therefore pause, reflect and remember, lest we once again prove the unalterable truth of George Santayana's dire warning: those who do not remember the past are condemned to repeat it.

SURVIVORS REMEMBER ARMENIAN MASSACRE

(By Karen Lee Ziner)

PROVIDENCE—In 1915, the Kurdish soldiers led everyone away from the village and killed them—her grandparents, parents, sisters and brothers, aunts and uncles.

For Sarah Leylegian, the memories of those atrocities have not paled after 70 years.

"Some they took in the church and poured gasoline on them and burned them alive. Some they killed with guns, and some by big knives—they thought the bullets were to good to use on them says Leylegian, 78, of Providence.

Yesterday, hundreds gathered at the site of the Armenian Martyrs' Memorial at the North Burial Ground in Providence to mark the 70th anniversary of the massacre of 1.5-million Armenians by the Turkish government.

That massacre occurred at a time when the Turks, regarding the Armenians as a dangerous foreign element and a threat, decided to deport the whole Armenian population, which had lived as a nation under Turkish rule for 600 years. Many either died or were killed en route.

One speaker yesterday, Ramon Zorabedian of the Armenian Martyrs' Memorial Committee, demanded Turkish responsibility for the Armenian genocide.

"It's high time our government showed its power. We should tell the Turks what to do, rather than have our genocide denied," he said.

"We demand from our officials in Washington to bring our problem to the forefront. We want our day in court," said Zorabedian.

Mayor Joseph R. Paolino Jr. read a proclamation marking yesterday in memory of the 1.5 million "murdered by the Turkish Ottoman empire."

Recognizing the 10,000 Armenians in Rhode Island, he told those gathered. "You are part of the fabric of our community. We remember the torture, the massacres . . . and condemn the atrocities committed 70 years ago."

The Rev. Jean Zarifian, pastor of the Armenian Euphrates Evangelical Church in Providence, spoke of the indomitable spirit that has kept survivors going.

"Seventy years has not dimmed the intensity of our bitterness or the depth of our grief," said Zarifian.

But while April is "a month of passion" and the month marking Armenian genocide, "it is also the month of Easter and resurrection," he said.

"Seven decades ago, our people were also rejected, scorned, tortured, crucified. But like the legendary Phoenix, we soared from the ashes. . . . Those who nailed us to the cross could not kill us," he said.

Before yesterdays ceremony, Leylegian stood quietly in the dry grass behind the Martyrs' Memorial and spoke of the massacre that decimated her entire family.

"We were seven children under one roof. Out of seven children, I am the only one alive. They were all killed . . . and I was left all by myself on the street."

She was eight years old then. After that, she spent several years in an orphanage in Turkey, until the Turkish government "ordered all Armenians out of the country."

From there she went to Lebanon and lived in another orphanage until "a distant relative in the United States sponsored me" to come here.

"The more we talk about it, the more it hurts. To you, it seems like a story. To me, I know what it is," she said.

Another survivor, John Bargamian, 79, wept yesterday as he told his story in broken English.

"In Turkey, they had an order, to kill all the males (Armenians). There was two Turks in our village. One was like a wolf, the other was like an angel. They were two brothers," he said.

"One killed over two hundred and fifty. he tied them and he'd cut them piece by piece."

But the good brother saved his life, Bargamian said, "by hiding me and my brother under the bed of his sick son."

They escaped with their mother and eventually were reunited with their father in the United States.

"My mother was a servant over there. She had to learn to pray in Turkish, so when the soldiers came she could pray and they'd thinks she was Turkish."

"She had to have it exactly right, or else they'd kill you," he said.

70TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President I rise today to join Senator LEVIN and my other colleagues in commemorating the 70th anniversary of one of the most tragic events in mankind's history, the slaughter of 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children at the hands of the Ottoman Turkish Government.

The facts of this genocide, this World War I holocaust, are clear. All during the war, the Ottoman Turkish Government systematically sought by persecution, exile, and massacre, to eliminate the Armenian population from its traditional homeland within the Ottoman Empire. And they succeeded all too well, reducing the Armenian population from some 2.5 million at the beginning of World War I to fewer than 100,000 by 1923.

In August 1914 general mobilization of the Ottoman Turkish army was declared. All able-bodied Armenian men with few exceptions, were called up for military service. Beginning in February 1915, the Armenians in the armed forces were segregated into labor battalions, disarmed, and ultimately worked to death or massacred. Also in August 1914 the government controlled by the Young Turk Party began to release murders and other confirmed criminals from prison throughout Asia Minor and placed them in the Special Organization for the express purpose of ending the "Armenian Question" by annihilating the Armenians. Whole Armenian villages were massacred outright in the fall and winter of 1914 in the eastern provinces of the empire. And on this date, April 24, 70 years ago, about 200 Armenian religious, political, and intellectual leaders were arrested in Constantinople and exiled or taken to the interior and murdered. Following the promulgation of Edict of Deportation on May 24, 1915, the slaughter continued until the Armenian genocide within the Ottoman Empire was virtually complete.

As Henry Morgenthau, our Ambassador to Turkey at the time, who led the diplomatic effort to try to stem the bloodshed, stated in 1918: "I am confident that the whole history of the human race contains no such horrible episode as this. The great massacres and persecutions of the past seem almost insignificant when compared to the suffering of the Armenian race in 1915."

It is inexplicable to me why the current Turkish Government would choose to deny the historical facts, so well documented by the press and by our own diplomatic personnel at the time. Indeed, the founder of the modern Turkish state, Kemal Ataturk, recognized the crimes committed by his predecessor regime in an interview published in the August 1, 1926, issue of the Los Angeles Examiner. In that interview he stated that the Young Turk Party "should have been made to account for the lives of millions of our Christian subjects who were ruthlessly driven en masse from their homes and massacred." Kemal was right to acknowledge the genocide and to call for punishment of the perpetrators.

Punishment is no longer an issue today for those who carried out these crimes surely now are almost all dead. And no one condones the actions of current-day Armenian terrorists who assassinate Turkish diplomats and Turkish citizens. Two wrongs do not make a right. And these modern day terrorists dishonor their ancestors' cause.

But acknowledgment of these atrocities is unfortunately an issue, for the current Turkish Government is not willing to follow the lead of Kemal Ataturk. And our own Government, apparently at the urging of diplomats without the courage of Ambassador Morgenthau, increasingly goes along with the Turks, lest we offend our erstwhile ally.

We do no one any good to deny the past. Instead, we must learn from it. We must try to ensure that genocides such as befell the Armenians 70 years ago and the Jews 40 to 50 years ago and which Khmer Rouge under Pol Pot visited on their own people in Cambodia less than 10 years ago never happen again. It would be far better for the Turkish Government to follow Chancellor Kohl's lead in visiting the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp a week ago, recalling the crimes committed under the Nazis, and saying such events must never happen again.

I hope that we will see such statesmanship from the Turkish Government some day. And I trust that soon our own Government will see the light and stop being more concerned about current Turkish sensitivities than they are about stating the truth about the Armenian genocide. "Who still talks nowadays of the extermination of the Armenians?" was the rhetorical question Hitler posed to his top commanders on August 22, 1939, as they prepared for the invasion of Poland and the slaughter of millions of Slavs and Jews. Our Government needs to be talking about it today to deter future Hitlers. And I am glad that the Senate is addressing the issue today. I commend Senator LEVIN for organizing this colloquy, this reminder of man's potential for inhumanity to his fellow man.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today marks the 70th anniversary of the genocide perpetrated against the Armenian people by the Ottoman Empire during World War I. I am pleased to join Armenians throughout the world in paying tribute to the victims and survivors of this evil crime.

Before World War I, Armenians, a gentle and highly cultured people, demanded only tolerance and freedom from the rulers of the Ottoman Empire. In response, Ottoman rulers launched a coordinated drive to round up and eliminate every Armenian man, woman, and child. In 1915 the Empire began deporting Armenians and from that time until the Empire collapsed, an estimated 1.5 million Armenians—some 60 percent of the Armenian population—were killed or died of disease or exposure. Today, we honor those courageous individuals who were exterminated for no other reason than that their national heritage was considered alien by those who ruled the Ottoman Empire.

The modern state of Turkey bears no responsibility for the tragic acts committed by the Ottoman Empire against the Armenian people. It should, however, acknowledge that these events took place. Kemal Ataturk did so many years ago when he condemned the massacres of millions by his Ottoman predecessors. The present government should do no less.

The Armenian genocide reminds us that man possesses the pernicious quality of bigotry and the capacity to be cruel. We must never forget the despicable, inhuman treatment suffered by the Armenians at the hands of their fellow men.

In recalling the Armenian genocide, we should make it absolutely clear that we are not condoning violent acts of vengeance against Turkish nationals. The way to commemorate the suffering of the Armenian people is not through terrorism but rather by keeping the memory of the Armenian genocide alive and by reaffirming our commitment to human life and dignity.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR SPECTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER] is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes. However, the Chair will advise the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Chair recognizes that he has control of the floor for 1 hour.

THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE HOLOCAUST

Mr. SPECTER. As noted by the distinguished Presiding Officer, 1 hour has been set aside at this time for proceedings in the Senate in remembrance of the 40th anniversary of the Holocaust. It is entirely fitting that this occasion be noted in this body because of the national and international remembrance which is being noted in this 10-day period with ceremonies here in the Capitol, as witness last week's very moving ceremony in the rotunda; the ceremony at Independence Hall in Philadelphia this past Sunday; a week before that, a distinguished group of artists assembled in the Lincoln Center in New York City, all to note the 40th anniversary of the Holocaust.

We have focused on the concentration camps, the locations of Auschwitz, Treblinka, Dachau, and Bergen-Belsen, as sites of the greatest atrocities which have been recorded in the history of mankind.

Considering the atrocities which have been recorded over the past 5,000 years, that is an extraordinary digest of the barbarous conduct and activities of the Nazis during World War II.

From those activities has arisen a worldwide denunciation of genocide as Adolph Hitler sought to eradicate the Jewish people with a plan calculated in advance, written in advance, openly discussed and advocated, and then, with a vicious, violent, concerted effort to carry out the extermination of the Jewish people.

Some 6 million Jews perished in the Holocaust in the most despicable act in human history. We focus on it 40 years later, as we have focused on it every year in the interim, not only to denounce that conduct but to remind the world of the atrocities of the Holocaust with a view that that conduct may never again be repeated.

It is very important to do so because of the repeated evidence that people already tend to forget. It is not only the inhumanity against the Jewish people which is the focus of the Holocaust, although that was certainly violent, but it is the avoidance of a repetition of that conduct against any people that must be the fervent objective of civilized society.

One issue which has been the focus of attention during the course of the past several months has been the intensified effort to find Joseph Mengele, the so-called Angel of Death who inflicted such barbarous and cruel treatment on so many Jewish children and so many Jewish men and women.

The occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Holocaust has started a renewed effort to find Mengele, to extradite Mengele, to prosecute Mengele, and to punish Mengele, and, depending upon the tribunal, the exercise of discretion with the death penalty would certainly be appropriate for his murderous conduct again and again and again during World War II.

My distinguished colleague, Senator D'AMATO, took the lead on this issue in initiating litigation to compel the disclosure of certain documents under the Freedom of Information Act. A series of hearings have been held by the Juvenile Justice Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, because as a starting point Mengele used children, twin Jewish children.

During the course of our inquiry, we found evidence that the U.S. Army had Mengele in its custody early on but did not act on prosecuting Mengele.

Evidence has been disclosed that the CIA had information about Mengele, his international travels, and his activities in Paraguay as recently as 1979.

To the credit of the U.S. Government, there has been an intensified effort to apprehend Mengele. The Attorney General of the United States initiated a full-scale investigation early this year following efforts of the hearings by the Juvenile Justice Subcommittee pointing out certain omissions by the Department of the Army, the Secretary of the Army promptly launched a full-scale investigation.

In hearings before the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee at the urging of Senator D'AMATO and myself, Secretary of State Shultz pledged full cooperation by the Department of State in efforts to track down Mengele.

The observance of the 40th anniversary of the liberation of Europe his prompted a visit by President Reagan to Germany. This trip has become highly controversial in light of the President's announced intention to visit the Berger-Belsen concentration camp and the Bitburg Cemetery.

It is my hope, as we speak today in this Chamber, that the plan to visit Bitburg will yet be revised. I believe there is a very pressing reason to do so. The fact that SS troopers are buried in Bitburg is very distasteful and repugnant to veterans of World War II, to the Jews who have survived the Holocaust, and to the memories of those who perished in World War II: U.S. fighting men; fighting men from Allied forces; and all of those who perished in the concentration camps—Jews, Gypsies, many others of different national origin.

It is a mistaken notion that there is any reconciliation for those atrocities as evidenced by a visit by our President to a cemetery like Bitburg.

A number of us have had discussions with representatives of the White House. I had a discussion with the President last Thursday at the conclusion of a meeting on another subject. The President obviously is perceived in good faith on his efforts at reconciliation. But as outlined yesterday in meetings with Senators and representatives of the administration, the President proceeded on a plan to visit the Bitburg Cemetery on the representation that SS troopers were not buried at Bitburg. Once it was determined that those representations were false, as we now know, it seems to me that the President is fully justified and warranted in changing those plans and altering the arrangements which have been made with Chancellor Kohl and the West German Government.

Under traditional principles of contract, any contract based on misrepresentation or material errors of fact may be nullified. This certainly should be the course to be followed on the proposed visit to Bitburg.

Mr. President, this is a matter which has attracted enormously strong reactions by veterans groups and Jewish groups, as evidenced at the Holocaust ceremonies at Independence Square in Philadelphia last Sunday, a subject which has already been discussed at some length on this floor and a subject which will be discussed beyond.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, Auschwitz, Treblinka, Dachau and Bergen-Belsen—these names rank among the most despised in human history. They are the names of the Nazi death camps. And behind the camps' now rusty gates are buried the names of most of the 6 million Jews killed by the Nazis from the mid-1930's to 1945.

Forty years ago this month the gates to these cities of death were opened to reveal the unspeakable. Forty years after the last oven was tamped down, the last gas chamber gutted, the last laboratory leveled, we still remember. We remember our disbelief, our shock and our horror as the first reports and newsreels of the Nazi atrocities reached us. We remember wondering how, in this century, in this universe, such evil could be conceived and executed. We remember, finally, not because we like to, but because we must.

Today, dispersed throughout the world, are living reminders of the Nazi death camps. There are the rotting walls of the camps themselves—and then there are the survivors. This anniversary is more than an opportunity to commemorate the liberation of Auschwitz, it is an opportunity to share the burden of those who survived.

And what a terrible burden they bear. They witnessed the most heinous crimes in human history, and it is they who must keep the dreadful memories alive in the conscience of mankind. But we can help them, and we must.

In the Philippics, Cicero wrote: "The life of the dead is placed in the memory of the living." The memory of the victims of the Holocaust must live in each of us and we must pass it on from generation to generation "to the last syllable of recorded time." That is both our duty to the dead and to ourselves as we struggle to make a better world.

REMEMBERING THE HOLOCAUST: A SACRED AND SOLEMN DUTY

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, as we solemnly commemorate the Holocaust, we come face to face with evil on an unprecedented scale; 6 million slaughtered. Who can comprehend that? Somehow we must find the way.

At the hearing held yesterday in Philadelphia on the search for Josef Mengele, we heard directly from the survivors of his atrocities. Listening to them, you begin to comprehend. They tell of the air filled with the constant screams of the victims, their ashes blotting out the Sun.

The survivors tell you of the selections—of pregnant women stomped to death under the heels of evil incarnate. You hear of the forced starvation, of injections that served only to torture and to induce sickness and you begin to see.

Painful as they are, we must keep these memories alive, because in the words of Elie Wiesel: "From the Holocaust, we have learned that we are responsible for the past and for the future as well."

The time for meeting our responsibility grows short. Mengele is 74 years old. He, and all the other Nazi war criminals, must be captured. They must be tried, and they must be punished. Justice demands this.

So does our responsibility to the truth. We must defeat all attempts to deny the Holocaust. While we have made great progress toward this goal by establishing the U.S. Memorial Council, and the Holocaust Memorial in New York, there will always be more to do.

As we recall what Elie Wiesel has described as the "unprecedented extinction of an entire world," we must redouble our efforts to oppose anti-Semitism in all its forms.

We must live by the words inscribed at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem:

Son of Man, keep not silent, forget not deeds of tyranny, cry out at the disaster of a people, recount it unto your children and they unto theirs from generation unto generation.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, the memories of World War II still shape America's view of the world, and no one memory shapes our outlook more painfully yet compellingly than the Holocaust. The systematic murder of 6 million Jews should, and shall, never be forgotten. The magnitude of this crime is beyond our comprehension, but it is our duty to recall it as best we can, and to teach succeeding generations about it so that history may not repeat itself.

The Holocaust must continue to mean several things to us and our children. First, it must serve to remind us of the persistence of anti-Semitism. While no part of the world is free of this disease, in some regions, such as Eastern Europe, it is imbedded in Government policy.

Second, the Holocaust must remain a symbol of man's inhumanity to man so that the international community can never ignore, let alone condone, the persecution or genocide of one group by another. A lack of concern or response by the international community clears the path for those who would commit genocide. This means that we must be ever vigilant, ever internationalist, and ever ready to act when it is in our power to do so and when the bounds of moral behavior are exceeded to the point where our own inaction would render us no better than a willing accomplice.

Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, last Thursday in the Capitol rotunda, the national civic commemoration ceremony of the Days of Remembrance 1985, took place. It was a solemn occasion, as any ceremony marking history's darkest hour must be. This year's national commemoration ceremony was particularly significant for me since I attended this ceremony not only as a Senator, or a citizen, but also as a newly appointed member of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

Here in the great hall of freedom, I listened to survivors of the Holocaust tell again the story that has been repeated so often, the story of tyranny so great that the normal human mind has difficulty comprehending it. As I listened in this place, I grasped the truth of the Holocaust in a way that I had not done so before. Looking back at history, and at the Nuremberg laws, I began to see our work in the Senate in a new light.

It was the Nuremberg laws ultimately that laid the foundation for the atrocities Hitler would perpetrate against 6 million Jews. Law then, and law now, is not neutral, for it expresses a moral code and system of beliefs which underlie it. The memory of the Holocaust, and of the Nuremberg laws, are a challenge to use to be ever conscious of this as we go about our daily activities in this place.

And I recognized once more the importance of observing again the Days of Remembrance. The Holocaust is a blight on the complexion of history, an episode which is tragic, and so painful, it would be easy or convenient to forget. But the world must never forget. It is our memory of the atrocities which will prevent us from allowing them to happen again, for the errors we forget are easily repeated.

Another thought came to me as I sat in the rotunda, among the survivors of the Holocaust, among those who had lost the members of their family, or years of their youth. It was not an original thought, but nonetheless sobering: Evil prevails when good men are silent.

The chronicle of the Holocaust is one of unfathomable horror, of immeasureable loss, that cannot and should not be ignored. But this afternoon, I join a host of others in remembering the triumph of good men over evil, the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps by allied forces.

The Czech author Milan Kundera has written:

The bloody massacre in Bangladesh quickly covered over the memory of the Russian invasion in Czechoslovakia, the assassination of Allende drowned out the groans from Bangladesh, the war in the Sinai made people forget Allende, the Cambodian massacre made people forget Sinai, and so on and so forth until ultimately everyone lets everything be forgotten.

It must not be so. This day, the remembrance, is for victims of the Holocaust. But it is for our posterity as well.

CONCENTRATION CAMP LIBERATION—40TH ANNIVERSARY COMMEMORATION

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, there is a corollary to the oft-repeated maxim that those who do not learn from history are doomed to repeat it and that is that active remembrance of that history is the best insurance against its recurrence. It is thus altogether fitting that we take these few moments to collectively commemorate the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the European death camps. I wish to commend my colleague from Pennsylvania, Senator ARLEN SPECTER, for organizing this effort.

The lessons of the camps are many and bitter. Perhaps the most chilling is discovery of the capacity for accommodation and complicity on the part of an ordinary unvigilant citizenry. At a time when the death camps worked their evil, the spectacle of ordinary shop keepers and small businesses competitively vying to supply crematoria components has always seemed to me particularly stupefying. The following excerpts from a letter by a small German firm are quoted from William Shirer's monumental "The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich." They capture this moral degradation well:

Following our verbal discussion regarding delivery of equipment of simple construction for burning bodies, we are submitting plans for our perfected cremation ovens which operate with coal and have hitherto given full satisfaction (in Dachau).

We suggest two crematoria furnaces for the building planned, and we advise you to make further inquiries to make sure the two ovens will be sufficient for your requirements.

. . . We guarantee the effectiveness of the crematoria ovens as well as their durability, the use of the best material and faultless workmanship.

Awaiting further word, we will be at your service.

Heil Hitler,

C.H. KORBI.

This commemoration today, while recalling for us the tragedy and the horror, should also strongly remind us of the ultimate capacity of good to triumph over evil when we are sufficiently resolute. The inception of the Nazi era and the long European night evokes for us today the words of Lear on the edge of madness.

I will do such things—what they are yet
I know not—but they shall be the terror of the earth.

The final lesson of the Holocaust is surely that we must never relax our vigilance nor sit silent in the face of injustice, hatred and other "terrors of the Earth."

HOLOCAUST REMEMBRANCE

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, today marks the closing, in Philadelphia, of the Inaugural Assembly of the American Gathering of Jewish Holocaust Survivors. The assembly meeting took place during the Days of Remembrance, a time when the Nation reflects on the awesome human tragedy we call the Holocaust.

It is now 40 years since the liberation of the death camps. In one sense, of course, the past is behind us; but in certain fundamental ways it is not, nor should it be. To ignore or forget the past is to remain its prisoner. Only remembrance and understanding offer us the means of coming to grips with its legacy.

In short, the Holocaust cannot be written off with the passage of time. If we are not ourselves survivors of the camps, we are with the survivors in spirit. Remembrance and understanding are universal imperatives, essential to decent people and decent societies everywhere; they are not the special province of the victims of the Holocaust who lived to talk and write about it. In these Days of Remembrance in 1985, we do well to recall the admonition of another age on the meaning of humanity:

Any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankind; And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; It tolls for thee.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, in light of the recent controversy about the planned Presidential visit to Germany our commemoration of the liberation of Nazi concentration camps is especially important.

We must not allow any confusion to arise on the identity of the victims and the victimizers during the reign of Nazi Germany.

It is an abomination to compare those who died defending a genocidal regime to those innocents who were destroyed by it.

Surely we can all endorse the point made by Elie Wiesel who told the President that Bitburg Cemetery, where dozens of the SS are buried, is not the place for a President of the United States to be. The President's place, as Mr. Wiesel pointed out, is with the victims of genocide. It is their memory we must honor.

Any number of commentators have remarked on what they see as a lack of historical consciousness among the American people. It has been said that, for every new foreign policy issue that comes along, American political debate goes back no further than the previous administration.

I cannot accept such a sweeping indictment, but it would be pointless to deny that there is some truth in it.

Yet there are events in human history which time must not be allowed to diminish. If there has been progress in history, if there is to be progress for the future of humanity, like a student correcting mistakes, we must remember where we have gone wrong.

The great Czech writer, Milan Kundera, has written:

The bloody massacre in Bangladesh quickly covered over the memory of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia, the assassination of Allende drowned out the groans of Bangladesh, the war in the Sinai made people forget Allende, the Cambodian massacre made people forget Sinai, and so on and so forth, until ultimately everyone lets everything be forgotten.

Mr. President, we can all extend this list indefinitely. We do tend to become distracted from and to forget events of enormous significance when they fade from the headlines of the daily papers and the nightly news programs. That is why it is imperative—as few things are imperative—that we remember the Holocaust today.

One of the most frightening things about the Holocaust is that it was not, properly speaking, wholly unprecedented. In the brutal sweep of human history, whole peoples have sometimes died out, been enslaved or killed off in the most cruel and deliberate manner possible under the circumstances.

But the Holocaust was different from those earlier genocidal acts—first in the scale of the effort, second in the organization and technology of the execution, and finally, in the nature of the country in which this monstrous crime was perpetrated.

The final solution was not carried out by a nation commonly understood to be uncultured or uncivilized. Nor was there even a remotely plausible threat to German security from the Jews and so many others targeted for mass murder by the Nazis.

Quite simply, an entire nation was seized by a collective madness.

What the Holocaust teaches us is that such things are possible. What the Holocaust requires of us is to remember, with humility and passionate conviction, that it is up to us to see to it that such things are not repeated.

One step we can take to prevent future Holocausts is the ratification of the Genocide Convention. It will not stop the Pol Pots of the World. But it is a step in the right direction—a step the United States must endorse, as a world leader in the struggle for human rights and civilized standards of governmental conduct.

But beyond what we do as a nation, each of us as individuals must bear witness to the reality of the Holocaust. We must not honor those who committed it. They were not soldiers. They were murderers. They were not patriots. They were psychopaths.

Instead, we must honor the victims of the Holocaust. We must not forget their sacrifice, for if we forget, and if we allow the passions and controversies of the day to distract us from the enormity of these crimes, we shall do a grave injustice to the victims of the Nazis.

Such a failure would make further genocides more possible. We must remember, so that we can rededicate ourselves to the simple, irreducible proposition: "Never again."

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, as a Jewish member of this body, I'd like to join my colleagues in commemorating the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

According to Rabbi Marvin Hier, who has coauthored and coproduced an Oscar-winning documentary on the Holocaust, 150,000 war criminals—members of the Gestapo, SS, and their collaborators—committed crimes against humanity. Only about 40,000 were ever formally charged, and only about 10,000 were convicted.

It is fitting that this commemoration is about freedom. On the other side of the Iron Curtain, the nations of Eastern Europe remain under the yoke of communism because Joseph Stalin refused to keep a pledge to hold free elections in the liberated territories.

We will never forget the horrors of the Holocaust and we should not forget. We should also remember that much of the rest of the world remains chained to the Soviet Union.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues today in commemorating the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

In one sense it is almost unseemly to stand here and speak about this. The Holocaust was and remains something unspeakable. Our words can add nothing. A kind of awed silence might be more appropriate. Yet we must speak—in hushed but outraged tones.

We must speak because our silence might be misunderstood.

It is through speech—and through pictures—that we teach. Those alive who witnessed the Holocaust must pass their knowledge on to those too young to have seen the horror. And we in turn must pass that knowledge on to those born after the Holocaust's end. We do this not because our words can change the past but because we believe they can prevent its repetition.

We remember not to dredge up the past or harm the present but to guard the future. Each of us must carry in his/her soul the knowledge of what evil it is possible for man to do. I wish I thought it could never happen again, but we can never be sure. We can only salute those who paid the price and pledge eternal vigilance.

BITBURG

Mr. EAGLETON. Mr. President, President Reagan's trip to West Germany to build a spirit of reconciliation is a laudable purpose. Regrettably, that spirit will be irreparably marred if he persists in his scheduled visit to the military cemetery at Bitburg in which 47 members of the Waffen SS are buried.

The President has stated that he was not aware of the presence of SS graves in the Bitburg Cemetery at the time the visit was scheduled. I accept that statement. But now he is aware.

Elie Wiesel, Holocaust survivor, preeminent author, and recent recipient of the Congressional Gold Medal from President Reagan for his tireless efforts to remind us of the horrors of the Nazi concentration camps, made an eloquent appeal to President Reagan to find an alternative way to demonstrate reconciliation with the German people. He said:

That place, Mr. President, is not your place. Your place is with the victims of the SS.

I urge the President to heed Mr. Wiesel's plea and to distance himself from any symbolic reconciliation with the most hideous of crimes against mankind.

ON REMEMBRANCE OF THE HOLOCAUST AND THE VISIT TO THE BITBURG CEMETERY

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today we join in the Senate and across America to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps at the end of World War II. This solemn occasion marks the closing day of the second annual assembly of the American gathering of Jewish Holocaust survivors meeting this year in Philadelphia. This special gathering has deep meaning for all of us this week. But its larger meaning is that remembrance must carry beyond a few short days in April, that the struggle against bigotry and injustice must never end.

Sadly, on this major anniversary, we are dismayed by the President's plan to visit the German military cemetery at Bitburg. In the past, the President has demonstrated both understanding and commitment to the Jewish people. I hope that, while there is still time, he will heed the eloquent words of Elie Wiesel at the White House last Friday, when he told the President that Bitburg was not his place.

We all know the reasons why Bitburg is not the President's place. In the words of the Passover song, Dayenu, any one of these reasons would have been enough. The 19,000 Americans killed and the 77,000 wounded during the Battle of the Bulge would have been enough. Nazi SS graves in the cemetery would have been enough. And Chancellor Kohl's declaration Monday that Germans bear a "never-ending shame" for the Holocaust, the greatest crime in history, would have been enough.

All Americans applaud the spirit of reconciliation that has flourished over the past four decades between the peoples of the United States and the other allied nations and the people of West Germany. That spirit must continue to grow and be strengthened, but there is no inconsistency between reconciliation and remembrance, and reconciliation at the expense of remembrance is wrong.

Listen to the names and the messages they send to us across the years on this anniversary of remembrance—Auschwitz, Buchenwald, Bergen-Belsen, Dachau, Majdanek, Ponar, Treblinka, Landsberg, Flossenburg, Nordhausen, Torgau, Ohrdruf, Ravensbruck, Sachsenhausen, Oranienbrug, Neuengamme, Papenburg, Stutthof, Grosfrosen, Mausenhausen, Ebensee, Theresienstadt, Sered, Malines, Westerborg, Drancy, Nantzweiler, Grus, Jasenovak, Zeman, Plaszou, Chelmno, Sobibor, Belzec, Warsaw, Kiev, Babi-Yar, Amsterdam, Czernowitz, Nuremberg—these are haunting names whose history is forever embedded in the soul of humanity. They are the camps and towns and cities where Jewish people lived and died; their names will stand for all eternity as symbols of the tyranny and massive cruelty of the Nazis and their systematic and brutal attempt to exterminate the Jewish people and other minorities.

But April is also a time of rebirth, a time to renew our courage and faith that the best instincts of humanity will ultimately prevail over even the darkest evil. In honoring the martyrdom of the millions of innocent men, women and children who died in the Holocaust, we also celebrate the indestructible spirit of the Jewish people. We remember how, in April 1943, the courageous citizens of the Warsaw ghetto rose up in defiance of their fate; against all odds, they fought for themselves, for their families already gone, for their dignity as human beings. And we remember in this month of anniversaries not only the liberation of the survivors of the death camps, but the miracle that emerged from the horror of the Holocaust, the miracle of April 1948, the birth of the State of Israel.

By looking back today, we can see ahead more clearly, recalling the prophecy of Santayana that those "who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." Never again must such atrocities and barbarous crimes against humanity take place. And so we renew our pledge to work even harder in the days and years to come, to ensure that all those responsible for these crimes, such as Josef Mengele, the infamous "Angel of Death" at Auschwitz, are finally brought to justice.

On this day of commemoration, let us rededicate our efforts to end for all time the evils of religious and racial injustice wherever they exist. Let us redouble our efforts to ease the suffering of Soviet Jews, to stamp out anti-Semitism wherever it appears, to ratify the Genocide Convention in the Senate of the United States, and to build a world of true and lasting freedom—freedom from war and want, from fear and oppression. The struggle for justice is never over, and none of us must rest until liberty is secure at last for all peoples in every land on Earth.

In the 40 years since he emerged from the nightmare of Buchenwald, Elie Wiesel's life work has been the creation of a testament of peace dedicated to the dead of World War II—and to the living of today and the generations still to come. He has the capacity, like few others I have ever met, to touch the conscience of all peoples on this planet. He did so again last Friday at the White House, and I ask unanimous consent that a transcript of his remarks in accepting the Congressional Gold Medal be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 20, 1985]

WIESEL: "I HAVE SEEN THE SS AT WORK . . . THEIR VICTIMS"

Mr. President, speaking of reconciliation, I was very pleased that we met before so a stage of reconciliation has been set in motion between us. But then, we were never on two sides. We were on the same side. We were always on the side of justice, always on the side of memory, against the SS and against what they represent.

It was good talking to you and I'm grateful to you for the medal. But this medal is not mine alone. It belongs to all those who remember what SS killers have done to their victims. It was given to me by the American people for my writings, teaching, and for my testimony.

When I write, I feel my invisible teachers standing over my shoulders, reading my words and judging their veracity. And while I feel responsible for the living, I feel equally responsible to the dead. Their memory dwells in my memory.

Forty years ago a young man awoke and he found himself an orphan in an orphaned world. What have I learned in the last 40 years? Small things. I learned the perils of language and those of silence. I learned that in extreme situations when human lives and dignity are at stake, neutrality is a sin. It helps the killers, not the victims.

I learned the meaning of solitude, Mr. President. We were alone, desperately alone. Today is April 19th, and April 19, 1943, the Warsaw ghetto rose in arms against the onslaught of the Nazis. They were so few and so young and helpless. And nobody came to their help. And they had to fight what was then the mightiest legion in Europe.

Every underground received help, except the Jewish underground, and yet they managed to fight and resist and push back those Nazis and their accomplices for six weeks. And yet, the leaders of the free world, Mr. President, knew everything and did so little, or nothing, or at least nothing specifically to save Jewish children from death.

You spoke of Jewish children, Mr. President. One million Jewish children perished. If I spent my entire life reciting their names, I would die before finishing the task.

Mr. President, I have seen children—I have seen them being thrown in the flames alive! Words—they die on my lips. So I have learned, I have learned to fragility of the human condition.

And I'm reminded of the great moral essayist, the gentle and forceful Abe Rosenthal, having visited Auschwitz, once wrote an extraordinary reportage about the persecution of Jews, and he called it, "Forgive them not Father, for they knew what they did."

I have learned that the Holocaust was a unique and uniquely Jewish event, albeit with universal implications. Not all victims were Jews. But all Jews were victims. I have learned the danger of indifference, the crime of indifference. For the opposite of love, I have learned, is not hate, but indifference.

Jews were killed by the enemy, but betrayed by their so-called Allies who found political reasons to justify their indifference of passivity.

But I've also learned that suffering confers no privileges. It all depends what one does with it. And this is why survivors of whom you spoke, Mr. President, have tried to teach their contemporaries how to build on ruins, how to invent hope in a world that offers none, how to proclaim faith to a generation that has seen it shamed and mutilated. And I believe, we believe, that memory is the answer—perhaps the only answer.

A few days ago, on the anniversary of the liberation of Buchenwald, all of us Americans watched with dismay and anger as the Soviet Union and East Germany distorted both past and present history. Mr. President, I was there. I was there when American liberators arrived. And they gave us back our lives.

And what I felt for them then nourishes me to the end of my days, and will do so. If you only knew what we tried to do with them then, we who were so weak that we couldn't carry our own lives—we tried to carry them in triumph!

Mr. President, we are grateful to the American Army for liberating us. We are grateful to this country—the greatest democracy in the world, the freest nation in the world, the moral nation, the authority in the world. And we are grateful especially to this country for having offered us haven and refuge and grateful to its leadership for being so friendly to Israel.

Mr. President, do you know that the ambassador of Israel, who sits next to you, who is my friend and has been for so many years, is himself a survivor? And if you knew all the causes we fought together for the last 30 years you should be prouder of him. And we are proud of him.

And we are grateful, of course, to Israel. We are eternally grateful to Israel for existing. We needed Israel in 1949, as we need it now. And we are grateful to Congress for its continuous philosophy of humanism and compassion for the underprivileged.

And as for yourself, Mr. President, we are so grateful to you for being a friend of the Jewish people, for trying to help the oppressed Jews in the Soviet Union, and to do whatever we can to save Scharansky and Abe Stolar and Josef Begun and Sakharov, and all the dissidents who need freedom. And, of course, we thank you for your support of the Jewish state of Israel.

But, Mr. President, I wouldn't be the person I am, and you wouldn't respect me for what I am, if I were not to tell you also of the sadness that is in my heart for what happened during the last week. And I am sure that you, too, are sad for the same reasons.

What can I do? I belong to a traumatized generation. And to us, as to you, symbols are important. And furthermore, following our ancient tradition—and we are speaking about Jewish heritage—our tradition commands us "to speak truth to power."

So may I speak to you, Mr. President, with respect and admiration of the events that happened. We have met four or five times. And each time I came away enriched, for I know of your commitment to humanity. And, therefore, I am convinced as you have told us earlier when we spoke that you were not aware of the presence of SS graves in the Bitburg cemetery. Of course you didn't know. But now we all are aware. May I, Mr. President, if it's possible at all, implore you to do something else, to find a way, to find another way, another site. That place, Mr. President, is not your place. Your place is with the victims of the SS.

Oh, we know there are political and strategic reasons. But this issue, as all issues related to that awesome event, transcends politics and diplomacy. The issue here is not politics, but good and evil. And we must never confuse them, for I have seen the SS at work, and I have seen their victims.

They were my friends. They were my parents. Mr. President, there was a degree of suffering and loneliness in the concentration camps that defies imagination. Cut off from the world with no refuge anywhere, sons watched helplessly their fathers being beaten to death. Mothers watched their children die of hunger. And then there was Mengele and his selections, terror, fear, isolation, torture, gas chambers, flames, flames rising to the heavens.

But, Mr. President, I know and I understand, we all do, that you seek reconciliation. So do I. So do we. And I, too, wish to attain true reconciliation with the German people. I do not believe in collective guilt, nor in collective responsibility. Only the killers were guilty. Their sons and daughters are not. And I believe, Mr. President, that we can and we must work together with them and with all people. And we must work to bring peace and understanding to a tormented world that, as you know, is still awaiting redemption.

I thank you, Mr. President.

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, last week I joined with other members of the Holocaust Memorial Council, colleagues, and survivors of the Holocaust in a moving ceremony in the Capitol rotunda commemorating the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camps by Allied troops. This extremely memorable event once again reminded us that the Holocaust must not be forgotten.

This is perhaps now more important than ever, as mass deaths—in Cambodia, in Ethiopia—become a feature of daily life around the world once again. If we allow the memory of what was done in the Holocaust to dim—we are virtually guaranteeing repetition of the Holocaust around the world. A willingness to slaughter those with real or imagined differences is not limited to Germans or Nazis.

There are also reminders of the Holocaust here in America. We are regularly seeing examples of Nazi mass murderers who were permitted to enter the United States after the war. The effort to continue to ferret out these people must continue. We cannot allow the distrubing argument, now unfortunately heard from time to time, that whatever these men did should be forgotten, because it was a long time ago, to prevail.

There can be no official forgiveness for these crimes. Official forgiveness can far too easily become official sanction in the minds of many. In this respect, I am especially encouraged that the hunt for Josef Mengele is being intensified. It is a disgrace that our Government apparently had information in the past on his whereabouts and took no action to apprehend him; I only hope we can be successful in bringing this monster to answer for his crimes before time removes him from human jurisdiction.

Remembering the Holocaust is important not only to the Jewish people, or to the other groups who perished by the thousands and millions in Nazi concentration camps, but to all of us. Holocausts are enivitable consequences of tyranny. They are the ultimate proof, if proof be needed, that absolute power corrupts absolutely. Those of us who value freedom around the world can look for renewed holocausts as the price of any failure on our part to maintain freedom here and abroad.

COMMEMORATION OF END TO THE NAZI HOLOCAUST

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today we are commemorating the ending of one of the most dreadful periods in the history of mankind—the Nazi Holocaust. We have survived that period and today we are rejoicing in the birth of the State of Israel—a nation which grew out of the horrors of World War II.

Mr. President, the President's upcoming visit to the Federal Republic of Germany is designed to celebrate the end of this terrible conflict and the atrocities that men committed upon other men. It is important to the fostering of the Western alliance and important as a show of unity between our two nations. However, a pallor has been cast over this visit which will, unless things change, cloud the significance of this trip for years to come—the President's laying of a wreath at the Bitburg cemetery.

A few days ago, I joined 52 of my colleagues in urging the President to choose an alternate site to demonstrate the reconciliation of Germany and America. It is difficult for me to see the purpose behind honoring SS soldiers whose organization not only directly participated in carrying out the systematic annihilation of the Jews of Europe, but brutally massacred hundreds of U.S. soldiers. In fact, one of my staff members suffered the loss of two uncles at Malmedy, where they were violently executed at the hands of the SS.

In addition to contacting President Reagan, I have been in touch with the German Ambassador and several German Parliamentarians in hopes that Chancellor Kohl would consent to revise the President's itinerary.

I'm taking this opportunity to again urge the President to change his plans and visit a site which will truly represent the spirit of the modern day relationship between our two nations. This episode has only contributed to hostility and has proved to be divisive rather than unifying. Let us not let concerns of appearances of succumbing to pressure, disuade us from doing the right thing. If we do not, the stigma of this visit will last much longer than any temporary fallout that might result in a change of plans.

Mr. KASTEN. I rise today to join my colleagues in calling attention to the Jewish Holocaust. The Holocaust was a systematic extermination of 6 million Jews by the Nazis during World War II. In the Nazi program of genocide, the primary victims were exterminated simply because they were Jews. While gypsies were killed throughout Europe, Nazi plans for their extermination were never completed nor fully implemented. However, plans for the innihilation of European Jews were not only completed but thoroughly implemented. The Holocaust was not a throwback to times of medieval torture or barbarism. It was a thorough modern expression of bureaucratic organization, industrial management, scientific achievement, and technological sophistication. To remember the Holocaust is to sensitize ourselves to the lessons it teaches us. Nazism was brought on by the breakdown of democracy and the collapse of social and economic cohesion. By remembering we learn again that democratic governments must function and perform for the people. Remembering is not easy for it challenges our perceptions and our complacency. Focusing on the Holocaust encourages us to renew our commitment to democracy and humanity. But make no mistake that capacity for evil did not end at the death camps. The proof is around the world. Whether it is state-sponsored terrorism, genocide in Cambodia, or anti-Semitism masquerading as antizionism at the United Nations, we must all take responsibility and work to end these injustices. We can best serve those who died in the Holocaust by preventing such inhumanity in the future.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I wish at this time to notify all of our colleagues who are listening to this on the squawk box that there will be time for statements in the order of their arrival in the Senate Chamber.

At this time, Mr. President, I yield to my distinguished colleague from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ANDREWS). The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Pennsylvania for yielding me time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may proceed.

COMMEMORATION OF 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF LIBERATION OF NAZI CONCENTRATION CAMPS

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues in the Senate in speaking in commemoration of the victims of the Holocaust and the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camps.

The liberation of the camps in 1945 revealed to the entire world the horrible evidence the Holocaust. From the day the first allied soldiers opened the gates of the camps, revealing their ghastly history, remembrance became in obligation for those who endured, those who saw the horror firsthand, the rescuers, and for those who were only distant witnesses.

The term "Holocaust" uniquely defines this, one of the most profound of tragedies in the history of our civilization. It is not now, nor may it ever be, fully understood. No sane person could conceive the magnitude of this devastation of humankind. The destruction of Eastern European Jewry, both the people and their life, their history and culture, was uniquely the Holocaust.

The Holocaust was a reign of terror in this, the most advanced century of mankind. Six million Jews and millions of other innocent victims of Nazi oppression had their lives extinguished by a modern state using advanced management systems and technology under the full powers of the law, not to preserve or enhance human life and dignity, but to degrade and dehumanize, and finally murder its victims.

The events of the Holocaust were not, as we often prefer to think, a random outbreak of maniacal lawlessness; rather they were the rigorous, systematic, bureaucratically organized, legally sanctioned murder of millions of innocent people whose only crime was the Jewish identity of one of their grandparents.

The evil did not begin with extermination. It commenced slowly, in gradual stages, escalating from discrimination and random violence. After each move, Hitler and his Nazi colleagues waited, assessing the reaction, wondering aloud if anyone cared. By 1941, Hitler was ready to go forward with what was called "the final solution of the Jewish question." That was the terrible bureaucratic name for the plan to annihilate the Jews of Europe. And so the concentration camps became death camps. The drum roll of their names echoes inside our heads with a chilling awesomeness: Auschwitz, Maidanek, Treblinka, Belzec.

And while the death camps were performing their dreadful tasks, the civilized world stood silent. In the chronicles of those horror-stricken days, while the odor of burning flesh putrefied the air of the rural countryside where the death factories did their work, not a single bombing raid on the railroad tracks leading to the camps or the mass destruction machinery was permitted. Even a few days of interruption in the death works might have saved thousands of lives. By silence, by inaction, those who knew of the horror, without intention or malice, contributed to the process. Silence helps only the oppressor, never the victim.

And yet, in the midst of the most evil period in modern history, human resilience persisted. In the Warsaw ghetto, young Jews resisted the efforts of the Germans to deport them. To almost the last person, they held the German Army at bay for more than 3 weeks, longer than the armies of many European countries were able to do. Non-Jews, like the Danish people, showed courage too. They resisted the Nazis and saved almost all the Jews in their land. They merely treated these citizens as neighbors in their community. The ordinary became extraordinary in the Holocaust.

We must also remember the survivors. Forty years ago their skeletal bodies and staring eyes shocked the world. Even more than the rows of stacked corpses, the sight of those ravaged faces represented the horror of the Holocaust to the outside world.

The courage, the indomitable human spirit of the survivors must truly be remembered and honored. They endured the worst hell that man can contrive, and they maintained the will to live. Theirs was the true victory, not the victory of the battlefield.

The exceptional determination of the survivors is a true wonder. Women who saw their first families perish in flames somehow found the courage to bring human life into this world again. Sons who parted from fathers had the tenacity to share life anew with their sons. The people who saw the collapse of all vision, who understood that despair was a correct understanding of our reality, learned to dream and to hope. Many rebuilt their lives in this country, while others restored themselves in a recreated homeland in Israel.

And so we set aside the days of remembrance each April to keep alive the memory of those who were killed and to honor the survivors. If we let the memory slip away, if we fail to remember, then the enemies of humanity will finally conquer. That would be unthinkable. And so we pause in the daily rhythm of our lives to remember.

As we remember, I offer the hope that President Reagan will alter the itinerary of his trip to Germany to eliminate the visit to the Bitburg cemetery, where SS members were buried. Reconciliation between nations after such a devastating war takes place over a long period of time, not on a single occasion or with one ceremonial visit. The alliance with West Germany is important to this country, but the President is mistaken in his belief that he can accelerate reconciliation with our country and West Germany by paying tribute to those who killed our soldiers and millions of innocent people throughout Europe.

I fear that unless we remember, unless we act, the tragedy of the Holocaust may become a precedent, and precedent invites repetition. Human solidarity, our collective efforts and our sense of empathy can make a difference. Together we must strive to affirm the resilience of the human spirit and the power of compassion while recognizing the vulnerability of life and its value. We must strive to live in harmony and in peace, and to use government in service of humanity. Together, we pause to remember those who died in the Holocaust so that their memory may serve as a warning and as a blessing in our rededication to life.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ].

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise to speak about the commemorative occasion of the 40th anniversary of the liberation of the death camps in Europe which marked the end of the Second World War. What a sad thing it is to remember. I really did not have a sense of what was happening in those days. I was too young. But much of my family was involved in that holocaust. None of them survived. None of them was liberated 40 years ago—only those who had been fortunate enough to leave Europe a little earlier, as we did.

My family dispersed all around the world. Some were in the Union of South Africa, Australia, Shanghai, Kenya, Cuba, Argentina—you name it. They were able to get out ahead of Mr. Hitler, who sought out people only because they were Jews and sought out other people. He brought horror not only to the Jews, but also to other millions in those death camps and brought death to many of his own people and scores of millions of people throughout Europe and all over the world.

It is a sad thing to remember. But as my friend and colleague from New Jersey said, we must remember, or we will become the victims of history once again; because if we have no memory, then indeed we perhaps will repeat some of the horrors of bygone years.

It is disappointing sometimes to read history. Even as we talk about this holocaust, we are reminded of other holocausts, those that took place very recently in Kampuchea, the deliberate starving of the Hungarian people in the 1930's, the murder of upward of 2 million Armenians at the time of the First World War. But never was it done in such a systematic way as was done by Mr. Hitler and his henchmen in the Second World War, deliberately seeking to eliminate an entire people. He was not successful, as we know.

Even as we celebrate the 40th anniversary of the freeing of those people who survived in those camps, looking at us with their hollow eyes and their tender and emaciated bodies, we are made to think that these things should never happen again.

Mr. President, tomorrow morning we will have before us in the Foreign Relations Committee the Genocide Convention, and it has been before this body for nearly 40 years. It has not been ratified despite the fact that over a hundred nations, I believe, have ratified the convention.

Somehow, we are led to believe that if this convention is ratified, the sovereignty of the United States will be impacted in one way or another, that we cannot submit ourselves to the World Court or to international courts of justice or to other international jurisdictions, that some mischievous nation that means us ill will bring us before that body on some trumped up charge. Yet, the imperative of ratifying the Genocide Convention is even greater than the comparatively very slight academic type of risk that is associated with this convention.

How can the world stop the genocidal feelings which seem to arise in each generation, unless the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world signs onto this convention? It is a mystery to me why this convention, which has such broad appeal and such broad support, cannot find the support of all the Members of the Senate. Clearly, most Members—the overwhelming majority—support it. On the other hand, the rules of the Senate are such that a few Senators can frustrate the intention of the vast majority.

So it is my hope that as we consider the Genocide Convention tomorrow in the Foreign Relations Committee, we will report it intact, without reservation; that we will bring it to the Senate floor for rapid action; that it will be ratified; that it will become part of international law; so that we, too, as a country, on the Senate floor and on the House floor and on the street corners, as well as in our news publications, will decry genocide and state that we, as a nation, can no longer be part of this inhuman practice.

I think of many things on the 40th anniversary of the freeing of those people, those few who survived in those camps, and we see their eyes and their emaciated bodies.

We say to all our friends and to our adversaries that this is something we will not let happen again; that if this country stands for anything, we will not let that happen again; that we will not allow such acts to take place in this world; that we will express ourselves not only on the Senate floor but also will take such steps and such actions internationally that are necessary to prevent it from happening again.

Those, Mr. President, are my thoughts on this sad 40th anniversary of the freeing of those camps, the thoughts that are associated with the deaths of 9 or 10 million people—6 million of them Jews, 1 million of those 6 million being children. It was a sad period for the Jewish people and for the world, and it should never be repeated.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BOSCHWITZ] for those comments.

I think it appropriate to note the outstanding leadership of Senator BOSCHWITZ on this issue and many other issues of human rights.

I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SIMON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. DURENBERGER]. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Pennsylvania and I thank him also for taking time of this body at this point to acknowledge this important anniversary.

I remember when I was in the Army stationed in Germany going to Dachau, seeing that statute, that emaciated statue, that haunts anyone who sees it and seeing in various languages the words "never again."

I think these days are days when we have to remind ourselves again of those words "never again."

Three quick points, Mr. President, and my colleagues: One is what happened in Germany is a reminder to us in this body and to the American people that we have to be careful of the leaders we select. Leaders can bring out the noble in us, leaders can bring out the beast in us, and there is both the noble and the beast in all of us.

If you visit the Simon household out in the countryside of southern Illinois or you visit our apartment here in Washington, you will see a mezuzah on the door. I happen to be the son of a Lutheran minister; my wife happens to be Roman Catholic, but we have a mezuzah on the door because of my experience in Germany. Germany is a country that is half Lutheran, half Catholic and so our household feels a special responsibility there.

I think the second thing we ought to do is to remind our leader of the sensitivity of this subject and I hope that this body will be able to vote within the next few days on a resolution that Senator METZENBAUM will be introducing urging the President not to visit the cemetery at Bitburg.

Gestures are important. Christmas Eve the Prime Minister of Israel visited Bethlehem. It was just a small thing. It was a gesture but gestures create the kind of an atmosphere where substance is possible, and I think the President's action, and I do not suggest it is taken out of malice, but I think it shows an insensitivity that we do not want to convey either to the American public or the public in Germany or the public anywhere in the world, and let us add thankfully that in Germany there have been tremendous strides from those tragic, tragic days.

Then, finally, I think this is a good time to remind ourselves that racism can rear its ugly head again. What happened in Germany is you had institutional racism and the United States was not opposed to it. Oh, our leaders said we were opposed to it but we did not use any economic muscle against Hitler. We did not open our shores to the refugees. And we discovered that since institutional racism was not changed peacefully, it erupted in violence and that violence was not contained within the borders of that one country.

We have institutional racism again in the world in South Africa and just as certain as what happened in Germany spread beyond Germany, because it was not changed, if South Africa is not changed peacefully, it will erupt in violence and that violence will not be contained within the borders of that country.

We are now treating South Africa as we did Hitler in the thirties. We are saying "naughty, naughty, we do not approve of what you are doing" but we are not standing up firmly as we should.

This is the day, this is the time, when we repeat "never again" as those words appear in the concentration camps on various memorials. Never again not only in Germany, never again here in the United States, never again—let us not let it happen in South Africa, or anywhere else.

Again I commend my colleague from Pennsylvania for taking the time to help remind us and help remind the Nation of this important occasion.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, Senator ANDREWS.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I appreciated the opportunity of hearing the remarks of my friends. I think the Senator from Illinois has said it so well. We are not here just to talk about Holocaust of the tragedy that befell millions of people at that point in time, but America really came out of many persecutions over the years.

Our own family got chased out of another country. They had to flee for their lives in 1640, a long time ago—they bet wrong on politics—just as other people were persecuted by the political leaders during the 1930's.

But America has served as a beacon of hope, of justice, of equity for all of the troubled people, all of the persecuted people over the years.

I think that great heritage that we have come into through no fault really of our own—we were born into—the opportunity of being in this country most of us is the most cherished thing that we have might I say, Mr. President, to protect in the decades yet to come.

We cannot possibly live up to our heritage if we do not remember that if any group or any individual is persecuted because of their politics, their race, their creed, it diminishes us that much.

That is why this type of comment on this day in the Senate stands in such a great tradition of all that is good and right about the United States.

So let us never forget that it is our heritage to live up to keeping that challenge of freedom even brighter as the decades go by.

I appreciate my colleague yielding and salute him and yield the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished Senator from North Dakota. I am pleased now to yield to my distinguished colleague from Ohio, the leader in this movement, Senator METZENBAUM.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Pennsylvania. I appreciate his leadership in bringing this issue to the floor.

I commend all of those who have spoken prior to my own remarks because what they have said touches very much upon this entire issue. Each of us in his or her own way feel very deeply about the Holocaust and what occurred 40 years ago.

I had occasion over the weekend to be present and speak at the dedication of a torah in a Jewish synogogue in Chattanooga, TN, and that torah, which is 200 years old, came from Kromerz in Czechoslovakia where it belonged to a large and vibrant Jewish congregation. All that is left of the Jews of Kromerz is that torah. It was their torah and it was taken by the Nazis and the Nazis took all of the Jews and sent them to the concentration camps.

That specific torah was to become an exhibit in a grotesque Nazi project. Hard to believe, human beings who called themselves civilized, human beings were going to erect the museum of the extinct race, the museum of the extinct race. That torah was rescued in 1945 by the British Army and it was sent to London to the Westminster Synagogue and then it was sent as one of a number of torahs to some select congregations throughout this country and the world.

One cannot forget the unspeakable horror that extinguished the Jews in Kromerz and the Jews of so many other cities and not only the Jews but the Christians and the Gypsies and many others.

There are 11 million who were lost in the Holocaust. Six million of them were Jews and 5 million people of different religions.

Elie Wiesel, prominent writer, Auschwitz survivor himself, chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Commission, was pictured this week in one of the national news magazines as one of those who were in Auschwitz. It is hard to believe, when you look at his face in this picture, that he was fortunate enough to survive and is with us now.

He said to a Senate committee in March of this year about the nature of that horror:

> Hundreds and hundreds of communities were wiped out in a tempest of blood and steel and reduced to ashes. When the Jews of my town arrived at a place unknown to us then, Auschwitz, the death factories anihilated 10,000 human beings a day. At times, their success was so great that the figure was much higher—17,000; and once they recorded for their history 22,000 a day.

Now, I do not have to point out to you that so often we see on national TV a report about a child whose life is in danger in need of a kidney and the whole nation is gripped by this tragedy and wants to help to find a kidney for that child. Or we see a picture of a missing child and we grieve with the parents about that missing child and share their concern. The whole nation becomes perturbed and it becomes the top of the news on the national networks when a miner is buried in a landslide and we pray and hope that he will be saved because we recognize the precious value of life and we recognize that every human being is important.

Yet we look back to the days of the Holocaust and it was not a human being, it was 10,000 a day just at Auschwitz alone, 17,000, and in 1 day 22,000 carried into the furnaces at Auschwitz. That is the horror of the Holocaust.

Let me go back to what Mr. Wiesel said to that Senate committee because he said it so much stronger than I could possibly say it. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, I have seen the flames, I have seen the flames rising to nocturnal heavens; I have seen the parents and children, teachers and their disciples, dreamers end their dreams and woe unto me, I have seen children thrown alive into the flames.

The flames—the living children thrown into the fire—the tortures of those who were experimented upon.

I attended a hearing conducted by Senator SPECTER in Philadelphia the other day where women came forward and others as well to talk about the experiments that were performed upon them by the infamous and perfidious Joseph Mengele, who had the audacity to call himself "doctor." Experiments upon human beings—twins to see what different reactions they would have; no worry; no care; no concern about the lives of the people upon whom the experiments were being conducted.

Recently, the same Mr. Wiesel that I mentioned before was awarded the Presidential medal on the basis of the congressional enactment. And in the White House he said:

> I have seen the SS at work. I have seen the victims. They were my friends. They were my parents. There was a loneliness and suffering in the concentration camps that defies imagination—sons watched helplessly their fathers being beaten to death. Mothers watched their children die of hunger. And then there was Mengele in the selections. Terror, fear, isolation, torture, gas chambers, flames, flames rising to the heavens.

That is why it is so important for all of us today and every day for all humanity to be certain that it never be forgotten, never diminished, never denied. The camps at Auschwitz, Dachau, Bergen-Belsen, and so many others can and never should be forgotten.

We here in the Senate have an obligation to be doing something about it. That is what genocide is all about. And we have been waiting 36 years to ratify the Genocide Convention. Ninety-six other nations have seen fit to do so, but this Nation drags its feet. And now there are some who say, "Well, yes, let's ratify it, but put a condition on."

No conditions. No conditions. We ought to put our stamp of approval upon the Genocide Convention which outlaws genocide of a whole people and do it now.

As a matter of fact, in that connection, we promised to do it the first order of business when we returned this session and here it is April and it has not been on the floor as yet. Why not? Why not?

And while all of this is going on about memorializing the Holocaust and we drag our feet with respect to the ratification of the Genocide Convention, our President is planning a visit to Germany. And no one would deny that our President has often spoken with genuine feeling on the subject of the Holocaust and I accept his words as well as his concern.

But then I have to say, "Well, why, Mr. President, are you insisting upon going to Bitburg?" Why does he insist on going to a military cemetery and then in recent days telling us that his visit to Bergen-Belsen for the Nazis is comparable to his visit to Bitburg. You cannot equate the two. Certainly, the President should visit Bergen-Belsen, the site of so many of the atrocities. But why visit Bitburg where so many of the SS Waffen Nazi soldiers, the crack corps, the Nazis are buried? Something is wrong with this whole affair.

At first, when we learned of the President's visit to Bitburg, we chalked it up to bad staff work or perhaps to monumental insensitivity or maybe even to a mistake.

But the bottom line is this: The idea that an American President should lay a wreath in honor of the men dying and fighting for the Third Reich is unacceptable to the American Legion, to the Veterans of Foreign Wars, all Americans, and to decent-minded people throughout the world. And when the President recently tried to make the comparison and said, "I think there is nothing wrong with visiting that cemetery where those young men are victims of nazism. Also, even though they were fighting in the German uniform, drafted into the service to carry out the hateful wishes of Nazis." Said the President: "They were victims just as surely as the victims in the concentration camp."

Mr. President, I disagree. A soldier dies with a fighting chance. The victims in the camps had no chance. They were tortured and treated as animals, and used for Nazi medical experiments. They were the aged, and they were the littlest children.

Mr. President, you cannot in good conscience compare the victims of the Nazi Holocaust with Nazi soldiers who killed 18,000 American soldiers, inflicted 87,000 American casualties in the Battle of the Bulge, and the soldiers on whose graves you want to plant a wreath in Bitburg, a number of them who are buried at that very cemetery. And even worse, the same SS troops who are buried there are the troops who turned Europe into a charnel house and who on December 17, 1944, at a place barely 30 miles from Bitburg marched 100 defenseless American prisoners of war into a field, tied their hands behind their backs, and cut them down with machineguns. To honor SS Waffen men is more than unacceptable. It is an abomination.

Mr. President, 53 Senators joined together the other day on both sides of the aisle and urged you not to visit Bitburg. Mr. President, I can say to you that the first time in my experience in the United States with a letter of this kind, Senators have come up to me since that time and said, "We wished we had had an opportunity to sign. Why didn't you call upon us?"

I believe this body as a whole is prepared to express itself in the strongest possible terms to the President urging him not to make the visit. And I attempted just a few days ago to get unanimous consent in order that I might bring a resolution to the floor authored by Senator CRANSTON, myself, and Senator KENNEDY, so that this body might have an opportunity to express itself to our President, and I was refused. But I say loudly and clearly that I have indicated to the majority leader and the assistant majority leader and to anyone else who cares to hear that somehow, some way, I hope to bring to the floor of this body a resolution calling upon the President not to visit Bitburg, and letting him know the sentiments of this U.S. Senate.

I hope that the President will change his mind. And I want to report that this morning the German Ambassador was kind enough to accept my invitation to come to my office to discuss this subject. And I met with him in the group of U.S. Senators, and said to the German Ambassador, "We would like to put this issue to bed, to rest." We believe that for 40 years reconciliation has been effective between the Federal Republic of Germany and the United States of America. And we want to build upon that relationship. The American people understand and recognize the fact that Germans today are not guilty of group guilt, and that it would be unfair to blame them for that which occurred 40 years ago, that the peoples of America and the peoples of Germany have no continuing disagreements but that a visit by the President of the United States at the invitation of the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany to visit Bitburg will only exacerbate the situation and add to the publicity that has already been made to become such a public issue. It is enough already. We do not need more publicity. We do not need more divisiveness. We do not need more to be reminded of some of the atrocities that occurred 40 years ago. I hope and respectfully urge that the German Chancellor will indicate his approval of a change in the plans of the President of the United States. We suggest a change not in any way to detract from the right of the German government to make its own determinations and to conduct its own affairs in any manner it deems appropriate. But in this instance we say that reconciliation, friendship, cooperation, and so much more can be achieved if the Germans joined with our President in determining that there should be another location where he may pay his respects to the Federal Republic of Germany.

The damage has already been done. Let us not have more of it. Let us bring it to a halt. And I do not mean political damage to the President or to Chancellor Kohl. I am talking about damage that lies in trivializing the Holocaust, the damage that comes about by reason of this meaningless gesture of reconciliation which would occur by the President's visit to Bitburg. I think that no one needs to be reminded that the Federal Republic of Germany is not the Third Reich. And on that subject let me quote to you a moving editorial that appeared last week in one of Germany's most prestigious newspapers, the Sud-Deutsche Zeitung of Munich.

The shame of having waged and carried on the most horrible of all wars, fighting for an unjust cause, and for criminal goals, is something we Germans have to deal with. The same is true for the sorrow and tears, for the lives this nation had to give. Leave us Germans alone with it. Nobody will be able to overcome it in our place just by making a "gesture."

That editorial was right. It says it all.

Of all subjects, the Holocaust is one that cannot and must not be trivialized. Today as we stand here on the floor of the U.S. Senate and join together and refreshing the recollection of so many about the devastation that occurred during the Holocaust, let us also raise our voices and let the President of the United States know that it would be better, far better, if he were to see fit not to visit Bitburg.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Will the Senator desist from suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I certainly do.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished Senator for the very worthwhile comments, and I would like to yield to the distinguished Senator from California, Senator WILSON.

Mr. WILSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I thank my good and distinguished friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, as the Inaugural Assembly of the American Gathering of the Jewish Holocaust Survivors is concluded this week at their meeting in Philadelphia, PA, one thought comes clearly to mind. It has become virtually a slogan for those Holocaust survivors, but not for them alone; far more importantly, for all the rest of us who were not required to endure what they did manage to endure. The phrase, of course, is "Never again." Never again can the world stand idly by and look the other way as an incredible tragedy—not just an injustice, but one of such monumental horror—takes place as to virtually condemn all those who simply look the other way.

When we think of that terrible, sorrowful past, probably the lowest point in man's history, and its episodic inhumanity to man, it stirs the soul to think that there are countervailing influences, and at the same moment one of these has permitted us to celebrate the 37th birthday of a nation which was born from the Holocaust aftermath.

The nation of Israel arose from the Holocaust, and, as we remember the darkest side of man in that evil history of the Holocaust, let us also recall that our country was settled by religious refugees seeking their own new Jerusalem, and let us not forget that many of our most generous impulses have their roots in that shared Christian-Judeo tradition.

In the words of John Winthrop,

We must delight in each other, make others' conditions our own, rejoice together, mourn together, labor and suffer together; for we must consider that we shall be as a city upon a hill, the eyes of all people upon us.

Mr. President, we have drawn inspiration from that metaphor, from that other city upon a hill, that ancient cradle of civilization miraculously reborn in our century. The old Jerusalem has become the new, and we derive inspiration from an extraordinary people, the people of Israel, who truly have withstood horrendous storms, challenges to their survival, challenges to the fundamental thesis of democracy which they represent as a model for others.

Mr. President, I feel that a strong partnership exists between peoples of this Nation and the nation of Israel, a common bond between the Jews of all nations and those who desire freedom. This partnership of those who love their freedom as they love their God, who believe that common men can be capable of uncommon achievement, uncommon courage, uncommon generosity to one another even as they are enduring the most inhumane of conditions.

Mr. President, I celebrate the 37th birthday of that new nation celebrating the old values of man's most decent impulses to his fellow man, even as we mourn the tragedy that the survivors of the Holocaust have indelibly stamped upon them.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank my distinguished colleagues for coming to the floor for this rememberance of the 40th anniversary of the Holocaust.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter of April 18, 1985, to the President be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 18, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I write to commend your recent decision to visit a death camp to pay tribute to millions of Jews and other innocent victims slaughtered by the Nazi regime during World War II. But I urge you to reconsider the reported plan to visit the German military cemetery in Bitburg because of the burial there of S.S. storm troopers who participated in the Holocaust. Visiting that cemetery would be an affront, not only to Jews, but also to all American veterans.

I am personally well aware of your own feelings about the horrors of the Holocaust from hearing you talk about the film you made following World War II on the liberation by allied armies of the death camps. I also know from hearings I have recently held in my Judiciary Subcommittee of the diligent and aggressive efforts of the Justice Department, under your administration, to find and prosecute Nazi war criminals, particularly Dr. Josef Mengele, the notorious "angel of death" who was responsible for torture and barbaric medical experiments on children and others, and, finally, for countless murders.

While a visit to a different military cemetery in Germany might advance reconciliation between our two countries, Bitburg is inappropriate. Surely a cemetery can be located that contains the remains of German soldiers but not S.S. storm troopers.

Bitburg is also inappropriate because it is the burial site of S.S. troops who massacred U.S. soldiers during the Battle of the Bulge. For an American President to honor these German war dead would derogate memories of their American victims. How can the millions of American families whose members were killed or injured during World War II accept their own President's honoring of those guilty of unspeakable atrocities? As one whose father was injured fighting German soldiers in World War I, I can strongly empathize with the feelings of such American families.

Accordingly, I urge you to forego visiting Bitburg and any other German cemetery containing S.S. soldiers and, if necessary, any cemetery at all.

I would appreciate your careful consideration of these observations which I believe involve our most basic moral values as Americans.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of "A Tribute to the Million Children of the Holocaust," performed at the Lincoln Center on April 14, 1985, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, participating in this tribute were many leading artists and performers who volunteered their great talents so that the world will not forget the 1 million children who perished in the Holocaust.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A total of 15,000 children under the age of 15 passed through the Terezin (Theresienstadt) Concentration Camp between the years 1942 and 1944.

Because Terezin served as a kind of way station to Oswiecim (Auschwitz) and other extermination centers, it was meant to be a model camp which foreigners could be shown and it was actually called a ghetto. Yet every one of its inhabitants was condemned in advance to die.

The drawings and poems are all that is left of these children. Of those who signed their names to their work, it has been possible to find out a few facts: the year and place of their birth, the number of their transport to Terezin and to Oswiecim, and then the year of their death. For most of them, it was 1944, the next to last year of World War II.

Sonja Waldsteinová was born in Prague on November 28, 1926, and was deported to Terezin on March 6, 1943.

TEREZIN

That bit of filth in dirty walls,
And all around barbed wire,
And 30,000 souls who sleep
Who once will wake
And once will see
Their own blood spilled.

I was once a little child,
Three years ago.
That child who longed for other worlds.
But now I am no more a child
For I have learned to hate.
I am a grown-up person now,
I have known fear.
Bloody words and a dead day then,
That's something different than bogie men!
But anyway, I still believe I only sleep today,
That I'll wake up, a child again, and start to laugh and play.

I'll go back to childhood sweet like a briar rose,
Like a bell which wakes us from a dream,
Like a mother with an ailing child
Loves him with aching woman's love.
How tragic, then, is youth which lives
With enemies, with gallows ropes,
How tragic, then, for children on your lap
To say: This for the good, that for the bad.

Somewhere, far away out there, childhood sweetly sleeps.
Along that path among the trees,
There o'er that house
Which was once my pride and joy.
There my mother gave me birth into this world
So I could weep . . .

In the flame of candles by my bed, I sleep
And once perhaps I'll understand
That I was such a little thing.
As little as this song.

These 30,000 souls who sleep
Among the trees will wake,
Open an eye
And because they see
A lot
They'll fall asleep again . . .

HANUS HACHENBERG, 1944.

Hanus Weinberg was born August 18, 1931, and deported to Terezin on December 5, 1942. In Terezin, he lived in boys' dormitory number 11. He died in Auschwitz December 15, 1943.

IT ALL DEPENDS ON HOW YOU LOOK AT IT

Terezin is full of beauty
It's in your eyes now clear
And through the street the tramp
Of many marching feet I hear.

In the ghetto at Terezin
It looks that way to me,
Is a square kilometer of earth.
Cut off from the world that's free.

Death, after all, claims everyone,
You find it everywhere.
It catches up with even those Who wear their noses in the air.

The whole, wide world is rule
With a certain justice, so
That helps perhaps to sweeten
The poor man's pain and woe.

MIROSLAV KOSEK.

Hana Grunfeld was born on May 20, 1935 and deported to Terezin on December 14, 1941. She lived in Block IV at Terezin and died at Auschwitz in 1944.

PAIN STRIKES SPARKS ON ME, THE PAIN OF TEREZIN

Fifteen beds, fifteen charts with names,
Fifteen people without a family tree.
Fifteen bodies for whom torture is medicine and pills.
Beds over which the crimson blood of ages spills
Fifteen bodies which want to live here.
Thirty eyes, seeking quietness.
Bald heads which gape from out the prison.
The holiness of the suffering, which is none of my business.

The loveliness of air, which day after day
Smells of strangeness and carbolic,
The nurses which carry thermometers
Mothers who grope after a smile
Food is such a luxury here.
A long, long night, and a brief day.

But anyway, I don't want to leave
The lighted rooms and the burning cheeks,
Nurses who leave behind them only a shadow
To help the little sufferers.

I'd like to stay here, a small patient,
Waiting the Doctor's daily round,
Until, after a long, long time, I'd be well again.

Then I'd like to live and go back home again.

Marion Mayer was born in 1935. There is no record of the date of her arrival in Terezin, nor of her death. The painting shows that she was nine years old and lived in barracks CIII 104.

THE GARDEN

A little garden,
Fragrant and full of roses.
The path is narrow
And a little boy walks along it.

A little boy, a sweet boy,
Like that growing blossom.
When the blossom comes to bloom.
The little boy will be no more.

FRANIA BASS.

Hana Lissau was born February 4, 1930, in Lany and deported to Terezin on February 25, 1942. She lived in house number 28 at Terezin and belonged to group A. She died at Auschwitz on October 16, 1944.

ON A SUNNY EVENING

On a purple, sun-shot evening
Under wide-flowering chestnut trees
Upon the threshold full of dust
Yesterday, today, the days are all like these.

Trees flower forth in beauty,
Lovely too their very wood all gnarled and old
That I am half afraid to peer
Into their crowns of green and gold.

The sun has made a veil of gold
So lovely that my body aches.
Above, the heavens shriek with blue
Convinced I've smiled by some mistake.
The world's abloom and seems to smile.
I want to fly but where, how high?
If in barbed wire, things can bloom
Why couldn't I? I will not die!

THE BUTTERFLY

The last, the very last so richly, brightly, dazzlingly yellow.
Perhaps if the sun's tears would sing against a white stone . . .

Such, such a yellow is carried lightly 'way up high.
It went away I'm sure because it wished to kiss the world goodbye.

For seven weeks I've lived in here.
Penned up inside this ghetto
But I have found my people here.
The dandelions call to me
And the white chestnut candles in the court.
Only I never saw another butterfly.
That butterfly was the last one.
Butterflies don't live in here.

In the Ghetto.

The poor thing stands there vainly.
Vainly he strains his voice.
Perhaps he'll die. Then can you say
How beautiful is the world today?

I wish I were a little bird
Up in the bright blue sky
That sings and flies just where he will
And no one asks him why.

CHILDREN OF IZIEU

In France in 1941 Jewish children were being hidden in various homes by organizations for the rescue of the children. At the end of 1942 when the free part of France was occupied, Mrs. Zlatin moved forty-four of the children in hiding to a summer camp in the town of Izieu. Izieu, located in the Rhone Valley, in the proximity of Lyon was supposedly a safer zone.

One of the children in that camp was Hans Ament. His father, Max Ament, from Austria, was deported and killed in Maidanek in 1943. His mother, Ernestina Reisz, from Hungary, was dying of tuberculosis in a sanatorium a few miles from Izieu when she received the following letter.

DEAR MUMMY: I received your letter which I liked (a lot). I didn't write to you because I didn't have a card but a boy gave me some. Here it doesn't snow much anymore. Are you almost cured and is it nice there? I eat well and I'm in good health. Is it cold where you are and write to me if it snows. When there was a lot of snow here we went sledding at some slopes. We had a lot of fun. Write Freddy that he must not write to me in German. At the children's camp there is a beautiful dog whose name is Tommy. The school is in the house and there is a teacher just to teach us school. She teaches very well. Next to the house there is a farm with four dogs. I kiss you a hundred million times.

Your son Jeannot who always thinks of you.

JEANNOT.

Look on the back.

KORCZAK AND HIS CHILDREN

Janusz Korczak, a writer and a doctor, whose real name was Henryk Goldzmidt, devoted his life since World War I to the upbringing of children in a Jewish orhanage in Warsaw. At the end of 1940, he and his children were all moved into the Ghetto where he continued his care and devotion. The group consisted of 192 children ranging in age from one to fifteen, and eight adults.

On July 18th, 1942. Korczak sent invitations to his friends and possible donors to attend a production of Rabindranath Tagore, "The Post Office"—a play that he was putting on with the children. The invitation was supplemented by the poem of the ghetto poet, Wladyslaw Szengel:

"Something more than the text—the mood."
"Something more than emotion—the experience."
"Something more than actors—the children."

The play is about a frail little Indian boy who was condemned to seclusion and inaction by ill health, and was put in an upstairs room. The leading role was played by the violinist Abrasha, age 13. When Korczak was asked later why he had chosen this particular play, he answered, "I would like my children to learn how to receive with dignity and peace the Angel of Death."

On the morning of August 5th Korczak was sitting at his desk trying to write. At 8:00 a.m., SS Obersturm-fuehrer Klostermayer, in charge of the morning's operation, stationed himself in front of the orphanage and blew his whistle twice. Soldiers who had reached their prearranged positions on schedule fanned out the entire length of the four streets, sealing the block to be evacuated.

When Korczak heard the two sharp blasts and saw the German sentry outside his window click his heels and snap to attention, he put down his pen. Obersturmfuehrer Klostermayer, accompanied by half a dozen Jewish policemen and three Ukranians carrying guns slug casually over their shoulders, marched into the courtyard. A squad leader bellowed, Alle Juden raus, alle Juden Hinunter."

Korczak quickly removed his green apron and hung it on a peg behind the door of his room. He rushed to open the front door, dressed in his old World War Polish Officers' uniform.

The nattily dressed SS officer and the old Jew in the faded uniform studied each other for a moment. "I have a request, said Korczak, speaking first. "You are an officer?" Klostermayer asked. "Yes, a major."

"What do you want then, Jewish Major?"

"I have been promised that I will lead my children, not one of your men," said Korczak. "The children will be frightened if it is done any other way. I am their guardian and they will follow me. If you don't trust me, my bald head is a good target."

Klostermayer smiled, "Very well, he said. "Permission granted. The main thing is to see that it all goes off smoothly. We will bring up at the sides and the rear, not the front.

Korczak went into the dining room where the children were finishing their breakfast of potato soup. Clapping his hands for attention, he apologized for interrupting their meal. "But, he explained, "we are going to the country sooner than I expected. We leave in fifteen minutes. Go to your lockers at once, put on your best clothes and pack a small bag or rucksack with your valuables. The younger children can bring a toy or two. Be outside in the courtyard promptly in ten minutes."

As the children went off to their lockers Abrasha stayed behind. "Is music allowed where we are going?" he asked. Korczak answered, "Music is allowed. Bring your violin."

Hanka Faynar arrived at the orphanage for her daily visit with her brother Nussen as the children began assembling in the courtyard. Nussen, wearing clean shorts and shirt, ran to her side. Excitedly he blurted out his good news. "We are going for a treat to the camp at Goclawek."

Hanka was a ghetto child, and she knew what the soldiers in the courtyard meant. She found Korczak in the middle of the courtyard busying himself with some of the younger children, buttoning the coat of one, tying up the package of another. She tugged on his jacket and pulled him to one side.

"Why did you tell Nussen and the others that they were going for a treat?" she asked. "You know that isn't the truth."

"The children don't need to know where they are going," Korczak said firmly. "They should sing and be happy. You must leave quickly. I don't want Nussen to see you crying."

Some of the younger children carried beach toys or sand pails. A few of the older children carried rucksacks slung over their shoulders with clothing, personal belongings, or books. Abrasha, carrying his precious violin, had struggled into the crowd to get a place next to Regina. Everyone was wearing a Jewish armband.

When Klostermayer saw Abrasha's violin case he asked him to play a tune while the children lined up. There was a string or two missing from his violin. He had only played a couple of minutes when Klostermayer said, "put that violin away, Jew boy. We leave now * * *"

Hanka Faynar, who was hidden in a doorway across the street, saw the group march from the courtyard. Korczak was at the head of the procession holding Nussen's hand and carrying his godchild, five-year old Romcia Stockman, who was crying. Musik was next to Korczak carrying the orphanage banner.

The banner was green, as dreamed of by little King Mat, a character from Korczak's own book, "King Mat the First." On the green background was a design of chestnut flowers, the symbol of eternal blossoming. On the reverse side of the banner was the blue star of David, against the background of purity-white.

To him the star of David was a symbol of temporary suffering and eternal night. It was a sign which stamped out tragedy and imprinted greatness and the pride of Judaism.

(During the description of the banner, two of the children enter and pick up the banner from the pile of toys and exit through the center aisle of the theatre.)

Mrs. Steffa was at the end of the line, which was surrounded on both sides by soldiers and policemen.

The group of orphans marched half a kilometer to the Catholic Church at All Saints Square, arriving there a little after 9:00 a.m. Thousands of other Jews who were to be evacuated that day had been gathered in the street.

"Thousands of people were in the crowd being marched by. The Ukrainians had whips and every few minutes the Germans would shout "Schnell" and the Ukrainians would begin to beat people. Some people tripped and fell and their luggage spilled open, tripping others. Those who fell were shot by the SS if they did not get up quickly enough. But Korczak's group seemed to be marching by itself! The SS were merely walking alongside.

It was getting hot: the weather at noon was a muggy 84 degrees. It must have been torture for the children to walk, trying to hurry, on the uneven cobblestones. By the time they reached the bridge with its seventy steep steps many must have been near the end of their strength. "The smaller children had to be shoved up the steps to the top. Below on Chlodna Street were hundreds of jeering Poles, yelling, "Good-bye Jews"! Many of the children fell or were pushed down the steps on the other side."

Korczak, exhausted and anguished, refused to be daunted. At the corner of Dzielna and Karmelicka he called Kloster-mayer to him and said, "We could save a lot of time by turning west here."

"Why?" asked the German.

"Because, the Jewish cemetery is less than three blocks away."

"It was hell, impossible to describe, just hell," said the Jewish policeman who had escorted the orphanage. At the railroad station, Klostermayer ordered another count of the children. Then their stars were snipped off and thrown into the center of the courtyard. It looked like a field of buttercups.

There were shouts from the SS. Whips snapped. The doors of the waiting freight cars were tugged open by the Jewish police. Korczak entered the freight car first, followed by the youngest children; Mrs. Stefa and the rest went into the next car. At 12:55 the train left on schedule for the extermination camp—Treblinka.

The exact date and manner of the death of Janusz Korczak and his orphans is not known.

But as General Hahn feared, Korczak became a martyr, one of the sparks which fired the revolt. "Remember Korczak's orphans" became a rallying cry; a spur to prod the remaining Jews in the ghetto who refused to believe that they, too, were doomed to extermination. Just two weeks after the orphanage was evacuated the first blow of the resistance movement was struck.

LETTER FROM RUSSIA

This letter was found by Major Vladimir Demidov in the small town of Byten in the Baranovichi "Ablast". It was written by twelve year old Junita to her father.

To Mr. VISHNER,
Orange, New Jersey, U.S.A.,
July 31, 1942.

DEAR FATHER: I say good-bye to you before dying. We very much want to live, but all is lost—they won't let us! I am so afraid of this death, because the small children are thrown alive into the graves. Good-bye forever. I kiss you over and over. A kiss from G.

Your I (ta).

DIARIES

Historian of Polish Jewry Emanuel Ringelblum wrote his memoirs in 1943 almost a year after the destruction of the ghetto. He hoped, no doubt, that it could be smuggled out to the leaders of the Polish underground movement and that it might influence them to help the survivors hiding in Polish homes.

On March 6, 1944, a Polish traitor led the Gestapo to the cellar in the home of Mieczyslaw Wolski, a worker, who had given shelter to Ringelblum, his wife, and 13 year old son, as well as 35 other Jews, who had survived the battle in the Warsaw Ghetto. All of them were shot in the courtyard of the Pawak Jail. His last memoir was miraculously saved.

I knew one twelve year old boy who jumped for joy as he approached the ghetto wall, over which he had to be lifted to the Aryan side. He cried: "I shall survive the war!"

I know of a little girl who was dying in a hospital far from her parents. She kept her identity concealed to the very end, even during the death throes, when a human being is normally freed of all earthly restraints and cannot control himself. But this child did not give herself away by a single word or the slightest sign. When a nurse standing by her side called her by her Jewish name, Dora, she did not respond. She remembered her training to answer only at the sound of her Aryan name, Eva. I remember a four year old boy whom I tried to trick with a question frequently used by agents of the police. Asked unexpectedly what his name used to be, he gave his Aryan name and stated he had never had any other.

I have heard the story of a four year old who won her return to the ghetto by virtual blackmail. After being away from her family for a long time, the child was seized with such homesickness that one day she threatened her foster parents that if they did not let her go back to her real parents, she would go to the Germans and tell them she came from the ghetto. The "blackmail" had the desired effect. Her parents had to take her back. Sometimes, unfortunately, Jewish children have been the victims of real blackmail. There are authenticated instances of children being kidnapped and held for ransom.

Once at the door of the Warsaw Ghetto, I saw a youngster of perhaps six years, all of whose smuggled goods the gendarmes had confiscated. The child was crying, but despite the lashes on his head and body, he returned to the checkpoint where his treasure had been taken from him.

Christian youngsters on the "other side" of the gate joyfully watched the cruel treatment of the Jewish boy by the Nazis. Their laughter encouraged the gendarmes to more zealous flogging of the unfortunate Jewish boy. He had against him the Nazi guards, the Polish police, the Christian crowd, and even the Jewish police, but he refused to give up and kept trying to retrieve the food he had purchased for his last pennies.

I knew a five year old orphan who had lost his parents during the "great action". He lived on the Aryan side, paying five zlotys for a night's lodging. This boy smuggled newspapers into the ghetto, making several zlotys profit per copy.

On August 12, 1942, I saw while walking along a street in Warsaw two carts loaded with the bodies of Jewish children. None of which appeared to be older than the age of two.

On the 19th of August, I saw a group of between 150 and 200 Jewish children. They were walking huddled together pressing against each other in terrible fright. Some were crying, others biting their fingers in terror. German guards walked alongside with their guns pointed at them.

At the corner of Okopowa Street, I saw a group of Jewish women waiting. As soon as the children came near, one of the women ran up to the German guards and began telling him something, pointing to one child in the group. The German shouted at her, pushed her back and then raised his rifle and shot her. The children began to cry louder but were hurried on towards the station.

What happened to them? The same that happened to those I saw a week before. They were killed.

I was walking towards the ghetto when all of a sudden I heard a terrible cry coming from a side street. A group of more than 100 Jewish children, boys and girls, of which the oldest could not have been more than eight or nine, was being driven through the street by about a dozen armed Germans. Some children were crying out: "Mother! Mother!". If they halted they were prodded on by rifle buts.

One child made a sign towards a window in Grodzka Street where a woman could be seen. The German guards immediately fired a shot at the window. The children were forced to walk on. I followed them part of the way towards the station and later was told that they were all packed into the wagon like herrings in a barrel so that many of them must have died before they reached the slaughter camp to which they were being taken.

In September of 1939, the Gestapo came to Lanzut to capture Jews on the streets. They were imprisoned for several months, then taken to the cemetery and shot.

I managed to leave Lanzut before the massacre. I hid in cornfields and potato patches during the day, or with a friendly peasant. I also was able to hide my sister's two children, a girl of seven and a boy of nine, in the stable of their former home. They were half-starved, so I stole vegetables for them from the fields. But in a few days someone denounced them to the Gestapo. They were seized and interrogated, in hopes they would reveal hideouts of other Jews. But the children endured their tormenting and betrayed no one.

As the children were led to the cemetery they were urged not to cry, for they would "go to heaven, and meet their mother, father and aunts." After the children had been shot the Gestapo took their bodies to the circus performing in Lanzut, to be eaten by the beasts.

NO MORE RAISINS, NO MORE ALMONDS

There are no raisins and no almonds
Your father's not trading, home not coming
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.

He has left us, gone away,
To the World's end, who can say—
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.

Owls are screeching, the wild wolves bay.
God will pity us, I pray.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.

He's standing somewhere keeping watch,
Almonds, raisins, oh so much
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.

There's no doubt that he will come
Back to you, my darling one.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.
Lu, Lu, Lu, my son.

"I rarely perform this song because it affects me too deeply and I find it difficult to control my voice. Ruth Rubin recounts its history in A Treasury of Jewish Folksong." Leah Rudnitzky, who was born in Lithuania in 1916, heard of a three year old child found alive after a massacare by the Nazi's of some 4,000 Jews in Ponar—she wrote this lullaby for the child, left fatherless and motherless—later Leah Rudnitsky herself "disappeared"—in Maidenek.

Poem by Hirsh Glick (1922-1944), music by Dmitri Pokrass. The song became the hymn of the United Partisan organization in 1943. It spread to all the camps in Eastern Europe and later to all Jewish communities the world over. It was translated into several languages. Today it is sung at memorial meetings for martyred Jews. Published by Yehude Ayzman in 1945.

PARTISAN SONG

(By Hirsh Glick)

Never say, This is the last road, the end of the way,
Though leaden skies now hide the light of day,
The hour we long for will at last appear,

Our tread will fall like thunder—we are here!
From the land of palms to the distant land of snow, We come with our sorrow and our woe,
Wherever a drop of our blood was shed,
There our courage will lift its head.
The morning sun again will gild our day,
The past will with the enemy fade away,
Yet should the sun delay, and spring be late,
This song for generations will reverberate.
This song is written not with ink, but blood,
It is not the song of a free bird in the wood,
This song a people sang between collapsing walls,
This song to future generations calls.
So never say, this is the last road we have gone,
This is the last time that the sun has shone,
The day will dawn, the sun will reappear,
Our tread will fall like thunder—we are here!

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair. I yield the floor and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. SPECTER. I will.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business with statements limited therein to 5 minutes.

SENATOR BOB DOLE: PROFILE IN COURAGE

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, 40 years ago a young American second lieutenant led a brave platoon of men into the teeth of enemy resistance on a remote mountainside in northern Italy. The date was April 14, 1945, to be exact—1 day in the long and costly campaign to liberate Italy. For one of our esteemed colleagues, however, that 1 day was to forever change the direction of his life. Of course, I am talking about our distinguished majority leader, Senator BOB DOLE, who was cut down by a burst of gunfire near the town of Castel D'Aiano on that April day 40 years ago. At the time, the young Mr. DOLE was a superb athlete, a hard-working student, and an ambitious Kansan who had his mind set on a career in medicine. After his terrible war trauma, however, the only relevant question was not whether he could become a doctor, but whether he would live. That is when those around him began to understand the kind of determination all of us have come to know as the hallmark of this great American.

Yes; he would live, and despite paralysis, he would walk again, a slow but steady journey that would take him from 39 months of hospitalization to a slot on the 1976 Presidential ticket with Gerald Ford, to the leadership of the greatest deliberative body on Earth, the U.S. Senate.

Our majority leader's courageous comeback from almost hopeless adversity has been an inspiration to millions of Americans and many others, especially the grateful citizens of Castel D'Aiano, whom Lieutenant DOLE helped free from the grasp of Nazi terror.

Mr. President, 2 weeks ago, I, along with Senators COCHRAN, PRESSLER, LAXALT, and MCCLURE, and with Joanne Coe, Secretary of the Senate, Howard Green, secretary to the Republican majority, and other Senate employees, had the privilege fo accompanying Senator DOLE to Europe on a four-nation visit to NATO allies. The trip ended in Rome where we were able to participate in a moving ceremony that marked the anniversary of that cruel day in the rugged Italian mountains four decades ago.

In recognition of BOB DOLE's personal sacrifice, the Italian Government presented him with a handsome silver commemorative plate; and the mayor of Castel D'Aiano delivered a special medal to his town's American war hero.

I do not mind telling this body that it was a special moment. Those of us who were present that day in Rome will never forget it.

In my view, the spirit of the ceremony in Rome symbolized not only an individual sacrifice, but also recognized the commitment to peace this country and its allies have held so sacred since the end of the last global war.

As President pro tempore, I believe it is fitting that this body pause to remember the sacrifice of BOB DOLE and to salute all those other brave soldiers who helped end the nightmare years on the European Continent.

ON THE DEATH OF MAYOR DOUGLAS J. MOORE OF MARION, AL

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise for a point of personal privilege. It is with great regret that I inform the U.S. Senate of the death of an individual whose life has epitomized the best in public service. Douglas J. Moore was the mayor of Marion, AL. He passed away this past Sunday. Marion, AL is not a large city but a typical city of Alabama. It has had its problems and will continue to have them. However, over the last two decades, leadership has brought that city through many periods of turmoil. The motivating leadership factor that has prevailed and produced the significant results has been the integrity of Doug Moore. One could not be around him and hear him discuss problems without sensing his deep commitment to integrity.

Honesty can quell strife, bring peace, and make one understand another's point of view. Honesty was the guiding force that made Doug Moore's public service so successful.

Douglas Moore was elected the mayor of Marion four times without opposition. I believe this fact speaks better than words can express the universal love that the people of Marion had for him.

He was not just a leader in Marion, but served with great distinction as president of the Alabama League of Municipalities in 1981. He was also chairman of the Alabama-Tombigbee Regional Planning Commission.

Each year he would come to Washington with city officials when the Alabama League of Municipalities made their annual trip to Washington. He generally brought one of his grandchildren with him and spent considerable time telling the grandchild about America and the historic sites in our Capital City.

I have said on occasions when a friend passed away that he will be indeed missed. Those words are strong, but not strong enough to express the void that has been left by the death of Douglas Moore. Most public servants are replaced with good men. I doubt if we will ever see a replacement for Douglas Moore, for he was truly a concerned and considerate public servant—indeed a man of unblemished integrity.

DEATH OF FORMER U.S. SENATOR SAM J. ERVIN OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is with sadness that I rise today to acknowledge the death of and pay tribute to one of the Senate's most distinguished former Members, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr. of North Carolina. To his lovely wife, Margaret; his two daughters, Leslie and Laura; and his son, Sam J. Ervin III; I extend my deepest sympathies.

Sam Ervin first came to the Senate in 1954, about 6 months before I was elected for my first term. During the entire time he served the people of North Carolina in this Chamber, I knew him as a man of great integrity, dedication, and courage. His death is a great loss not only for the people of North Carolina, who loved and admired him, but for our Nation as well.

Sam Ervin became a national figure during the Senate Watergate hearings in 1973 as chairman of the select committee designated to investigate the break-in of Democratic headquarters at the Watergate Hotel here in Washington.

He handled the hearings very ably and distinguished himself as a Constitutional scholar and a man dedicated to the fair administration of justice.

Mr. President, I knew Sam Ervin as a man devoted, above all else, to his country and its constitutional form of government. A graduate of the Harvard School of Law and the University of North Carolina, Senator Ervin developed a love of studying the Constitution and the history of our Government, which he carried with him into retirement from the Senate in December of 1974. He was recognized by Democrats and Republicans alike as one of the Senate's foremost constitutional experts and scholars. During his service in the Senate, Sam Ervin always subordinated his partisan beliefs to his respect and love for the U.S. Constitution. That steadfast belief in our system of Government earned him the admiration of us all.

Senator Ervin's entire career was dedicated to serving his State and Nation. He was a decorated veteran of World War I, where he served in France and earned the Distinguished Service Cross, the Silver Star, and two Purple Hearts for heroism as an enlisted man.

The Senator also served three terms in the North Carolina Assembly, and later was chosen for a seat on the State Supreme Court, where he served with distinction from 1948 to 1954.

After his election to the U.S. Senate, Sam Ervin continued to serve his State and Nation for 20 more years, until his retirement, when he returned to his home in Morganton, NC. I know my colleagues who were here during his Senate service join me in saying that it was a distinct privilege to serve with Sam Ervin.

However, Senator Ervin's retirement did not mean an end to his work. He became an author of critical acclaim, writing a book of amusing and entertaining anecdotes, entitled, "Humor of a Country Lawyer."

That was, perhaps, one of Sam Ervin's greatest talents. He could, with his marvelous sense of humor, make us see the best in ourselves, our neighbors, and our great Nation. His contributions were numerous, but we will always remember him as a decent, entertaining man, who used his skills as a great lawyer to serve his Nation and his fellow man. His death is a loss for all of us.

So that my colleagues can have even more information about his accomplishments and career, I ask unanimous consent that an article in the April 23, 1985, edition of the Charlotte Observer be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EX-SENATOR ERVIN DIES AT 88

(By Ken Eudy)

Former U.S. Senator Sam Ervin Jr., whose devotion to the Constitution helped drive an American president from office, died Tuesday of respiratory failure at Bowman Gray Medical Center in Winston-Salem.

Ervin, who was 88, sprang to the American consciousness in 1973 when he was appointed chairman of the Senate Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, known as the Watergate Committee.

During committee hearings televised live nationwide, Ervin became known as "Senator Sam." Eyebrows aflutter, jowls quivering and tongue stammering in a syrupy Southern drawl, Ervin liked to call himself "just a good ol' country lawyer." But Ervin was a North Carolina-born, Harvard-educated lawyer who quoted Shakespeare, the Bible and the Constitution with ease. He was recognized as the Senate's greatest constitutional authority of his generation.

The same understanding of the Constitution that led Democrat Ervin to oppose Republican President Richard Nixon during Watergate compelled him to oppose civil rights legislation, the Equal Rights Amendment and school busing to achieve integration.

Ervin's Watergate hearings set the stage for Nixon's resignation in August 1974, four months before Ervin ended a 10-year Senate career and retired to his home in Morganton.

Ervin died about 4:15 p.m., said Roger Rollman, a hospital spokesman. "The cause of death was attributed by his doctors to respiratory failure which developed during the day," Rollman said. "The kidney failure for which Mr. Ervin was admitted to the center was a significant contributing factor in the death."

Ervin was moved to Bowman Gray on Monday after suffering acute renal failure and doctors determined he needed more specialized treatment than was available at Grace Hospital in Morganton, said Mary McBryde, his secretary.

Ervin had been a patient at Grace Hospital for more than three weeks prior to his move to Winston-Salem. He suffered from a variety of ailments during that time, and at one point was plagued by a high fever.

Ervin's fame came late in his political career. Most of his Senate tenure was spent in the shadow of other Southern Democrats such as Richard Russell of Georgia, Harry Byrd, Sr. of Virginia and John Stennis of Mississippi. Later, other younger southern senators such as Russell Long of Louisiana and Herman Talmadge of Georgia eclipsed Ervin in senatorial influence.

In fact, Ervin never chaired a major committee until 1972, when he was named chairman of the Select Governmental Operations Committee.

Little major legislation bears his name. And one year, Ervin was on the losing side of Senate votes more often than any other Democratic senator.

Like other Southern senators, Ervin opposed almost every civil rights bill. Civil rights legislation, Ervin wrote in his 1984 autobiography, "is in essence thought-control legislation."

"I opposed civil rights bills presented to the Senate during my service because I entertained the abiding convictions that some of them were unnecessary, some of them were tyrannical and some of them were unconstitutional," he wrote.

When the Senate passed the Equal Rights Amendment in 1972, Ervin told his colleagues on the Senate floor, "It is almost impossible to conceive the state of legal chaos which will ensue if this amendment is ratified by the states. It will invalidate thousands of laws which make legal distinctions between men and women, many of which are based upon . . . a recognition of the fact that God did create two sexes."

Ervin's primary national identity—as an obstructionist of civil rights legislation—changed in early 1973, when he was appointed chairman of the committee to investigate the Watergate break-in.

Ervin's respect for the Constitution, which led to his Watergate assignment, came from his lawyer father, Sam Ervin Sr., and his mother, Laura Theresa Powe.

His parents, said Ervin, imbued him with what he once called a "Scotch-Irish Presbyterian conscience."

"A Scotch-Irish Presbyterian conscience will not keep one from sinning, but it will keep him from enjoying his sin. Moreover, it commands him to do what it tells him is right, and smites him unmercifully if he does not obey.

"Consequently, the victim of a Scotch-Irish Presbyterian conscience has the trait that his supporters praise as firmness and his adversaries condemn as obstinacy."

One of 10 brothers and sisters, Ervin graduated in 1917 from UNC, where he was senior class president.

After graduation, Ervin enlisted in the Army and was twice wounded in World War I. Ervin won the Silver Star and the Distinguished Service Cross, and twice was commended for bravery.

When he returned to North Carolina in 1919, he passed the state bar examination before enrolling in Harvard Law School.

A year after graduating from Harvard, Ervin was elected to the first of three terms in the N.C. House.

While in the House, that Scotch-Irish Presbyterian conscience led Ervin to fight the anti-Darwinism that was sweeping the South in 1925.

The N.C. House was debating a bill that would forbid the teaching of evolution in public schools. Ervin, a 29-year-old House member, argued against the bill, saying, "I don't see but one good feature in this thing, and that is that it will gratify the monkeys to know they are absolved from all responsibility for the conduct of the human race."

The N.C. House killed the anti-Darwinism bill.

From 1935 until 1937, Ervin served as a Burke County criminal court judge, and from 1937 until 1943, Ervin was a superior court judge.

Ervin served one year in the U.S. House in 1946 upon the suicide of his younger brother, Joe Ervin, who suffered from a bone disease.

In 1948, Ervin was appointed an associate justice of the N.C. Supreme Court. He might have ended his public career as its chief justice but for the 1954 death of U.S. Sen. Clyde Hoey.

Gov. William Umstead, a college friend of Ervin, appointed him to fill the seat, and Ervin was sworn in by then-Vice President Richard Nixon. He was elected on his own later that year, and often was returned to the Senate without opposition.

Early in Ervin's Senate career, he again opposed a popular political cause: McCarthyism.

Vice President Nixon appointed Ervin in 1954 to a committee to determine whether Sen. Joe McCarthy had engaged in conduct unbecoming a senator in his attempts to uncover communists in the federal government.

During the hearings, McCarthy attacked Ervin and two other committee Democrats as "unwitting handmaidens" of the communists.

Ervin took to the Senate floor to respond. "The issue before the American people is simply this: Does the Senate of the United States have enough manhood to stand up to Sen. McCarthy? . . . The honor of the Senate is in our keeping. I pray that senators will not soil it by permitting Sen.

McCarthy to go unwhipped of senatorial justice."

Two weeks later, the Senate censured McCarthy.

In the intervening years, Ervin became known as the Senate's expert on the Constitution, but he rarely made the national spotlight.

That changed in 1973, when Senator Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., picked Ervin to head a committee to investigate the Watergate break-in because, as a former judge, Ervin had more judicial experience than any senator. Also, Mansfield said, Ervin was the lest partisan Senate Democrat and at 76 harbored no presidential ambitions.

"Sen. Ervin was the only man we could have picked on either side of the aisle who'd have had the respect of the Senate as a whole," Mansfield said then.

During those hearings, which opened May 17, 1973, former White House counsel John Dean revealed that Nixon had been told of the Watergate burglary days after it occurred and that Nixon had participated in the cover-up. White House aide Alexander Butterfield disclosed the existence of a White House taping system with which Nixon taped private conversations.

The Watergate Committee heard a parade of witnesses describe what came to be known as "dirty tricks"—tactics designed to help Nixon win reelection in 1972 and punish his political enemies.

While Ervin's committee hearings didn't establish that Nixon had prior knowledge of the Watergate break-in, the daily televised hearings focused public attention on alleged misdeeds of the Nixon administration. Eventually the Supreme Court ordered Nixon to surrender tapes that implicated him in the Watergate cover-up.

Ervin defended the committee from charges by Republicans that he had created the constitutional crisis forcing Nixon from office. "As a general rule, people are the authors of their own misfortunes. And President Nixon is the sole author of his own misfortune in this case," Ervin said. "He had too much thirst for political power and not enough scruples about how political power's obtained."

Ervin chose to retire in 1974 rather than seek reelection. He had been active in the years since his retirement, however, practicing law in Morganton and writing three books: "The Whole Truth: The Watergate Conspiracy," "Humor of a Country Lawyer" and "Preserving the Constitution: The Autobiography of Senator Sam Ervin."

Ervin had become such a national celebrity, American Express used him in a television commercial promoting its credit card.

Ervin is survived by his wife, Margaret; a son, U.S. Appeals Court Judge Sam Ervin III of Morganton; and two daughters, Margaret Hansler of Pennington, NJ, and Laura Smith of Morganton.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, why are we memorializing the most massive and darkest example of man's inhumanity to man? Why?

The reason is to seek to prevent such inhumanity occurring again—and to be alert to the need to snuff out those same dreadful instincts that turned human beings like you and me into beasts.

Let us remember, too, Dante's words so often quoted by our murdered colleague, Bob Kennedy, "He who sees, stands by and does nothing, as evil is performed, is just as guilty as he who performs it."

Here we must remember how we of the so-called civilized world stood by as millions of Jews and Gentiles and gypsies were murdered.

Examples?

We returned the passenger vessel St. Louis, with its load of 900 Jews back to Bremen and the concentration camps of Europe.

We declined to change our immigration laws one jot.

Even then, we declined to take in most of those unfortunate human beings who were clamoring at our consulates for visas. In fact in 1944, only 9 percent of our visa allotment was even used.

And, as reads our War Department telegram presently exhibited at Vad Yashem, we even refused to bomb the rail line between Kosice and Presov over which the Nazi victims were transported to Auschwitz.

We did all too little 40 years ago. What can we do now?

One thing we in the Senate can do is to ratify the Genocide Convention—and this I look forward to our soon doing in as unhampered a form as possible. And here I have a personal interest, too, as its ratification would have given much satisfaction to my father, Herbert Pell, who was the American representative to the United Nations War Crimes Commission and who played such a role in having genocide considered a war crime by our Government just 40 years ago this spring.

More important, let us remember that the seeds of evil are always present, but their growth can be halted by each of us not standing by when we see the start of evil. Ceremonies of remembrance like this and by the actions, activities, and advice of the Holocaust Commission.

In this regard, I would hope that President Reagan might heed our plea that he cancel his visit to the Bitburg cemetery.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point the excellent statement of William J. vanden Heuvel, an old friend, who was formerly the Deputy Permanent Representative of the United States to the United Nations.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THERE CAN BE NO RECONCILIATION WITH NAZISM

(William J. vanden Heuvel [1])

President Reagan's state visit to the Federal Republic of Germany is appropriate and important. It is made in a spirit of reconciliation, commemorating the 40th Anniversary of the end of the Second World War in which our nations were enemies. It is a difficult trip because the memories of the Nazi period are a continuing, painful part of our lives. This difficulty has been compounded by the insensitivity of the proposal that the President visit the Bitburg cemetery, the final resting place of 2216 German soldiers who died in the desperate effort to resist the Allied armies in the Battle of the Bulge. The massacre of American prisoners at Malmedy by the Nazis during the battle is part of the historical shadow over the proposed visit.

Many of the tombstones marking the identity of the German soldiers buried in Bitburg carefully note their identity as members of the SS, the "elite Storm Troopers" of the Third Reich. It is not possible to visit such a cemetery without acknowledging the cause these soldiers served The SS built Buchenwald. Its officers administered Dachau. Its members murdered millions of Jews in the most brutal genocide of modern history. Eichman was an SS colonel. There can be no reconciliation with what these men represented.

The President's advisors apparently thought American soldiers were buried alongside the Germans in Bitburg. Presumably the President would then have an occasion to reflect on the irony and waste of war. But there are no Americans buried in Bitburg. That error alone should cause the President to cancel his planned stop. Chancellor Kohl continues to urge President Reagan to visit Bitburg, citing as a precedent the ceremony of reconciliation at Verdun presided over by President Mitterand and the Chancellor just months ago. But Verdun is in France, not Germany; and it was the site of the most brutal battle of World War I, not World War II; and French and German soldiers are buried there. Verdun is truly the symbol of the insanity of war. Over three million men were killed in that battle, destroying a generation of sons for both France and Germany. Most of those nameless victims are buried in mass graves. In the context of that meaning, it is altogether appropriate that the President of France and the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of Germany should stand together and weep in remembrance.

The Bitburg cemetery is a reminder of something else. The planners of the Presidential visit do not understand the anguish of the protest if they think they can balance the itinerary by adding a synagogue or restoring Dachau to the tour. President Reagan cannot go to Bitburg and honor those who murdered at Malmedy, who constructed and administered the concentration camps and spent years of their lives as part of a force that systematically carried out a genocide, a wound that can never heal.

The original purpose of the President's visit remains urgent, namely to honor the new Germany which has a respected and powerful place among the Western democracies. But the symbol of our reconciliation with Germany and its remarkable achievements is not the cemetery at Bitburg. It is the grave of Konrad Adenauer who resisted Hitler and everything the Nazis stood for and who survived to lead his country as Chancellor out of its murderous nightmare. It could also be the tomb of Ernst Reuter, another hero of the Resistance to the Nazis, the Mayor of West Berlin who stood with the Americans during the airlift of 1948 when the Soviet despotism tried to intimidate the possibilities of freedom. A tribute to Ernst Reuter and the people of West Berlin would give the President an opportunity to point across the Wall to the leaders of East Germany who continue the crime of the Nazis by refusing to acknowledge the Holocaust and who permitted a ceremony last week commemorating Buchenwald without even mentioning the thousands of Jews who were murdered there.

Chancellor Kohl should have insisted on the remembrance of the Holocaust as part of the President's trip to remind the world that the Nazis were mortal enemies of German democracy. The message then would be clear: it is the responsibility of all of us as the enduring monument to the Holocaust to pledge anew that we will not forget the terrible sacrifice of its victims. Arthur Koestler once suggested that each of us each day should take time for remembrance of the victims of Dachau, Buchenwald and the other Nazi horrors. His thesis was that in not forgetting, we could not permit the repetition of such cruelty. Such remembrance would also make clear that there can never be a reconciliation with the Germany of Hitler and Nazism. Our reconciliation is with the Germany of Adenauer, Reuter, Brandt, Schmidt and Kohl. The President of the United States is right in honoring them and the Federal Republic. It is not in human power to forgive the Nazis for what they did. We can only express our grateful admiration that a new Germany has emerged, a Germany of democratic commitment, a Germany as determined as we are to prevent Nazism from ever again gaining political power.

THANK YOU, ONCE AGAIN, SECRETARIES

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this is Professional Secretaries Week. Last year at this time, I took to the floor to pay tribute to the secretaries in my office. Since that time, much has changed. Vicki Baer, who was then and remains my personal secretary, has married, and we all now know and love her as Vicki Dodson. Her husband, Rick Dodson, is a lighting technician for NBC News. He may be seen frequently in the halls of the Capitol, and occasionally about my office, visiting his dear bride on a spare moment.

Another welcome change is the improvement in the health of Kelley Prunesti. We are glad to have her back this year.

One other notable turn is the addition of Ms. Mary Stealey to the staff. Mary replaced Fran Cochran, who has joined the ranks of the happily retired.

Yet, Mr. President, despite these changes, there is one constant: my gratitude to Vicki Dodson, Julie Smith, Kelley Prunesti, Emily Canvanagh, and Mary Stealey. They keep my office running. At all hours of the day and night, and even on weekends, they have worked tirelessly and, all too often, thanklessly. It is, alas, far too easy to forget how much we owe them.

I make amends now by offering these thanks. My appreciation and that of the rest of my staff to Vicki, Julie, Kelley, Emily, and Mary. What would we do without them?

DRUG ABUSE IN WESTERN EUROPE

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, we Americans are not alone in our problems of drug abuse. As we join our allies in the battle against this devastating international affliction, we discover more and more that it is a problem of growing significance all over the Western World.

It is the case with our Nation's oldest friend, for example. In France, 12 years ago, when the fabled "French Connection" was broken, drug addiction was rare in this nation. Now, it seems, the drug problem has returned to France, with a vengeance.

From solvents, to cocaine, to heroin, French citizens of all ages are consuming drugs at an alarming rate. It is estimated that the youth of this nation, finding illicit narcotics now readily available, are beginning to abuse drugs at 11 years of age, and this is the case at every level of society. Reports indicate that the decreasing costs of drugs—for example, one gram of cocaine costs 1,000 French francs, approximately $100—due to their increasing supply, and this situation makes their purchase that much more attractive to the general population. Latest estimates show that there are an estimated 200,000 drug abusers in France, which relative to the entire population of this nation, represents a remarkable figure. The problem is acknowledged as so serious in France that both the Federal and local governments are making it a priority, as indicated by recent efforts on the parts of both levels of government to create the organizational structure necessary to deal with every aspect of this problem.

Latest statistics all over Western Europe are equally disturbing: there are now an estimated 40,000 drug abusers in Great Britain; 6,000 in Ireland; and 250,000 in Italy. And in Italy, for example, a nation which reported no deaths caused by drugs before the mid-1970's, last year reported 257 deaths due to drug addiction.

From Dublin to Rome, the supplies of heroin and cocaine are seemingly limitless, and even though European police make more arrests and intercept more drug shipments every year, the mounting statistics reflect the growing problem.

It is felt by European populations that the most disturbing side effect of this situation is the paralyzing problem of crime. This is a new phenomenon in European cities, and a trend law enforcement officials are experiencing difficulty in stemming. Reports from Spanish police authorities, for example, indicate that 75 percent of their increasing rate of criminal activity is drug related.

The battle against drugs has, indeed, recommenced in force in Western Europe. Individual police forces in these newly beleagured nations report soaring numbers of arrests and seizures, and international cooperation is responsible in large part for many of the successes of European law enforcement officials.

We in the United States have fought the war against drug abuse relatively alone for a long time, and we have much information we would be only too happy to share with our friends across the sea. We have succeeded in many of our efforts, both public and private, and we have been unsuccessful in others. Regardless, we will capitalize on our successes, and learn from our failures, until we have achieved the eradication of drug abuse in our Nation. And part of our efforts will now include offering whatever assistance we can to our allies in Western Europe, as we now fight this war together.

PRIDE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise today to acknowledge the unique abilities of eight citizens of New Jersey who have provided outstanding examples of private initiative and creative ideas to address the critical issues facing New Jersey today. I take great pride in joining with New Jersey Monthly in saluting this years recipients of the New Jersey Pride Awards. These dedicated citizens exemplify the pride that New Jerseyans feel about our home State.

I would like to commend the following New Jerseyans for their hard work and dedication in their respective fields:

In the arts, Lynne Kramer of Ridgewood who founded and directs Project Impact which offers cultural programs to 63 school districts throughout the State;

In economic development, Robert Ferguson, Jr. of Essex Falls who chaired the Governor's Management Improvement Program and developed recommendations to save the State millions of dollars;

In education, Edward E. Barr of Englewood, former chairman of the State's Board of Higher Education, who has been a leader in improving academic quality in New Jersey's State and county colleges;

In health, Kate Luscombe of Belmar, founder of PRIDE—Parents Resolving Infant Death Experience—at Jersey Shore Medical Center and an ardent speaker on public awareness on how to handle parents when crisis occurs;

In social services, Kathleen DiChiara of Summit who organized the Community Food Bank of New Jersey, a food program to feed the hungry by getting large corporations to donate "seconds" and truckers to deliver the donations;

In sports and recreation, Jon F. Hanson of Far Hills, chairman of the New Jersey Sports and Exposition Authority, who developed the Meadowlands and was instrumental in negotiations that brought the Devils, the Generals, the Jets, and a CART Grand Prix to New Jersey;

In community development, Joan Quigley of Jersey City who initiated the Jersey Journal "Women of Achievement" awards in 1963 and organized the "Save Our Boulevard" and the "Save Our Courthouse" committees in Jersey City; and in,

Energy and environment, David Moore of Frenchtown, executive director of the New Jersey Conservation Foundation, a tireless leader in protecting New Jersey's natural resources.

Along with these first recipients of New Jersey Pride Awards are two other outstanding citizens who received honorable mention from the committee: Harriet Bryan of Princeton, who has devoted herself to "dignified and affordable" housing for seniors; and Richard Herring of Basking Ridge, who is a major contributor in the field of communications for the deaf.

All of these individuals deserve the recognition and gratitude of the people of New Jersey.

Mr. President, New Jersey is indeed blessed to have such outstanding and dedicated citizens as these 10 individuals. I am proud to serve them as their Senator and I ask that my colleagues join in appreciation of their efforts. On behalf of the people of New Jersey, I offer my sincere thanks to the 1985 Pride of New Jersey Award winners.

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF TITLE I/CHAPTER I

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, 20 years ago today, President Lyndon Johnson signed into law title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, a central component of the war on poverty. Having grown up in rather humble surroundings in central Texas, Johnson often attributed his success to the education he received in a one-room school house. "As the son of a tenant farmer," said Johnson, "I know that education is the only valid passport from poverty."

Looking back over the past 20 years should provide us with a sense of satisfaction. By nearly any standard, the title I/chapter I program has been a success in improving the achievement of educationally disadvantaged youth. While the evaluation of a program as complex as this is bound to tax the ingenuity of the best researcher, the accumulated evidence suggests that compensatory education programs have had both short- and long-term positive effects on low-achieving youth.

Some of the most compelling evidence comes from the National Assessment of Educational Progress [NAEP], a congressionally-mandated study of basic educational skills. Three national assessments have been conducted and fully analyzed: 1970-71, 1974-75, and 1979-80. Students with varying histories of educational achievement have been contrasted with respect to their NAEP performance, with the results indicating very clearly that students in the lowest achievement groups have demonstrated the greatest gains in performance between 1971 and 1980. Put differently, educationally disadvantaged students, those specifically targeted by title I/chapter I, have shown the greatest improvement in those basic skills measured by the NAEP. Furthermore, those schools most likely to receive Federal compensatory education funds, disadvantaged urban and rural schools, have shown the greatest improvement over the 10 years covered by the national assessments. According to Roy Forbes, former director of the NAEP:

"Across the board, the data show that the greatest gains were found for the lowest performers, those Title I was designed to serve."

In short, title I/chapter I works. Even former Secretary of Education Terrel Bell admitted during testimony in 1981 that these programs have proven successful.

Further evidence offering support for title I/chapter I programs comes from a series of studies evaluating the effects of early childhood education programs on later academic performance. One of the best known of these programs, the Perry Preschool Project, has demonstrated long-term positive changes for participants in the areas of school achievement, graduation rates and scores on functional competence tests, criminal arrest rates, employment rates, and welfare participation. The careful evaluation of this project, documented in a book titled "Changed Lives," details the potential value of a thoughtfully carried out program of early childhood education for disadvantaged youth.

In spite of the success of the title I/chapter I program, recent years have witnessed a change in political climate with respect to the Federal role in education. This new climate has necessitated a strong defense on the part of supporters of the title I program to secure its future. In 1981 the administration attempted to replace title I with a noncategorical block grant. Instead, Congress responded with its own alternative, the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act, under which title I became chapter I. Unfortunately, this legislative maneuver included several changes which have, in my estimation, substantially weakened the original legislation. Reductions in State administration funds for the program, along with reduced State monitoring requirements, appear to substantially cut back State oversight activities. A 1984 study by the Children's Defense Fund indicates that 25 States have either decreased or halted altogether oversight visits to chapter I program sites. The same study notes that the elimination of a requirement mandating parent advisory councils has resulted in a significant decrease in parental involvement in these programs. This result should be disturbing to an administration which has expressed such a strong concern for parental involvement in education.

Congress has also repeatedly been put in the position of fending off administration proposals to dramatically slash chapter I funding. For example, the President proposed cutting chapter I funding by roughly one-third for fiscal year 1982 and fiscal year 1983. Congress rejected this request but, unfortunately, funding levels have been severely eroded by inflation. Chapter I funding during the present fiscal year represents a 19.2-percent reduction, in constant dollars, from the fiscal year 1980 level. This funding erosion has not resulted in a reduction in the type or quality of services. Rather it has had the unfortunate consequence of reducing the number of children being served by between 500,000 and 700,000. In considering these figures, one should keep in mind that only about 45 percent of all chapter I eligible children are currently being served by the program. Once again, the President is asking us to allow inflation to eat away at a program of proven value, to remove even more children from this program.

The time has come to bring a halt to the whittling away of this most important and successful program. President Johnson was absolutely correct when he identified education as an individual's best ticket out of poverty. By what stretch of the imagination does it make sense to cut the funding of a program serving the educationally disadvantaged which has been widely acknowledged, even by administration officials, to be extremely effective? Logic would seem to dictate that we invest further in cost-effective programs such as chapter I.

On this 20th anniversary of title I/chapter I, I would like to recognize the dedication and hard work of the teachers and program administrators who have made the program a success, who have made an important difference in the lives of so many children. Their commitment and their belief in children who once were written off has changed the future of many of these children. I would also like to commend my colleagues in the Senate and the House who have come to the defense of this program year after year, and request that we join together again this year as we shape the budget and oppose any further cuts to chapter I.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 12 noon, a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 67. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that a uniform State act should be developed and adopted which provides grandparents with adequate rights to petition State courts for privileges to visit their grandchildren following the dissolution (because of divorce, separation, or death) of the marriage of such grandchildren's parents, and for other purposes.

HOUSE MEASURES REFERRED

The following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

H. Con. Res. 67. Concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that a uniform State act should be developed and adopted which provides grandparents with adequate rights to petition State courts for privileges to visit their grandchildren following the dissolution (because of divorce, separation, or death) of the marriage of such grandchildren's parents, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. MATHIAS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, without amendment:

S. 998. An original bill to require the imposition of sanctions against the Government of South Africa if, within 2 years, significant progress has not been made toward ending its policy of apartheid, and for other purposes (with additional views) (Rept. No. 99-37).

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

William Emerson Brock III, of Tennessee, to be Secretary of Labor.

(The above nomination was reported from the Committee on Labor and Human Resources with the recommendation that it be confirmed, subject to the nominee's commitment to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.)

By Mr. GOLDWATER, from the Committee on Armed Services:

The following-named officer to be placed on the retired list in the grade indicated under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 1370.

To be vice admiral

Vice Adm. "M" Staser Holcomb, 561-54-9492/1310, U.S. Navy.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. DOLE (for himself, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. QUAYLE, and Mr. BENTSEN):

S. 984. A bill to provide two additional members of the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 985. A bill to protect the rights of victims of child abuse; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BOREN (for himself, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. FORD, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. GORE, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. ROCKEFELLER):

S. 986. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to disallow any deduction for advertising or other promotion expenses with respect to arms sales; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 987. A bill to recognize the organization known as the Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War 1861-65; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WALLOP:

S. 988. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to prohibit the Secretary of Health and Human Services from requiring certain physician certifications relating to inpatient hospital services, and to allow physicians to charge Medicare beneficiaries without regard to the fee freeze if the patient chooses to pay the physician from private sources; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 989. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to allow physicians to charge Medicare beneficiaries without regard to the fee freeze if the patient chooses to pay the physician from private sources; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. GORTON, and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 990. A bill to consolidate and authorize program support and certain ocean and coastal programs and functions of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the Department of Commerce; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. DANFORTH (for himself, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. GORTON and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 991. A bill to provide authorization of appropriations for certain fisheries activities; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. ROTH and Mr. CHILES) (by request):

S. 992. A bill to discontinue or amend certain requirements for agency reports to Congress; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 993. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow a credit for the occupational training of displaced homemakers; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S. 994. A bill to facilitate the national distribution and utilization of coal; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. LUGAR (for himself, Mr. MATHIAS and Mr. DOLE):

S. 995. A bill to express the opposition of the United States to the apartheid policies of the Government of South Africa and to encourage South Africa to abandon such policies; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. CHILES:

S. 996. A bill to amend Public Law 96-350 to further define the customs waters for the purposes of certain drug offenses; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S. 997. A bill to improve the operation of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve and to authorize emergency financial assistance during an oil supply disruption; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S. 998. An original bill to require the imposition of economic sanctions against the Government of South Africa if, within 2 years, significant progress has not been made toward ending its policy of apartheid, and for other purposes; from the Committee on Foreign Relations; placed on the calendar.

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S.J. Res. 121. Joint resolution to designate June 15, 1985 as "National History Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S.J. Res. 122. Joint resolution to authorize the President to proclaim the last Friday of April each year as "National Arbor Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. NUNN, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. WILSON):

S.J. Res. 123. A joint resolution to designate Dr. Jonas Salk Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S. Con. Res. 44. Concurrent resolution relating to a permanent site for the Olympic Games; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 984. A bill to provide for two additional members of the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission; to the Committee on Finance.

ADDITIONAL MEMBERS FOR THE PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT ASSESSMENT COMMISSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the bill which we are introducing today expands the membership of the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission by two, from 15 members to 17.

COMMISSION BACKGROUND

The 1983 Social Security amendments created a new hospital reimbursement system for Medicare known as the prospective payment system. This new system was designed to revolutionalize the way we pay hospitals, moving away from the old retrospective cost based system to a new system of prospectively determined rates.

As with any new program, there were inevitably going to be difficulties with implementation intensified by the complexities of this new system. Recognizing this, the Congress established the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission to assist it in its work of reviewing the program and making sure the system is kept up to date.

COMMISSION RESPONSIBILITIES

As originally proposed, the Commission was given the responsibility of making recommendations to the Secretary on the appropriate percentage change in payment rates for hospitals under the system. In addition, the Commission is expected to assist the Secretary in evaluating the need to update existing diagnosis-related groups, establishing new diagnosis-related groups, and making recommendations on a range of other issues that would be involved in assuring that this new payment system is adequate to assure the delivery of safe, efficacious, and cost effective care.

The Commission is currently made up of 15 members whose terms are staggered so as to provide for an orderly changeover of the members over the years to come. Because of the importance of the work of the Commission, the Director of the Office of Technology Assessment was directed to seek nominations for appointment to the Commission from a wide range of groups so as to assure that the membership provided expertise and experience in all aspects of the provision and financing of health services. Obviously because of the limits on the size of the Commission, not all possible interests could be represented. This limitation will be dealt with in part with new appointments to the Commission over the years which are made when the current members' terms expire. However, there are two areas in particular which I believe need immediate attention: Rural hospitals and nursing services. I should also note that other Senators believe that input from the business community is also missing and should be accommodated through changes in the membership of the Commission.

Rural hospitals, while similar to all hospitals in many respects, have some very special needs, in part because of the small volume of patients many of them admit. Though they represent a relatively small percentage of total Medicare revenues, they are a critical source of care for those living in rural areas. An understanding of their problems, which will result in part from a representative being part of the Commission's deliberations, will be necessary to enable us to make appropriate adjustments and modifications in the payment system to accommodate the needs of these institutions where appropriate.

With respect to nursing services, it goes without saying that the input of nursing will be essential in any attempt to make the payment system relevant to the care being provided in hospitals. Nurses remain a primary source of direct patient care in hospitals and, on average, spend more time than any other group with hospital inpatients.

It is true that due to the staggering of terms of appointment there are scheduled to be three vacancies on the Commission this year, however, two of the individuals whose terms expire hold important subcommittee chairmanships and it is hoped by many that they will stay through this formative period. As a result, it is not likely that many new members will be appointed this year. It is for this reason, in part, that we recommend expanding the Commission at this time. In addition, we believe the amount and complexity of the work assigned to the Commission to be sufficient as to warrant some expansion.

However. notwithstanding our desire to expand the Commission to meet these needs it is not our intention, nor do we believe it would be appropriate in the future, to automatically expand the Commission to accommodate specific interests. The staggering of the terms of appointment and this small increase in the size of the Commission, should be adequate to meet future needs.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, as I indicated at the outset, the work of the Propac will be critical to our efforts to keep the payment system up to date, and in my view, input from the rural hospital community and from the nursing community is absolutely critical to the Commission's deliberations.

There are a great many interests that should appropriately be represented on the Commission. For example, the manufacturers of the equipment utilized by hospitals; hospital financial managers; health care economists; consumers; insurers; hospital employee groups; and of course, hospitals themselves. The modest increase in the size of Propac that we suggest in this legislation will help to allow for an appropriate broadening of the representation on the Commission.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 984

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 1886(e)(6)(A) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "15 individuals" and inserting in lieu thereof "17 individuals".

(b) The Director of the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment shall appoint the two additional members of the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission, as required by the amendment made by subsection (a), no later than 60 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, for terms of three years.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President. I join my colleague from Kansas [Mr. DOLE] in introducing this amendment to expand the membership of the Medicare Prospective Payment Assessment Commission by two positions. The Commission, authorized by the Social Security Amendments of 1983, was designated to make recommendations to the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the Congress on the annual increase in Medicare payments for hospital discharges and what adjustments, if any, should be made in prices for treatments or procedures by the Medicare Program to accommodate changes in medical practice and technology.

The 15 members of the Commission were chosen last year by the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment [OTA]. The OTA made these appointments without sufficient consultation with the congressional policymakers who originated the Commission. I know Senator DOLE, as well as myself and others, were concerned about the selection process of the Commission and have expressed these feelings publicly on other occasions. I am confident in the future that the selection process to fill expired terms in the Commission will be conducted with greater guidance from Congress.

Stuart Altman, the Commission's Chairman, was an excellent choice and the Commission clearly includes other qualified individuals. The Commission, nevertheless, does not have representatives from important sectors such as the business community, nursing, or rural health care. Expanding the Commission at this time would allow the reappointment of certain members whose 1 year terms expire but hold critical the subcommittee positions on the Commission, while providing positions for new appointments from business, nursing and rural health care.

The expansion of the Commission is appropriate because the body is still in its formative stages and needs to retain certain talent critical to its early work as well as to accommodate other prospectives. The amendment is not meant to set a precedent for the expansion of the Commission to meet the needs of every interest group, but only to assure the Commission will be appropriately representative of the areas affected by its work.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join our distinguished majority leader in introducing S. 984, a bill to strengthen the Medicare Prospective Payment Assessment Commission by establishing seats for two additional commissioners.

This Commission—usually referred to as Propac—was established as part of the 1983 prospective payment legislation to advise the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the Congress on the operation of the new medicare payment system for hospitals.

MEDICARE PROSPECTIVE PAYMENT

The prospective payment system represents a fundamental change in the way Medicare pays for inpatient hospital services. After a transition period, the payment rate for a patient's stay will be based primarily on the patient's diagnosis. A separate payment rate is established for each of 469 diagnostic related groups [DRG's].

The use of DRG's as a basis for pricing hospital services has been a subject for study over a number of years, and the New Jersey Hospital Rate Setting Program has had limited experience with DRG's. However, the new Medicare hospital payment system must be recognized for what it is—only a good beginning. Propac will be needed to advise the Secretary and the Congress on a number of important, complex, and controversial issues and decisions that must be dealt with over the next several years as the new system develops.

Perhaps the most important of these issues concerns the percentage by which the DRG payment rates will be increased from year to year. While the law directs the Secretary to set the payment rates for 1984 and 1985 so as to duplicate the outlays that would have resulted had the prior law remained in effect, the statute gives the Secretary very broad discretion for setting the payment levels for later years.

In addition, it will be necessary under the new payment system for the Secretary to revise existing DRG's, establish new DRG's, and raise and lower payment rates for specific DRG's so that the new system will keep pace with changes in technology and hospital practices.

PROPAC

The Prospective Payment Assessment Commission, which I sponsored, was established to advise the Department and the Congress on these and numerous other difficult issues. It is presently composed of 15 independent experts, selected by the Director of the Office of Technology Assessment, who have expertise and experience in the provision and financing of health care. Medicare beneficiaries are represented on the Commission.

I urged establishing Propac in 1983 because I strongly believe that without a strong, independent, and broadly representative Commission to monitor the new prospective payment system, there would be a significant risk that we will see hospital payment rates develop in this country that do not bear a rational relationship to the cost of the kind of care we seek to purchase for the elderly. This would mean wasteful spending for some DRG's. In other cases, it would mean less care or poorer quality care for the elderly, the shifting of costs to other patients, and increased demands by hospitals that they be permitted to charge the elderly for the part of their costs that is not borne by Medicare.

NEED FOR BROADENED REPRESENTATION

As the Commission has worked to prepared its first report, gaps in its membership have become apparent. First, none of the members can speak from the perspective of the business community. This is a serious omission because private businesses pay for much of the health care that people under age 65 receive. Moreover, business has played an increasingly important role in containing hospital costs. Much of the recent success in dampening the rise in health costs is attributable to private efforts.

A second omission is the lack of a representative from the nursing profession. As hospitals are forced to find ways to become more cost effective in treating patients, there is always a danger that the quality of care delivered to Medicare patients will suffer. The peer review organizations [PRO's] have a great deal of responsibility in this regard, but members of the nursing profession are on the front lines and can offer timely advice and criticisms.

The most serious omission, Mr. President, is the lack of representation of small, rural hospitals. While these hospitals are of vital importance to the millions of Americans who live in sparsely populated areas, their unique character and needs are sometimes overshadowed by the concerns of the larger, urban hospitals, who all too often tend to dominate policy debates.

Continued access to quality health care in rural areas is a serious concern in Montana. Of the 67 hospitals in Montana, half have fewer than 50 beds. Most of these small hospitals are in small communities and isolated rural areas. Each provides essential services—if one closes, its patients might easily have to drive 100 miles or more for emergency medical care.

Cutbacks in Medicare payments hit small, rural hospitals particularly hard because they have so many Medicare patients. Half the patients in my rural Montana hospitals are Medicare patients, mostly because rural populations nationwide are aging as younger people move into larger cities and towns. When Medicare cuts back on its payments for these patients, there is often no way a small hospital can make up the loss.

CONCLUSION

The Prospective Payment Assessment Commission should be enlarged to accommodate members from the business community, the nursing profession, and small rural hospitals. Adding two seats will help make this possible. I believe it is vitally important that rural hospitals in particular are added to the Commission as quickly as possible.

With these important additions, Propac will be better able to present balanced, informed advice to the administration and to the Congress. I urge my colleagues to support this important initiative.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I join my fellow Senators, Mr. DOLE and Mr. DURENBERGER, in introducing this amendment to increase the membership of the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission [Propac] by two slots. Propac was authorized by Public Law 98-21, which established the prospective payment system, for the purpose of establishing an advisory body to the Secretary of Health and Human Services. Specifically, Propac is charged with making recommendations to the Secretary regarding the need for adjustments to the DRG system based on its evaluation of scientific evidence regarding new practices, including the use of new technologies and treatment modalities.

The purpose of this amendment is to provide more appropriate representation on the Commission while allowing it to retain the expertise of a number of its current members serving in key subcommittee positions. It is my expectation that new appointments will be made to ensure that input is provided from representatives of the nursing and business communities and from the sector of the health field concerned with rural health care. I am deeply concerned that many of our rural hospitals are being impacted disproportionately by the prospective payment system. Therefore, I believe that it is essential that this voice be heard on the Commission.

The rationale behind the establishment of Propac highlighted the need for the prospective payment system to be able to account for the technology factor. I think Propac can make, and should be allowed to make, an important contribution in this area. The last few decades have seen a proliferation of new health care technologies, which include increasingly sophisticated drugs and medical and surgical procedures requiring expensive equipment. In many cases, new technology had led to increased cost without apparent benefits. The health care system, at present, has not always been able to appropriately evaluate health care technologies. Thus, the activities of both Propac and the private sector in technology assessment are vitally needed.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the majority leader as an original cosponsor of S. 984, a bill to increase the number of members of the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission [Propac] by two. As many of our colleagues may be aware, Propac was created by the Social Security Amendments of 1983—Public Law 98-21—to advise the executive and legislative branches on implementing and updating the prospective payment system used to reimburse hospitals and health care providers under the Medicare Program. The Congress intended members of the Commission to be knowledgeable about health care issues and sufficiently independent to ensure that recommendations which they develop are technically sound. By law, the Commission must include individuals with expertise and experience in health care delivery, financing and research. A review of the current membership confirms that we have been successful in attracting to the Commission the highest caliber of talent from the health care professions, academia, industry, business, labor and nonprofit organizations. However, conspicuous by their absence from the Commission are representatives of rural health delivery facilities and the nursing profession. Failure to incorporate these interests into regular deliberations deprives the Commission of the special perspective which the smaller community and its professionals can lend. Because Medicare is vital to the survival of many rural facilities and to the continued availability of quality care in nonurban areas, it is particularly appropriate that spokespersons for these interests be added to the Commission.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Kansas for his initiative in developing this legislation, and encourage each of our colleagues to join with us in support of this constructive revision in the current membership of Propac.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 985. A bill to protect the rights of victims of child abuse; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHILD ABUSE VICTIMS RIGHTS ACT

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, Congress has often been accused—correctly, in many cases—of being ineffective and slow to act on the major issues of the day. But Congress can point with pride to its recent accomplishments in one area—combating the scourge of child pornography.

Last year, we passed, and the President signed, the Child Protection Act of 1984, which I had sponsored with Senator SPECTER and others. The Child Protection Act removed the requirement that child pornography meet the murky definition of "obscenity" to fall afoul of Federal law, and also removed the requirement that this hideous form of exploitation be undertaken for a commercial purpose.

The results of this legislation have been dramatic. In recent testimony before a Senate Governmental Affairs Subcommittee, the Justice Department credited the Child Protection Act with a large increase in prosecutions.

In the last 9 months, according to the Justice Department testimony, 63 defendants have been indicted on child pornography charges—almost as many as in the previous 6½ years. And the number of convictions nearly tripled last year over 1983.

But as effective as the Child Protection Act has been in stepping up Federal efforts to guard our young people, we have only scratched the surface in terms of what could be done.

Federal and State enforcement officials need additional tools to end the outrage of child exploitation—and our young people need additional protection.

Accordingly, I am today introducing a new series of initiatives in the continuing fight against those who would destroy the lives of our children for their own cheap and tawdry pleasure and profit.

The first of these initiatives would make sections 2251 and 2252 of title 18, United States Code, predicate offenses triggering the racketeering and influence of corrupt organizations [RICO] statutes. Placing the child pornography sections of the code under RICO would provide the additional penalties and fines available under that statute against these organizations, and might also reach pedophiles who infiltrate legitimate childcare, educational and recreational organizations to gain access to potential victims.

In addition, RICO would provide the personal civil remedies now sorely lacking under Federal law, including injunctive relief to halt the dissemination of pornography across State lines—out of the reach of State remedies—and treble damages for personal injuries.

This provision differs from earlier efforts in this area in that it limits the expansion of RICO coverage to injuries to the person to violations of sections 2251 and 2252.

The second provision of this package is a variation on legislation I introduced in the last Congress to provide a national clearinghouse on cases involving child abuse and allow child-care organizations to conduct employee background checks.

In hearings on this legislation last year, the FBI objected that such a data base would be a costly duplication of information already existing in the FBI's Identification Division and in the National Crime Center's interstate identification index, that starting such an effort from scratch would cause it to miss many past offenses, and that such an effort would undermine decentralization efforts undertaken by the FBI under Public Law 92-544.

However, the existing data bases are inadequate in that they do not provide information on the victim's age—that is, whether the offense involved a child victim—or on the relationship between the accused and the victim.

Not only would this lack of specificity hamper background checks, it also limits the effectiveness of studies on child abuse based on information contained in these files.

Therefore, I have included in this package a provision directing the FBI and the National Crime Information Center to update their information-collecting efforts by including information on the age of the victim and the relationship to the perpetrator, and to provide a uniform definition of a "child" to for the purpose of classifying crimes as being committed against children.

Since I introduced the data base bill last year, Senator DECONCINI was able to amend last year's continuing resolution to provide additional child abuse training funds for States which establish procedures pursuant to Public Law 98-544 requiring employee background checks by facilities primarily dealing with children. It is important that we act to update the index if the DeConcini amendment is to have any vitality and if we hope to encourage States to take advantage of the information available to child-oriented employers.

Two additional provisions would protect children against repeat offenders through mandatory sentences. Section 5 of the bill provides for a mandatory life sentence for kidnaping of children under 18 by nonparents, and gives the judge discretion to issue a sentence of death if the kidnaped child is murdered.

We must substantially increase penalties for this vicious crime to deter potential perpetrators and prevent repeat offenses.

Section 6 of the bill provides for mandatory 5-year sentences for repeat violations of sections 2251 and 2252. Again, evidence indicates that many pedophiles are repeat offenders who will strike again if they are released from custody.

Section 7 of this legislation is aimed at a troublesome roadblock to prosecution of offenses against children: the investigative, prosecutorial and courtroom procedures which discourage the use of child victims as witnesses.

Children with the requisite intelligence and communications skills are competent to testify in most jurisdictions. Indeed, the child victim is often the best and/or the only witness against an abuser. A recent conviction in Rockville, MD, where the 5-year-old daughter of an abuser was a key witness, is a well publicized case in point.

However, the justice system erects a number of barriers to the participation of child victims in trials for abuse and exploitation. As if courtrooms were not sufficiently intimidating, often children must confront their tormentors, who in many cases have threatened to harm the children or their loved ones if they tell of their abuse.

Then, once on the stand, they may be confronted with hostile and complex questioning designed to take advantage of their nervousness and inexperience. News reports from the McMartin case in California indicate that the young witnesses were subjected to long, complex and confusing lines of questioning intended to throw them off guard, produce inconsistencies and therefore reduce their credibility.

But the continued torment of these young victims by the system sworn to protect them begins long before they come to the stand. Testimony in hearings conducted last year indicates that repeated interviews by attorneys, investigators, and social workers may cause the child to relive their horror so many times that they may become zombie-like in retelling the story. This also has the effect of reducing their credibility at trial.

And investigators not trained in dealing with the special problems of child witnesses may botch potential prosecutions. News reports indicate that exactly that kind of mishandling of testimony by youngsters led to all the charges being dropped in the Jordan, MN, case, despite the conviction of investigators that a number of children were indeed abused.

It is little wonder that many parents of child abuse victims decide not to subject their children to the ordeal of testifying against their attackers.

If we hope to increase the number and quality of child exploitation prosecutions, we must act to remove the barriers to participation by child witnesses. And the place to begin is with the procedures employed by the Federal Government in child abuse and exploitation prosecutions.

This legislation would direct the Attorney General to study possible changes in the Federal Rules of Evidence, Criminal Procedure, and Civil Procedure and other Federal courtroom, prosecutorial, and investigative procedures to facilitate the use of child witnesses in these cases. The study must include, but is not limited to, the use of closed-circuit cameras and two-way mirrors for live observation of child witnesses; allowing judicial discretion to circumscribe the use of harassing, overly complex and confusing questions against child witnesses; videotaping interviews to reduce repetition in the course of investigation and pretrial discovery and other streamlining of investigative procedures; and improved training of Federal prosecutorial, enforcement and investigative staff in the special problems of child victims.

The Attorney General is directed to report with findings and recommendations within 1 year of passage. It is my hope that such a study would produce an institutional commitment on the part of the Justice Department behind a set of recommendations, and provide the impetus for congressional action before the end of this Congress. I further hope that, though the Federal Government engages in fewer abuse and exploitation prosecutions than local authorities, the Federal influence would encourage parallel changes at the State level.

A final provision in the legislation would have the effect of allowing John and Noreen Gosch of Des Moines, IA, to share a seat on the board of the Missing Children's Center. John and Noreen's son Johnny, a Des Moines Register carrier, disappeared in 1982. Instead of withdrawing, which would have been an understandable reaction, John and Noreen have carried on a relentless search for their son, and have become experts in the area of protecting children from kidnaping and exploitation. They have become much in demand as speakers and have traveled widely, educating parents to protect other children from the fate that befell their son. They have earned the honor of a place on the board—and the board needs their expertise and energy.

I introduce this package knowing full well that it does not encompass the entire universe of possible approaches to carrying on the fight against the abuse and exploitation of our children. I acknowledge and welcome the initiatives of a number of other Senators who share my interest in this area. I offer this package in the hope that it will help us build on the momentum we have established on this issue, and promote a full hearing and debate on all the measures that have been introduced to date.

The continued interest on the part of my colleagues in providing protection for children provides further proof that there is much more that can be done. The battle to save our children is a never-ending one—and there is no time like the present to launch the next offensive.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the legislation be inserted in full at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 985

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Child Abuse Victims Rights Act of 1985".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) child exploitation has become a multimillion dollar industry, infiltrated and operated by elements of organized crime, and by a nationwide network of individuals openly advertising their desire to exploit children;

(2) Congress has recognized the physiological, psychological, and emotional harm caused by the production, distribution, and display of child pornography by strengthening laws proscribing such activity;

(3) the Federal Government lacks sufficient enforcement tools to combat concerted efforts to exploit children proscribed by Federal law, and exploitation victims lack effective remedies under Federal law;

(4) child molesters and others who prey on children frequently seek employment in or volunteer for positions that give them ready exposure to children;

(5) Congress has encouraged background checks to prevent individuals with a record of child abuse from attaining such positions; however, current Federal files contain insufficient information to identify crimes involving abuse of children;

(6) abductions of children under the age of 18, frequently involving noncustodial parents, cause considerable emotional and physical trauma, yet individuals convicted of such offenses are rarely sentenced and noncustodial parents are rarely prosecuted;

(7) mandatory sentences for kidnaping of children would provide an effective deterrent for such offenses and reduce recidivism; and

(8) current rules of evidence, criminal procedure, and civil procedure and other courtroom and investigative procedures inhibit the participation of child victims as witnesses and damage their credibility when they do testify, impairing the prosecution of child exploitation offenses.

INCLUSION OF SEXUAL EXPLOITATION OF CHILDREN UNDER RICO

SEC. 3. Section 1961(1)(B) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "section 1955 (relating to the prohibition of illegal gambling businesses)," the following: "sections 2251 and 2252 (relating to sexual exploitation of children),".

AUTHORIZATION OF CIVIL SUITS UNDER RICO FOR PERSONAL INJURY

SEC. 4. Subsection (c) of section 1964 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows—

"(c) Any person injured—

"(1) personally by reason of a violation of section 1962 of this chapter if such injury results from an act indictable under sections 2251 and 2252 of this title (relating to sexual exploitation of children); or

"(2) in his business or property by reason of any violation of section 1962 of this chapter, may sue therefor in any appropriate United States district court and shall recover threefold the damages he sustains and the cost of the suit, including a reasonable attorney's fee.".

DEATH SENTENCE OR MANDATORY LIFE IN KIDNAPING OFFENSES INVOLVING THE MURDER OF A MINOR

SEC. 5. Section 1201 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (a) by striking out "except in the case of a minor by the parent thereof,";

(2) in subsection (a) by inserting, "except as provided in subsection (g) of this section," before "be punished"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(g)(1) If the victim of an offense under subsection (a) is a person who has not attained the age of 18 years, the punishment shall be imprisonment for life. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the court, in imposing a life sentence under this subsection, shall not sentence the defendant to probation, nor suspend such sentence, and the defendant shall not be eligible for release on parole.

(2) If during the course of an offense for which the punishment is provided by this subsection, the offender kills such victim, the judge may, in lieu of the punishment provided in paragraph (1), sentence such offender to the penalty of death. The procedures made applicable to the penalty of death in aircraft piracy cases by section 903(c) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (49 U.S.C. App. 1473(c)) shall also be applicable to the penalty of death under this subsection, except that, notwithstanding paragraph (7) of such subsection, the court may decline to impose the sentence of death.".

MANDATORY MINIMUM SENTENCE

SEC. 6. Section 2251(c) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out all that follows the fifth comma and that precedes the first period, and inserting in lieu thereof "such person shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than 15 years, and may also be fined not more than $200,000".

(2) adding at the end thereof the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the court, in imposing sentence for a person with a prior conviction under this section, shall not sentence the defendant to probation, nor suspend such sentence, and the defendant shall not be eligible for release on parole until he has served not less than five years.".

(b) Section 2252(c) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out all that follows the fifth comma and that precedes the first period, and inserting in lieu thereof "such person shall be imprisoned not less than five years nor more than 15 years, and may also be fined not more than $200,000".

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the court, in imposing sentence for a person with a prior conviction under this section, shall not sentence the defendant to probation, nor suspend such sentence, and the defendant shall not be eligible for release on parole until he has served not less than five years.".

ATTORNEY GENERAL REPORT

SEC. 7. (a) Within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Attorney General shall submit a report to Congress detailing possible changes in the Federal Rules of Evidence, the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and other Federal courtroom, prosecutorial, and investigative procedures which would facilitate the participation of child witnesses in cases involving child abuse and sexual exploitation.

(b) In preparing the report, the Attorney General shall consider such changes as—

(1) use of closed-circuit cameras, two-way mirrors, and other out-of-court statements;

(2) judicial discretion to circumscribe use of harassing, overly complex, and confusing questions against child witnesses;

(3) use of videotape in investigations to reduce repetitions of interviews;

(4) streamlining investigative procedures; and

(5) improved training of prosecutorial and investigative staff in special problems of child witnesses.

REQUIREMENT OF DETAILED FBI OFFENSE CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM

SEC. 8. The Attorney General shall modify the classification system used by the National Crime Information Center in its Interstate Identification Index, and by Identification Division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in its Criminal File, with respect to offenses involving sexual exploitation of children by—

(1) including in the description of such offenses the age of the victim and the relationship of the victim to the offenders; and

(2) classifying such offense by using a uniform definition of a child.

MEMBERSHIP OF ADVISORY BOARD ON MISSING CHILDREN

SEC. 9. Subsection (a) of section 405 of the Missing Children's Assistance Act (Title IV of Public Law 93-415), as added by section 660 of the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984 (Public Law 98-473) is amended by—

(1) striking out "9 members" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 members";

(2) striking out "and" after the semicolon in clause (5);

(3) striking out the period at the end of clause (6) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(4) inserting at the end thereof the following:

"(7) One member position to be filled by the parents of a missing child to be selected from the State of Iowa based on their knowledge of child abuse prevention and their contributions in the area of missing children.".●

By Mr. BOREN (for himself, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. FORD, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. GORE, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. ROCKEFELLER):

S. 986. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to disallow any deduction for advertising or other promotion expenses with respect to arms sales; to the Committee on Finance.

DEFENSE CONTRACTOR ADVERTISING EXPENSES

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, the legislation I am introducing today with my colleagues, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. FORD, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. GORE, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. ROCKEFELLER, is very simple. It eliminates the tax deductions that defense contractors presently enjoy for public relations costs. This is a small but important step to demonstrate to the American people that the Congress is interested in controlling the costs of defense.

The Internal Revenue Code provides a deduction for ordinary and necessary expenses of doing business. The defense industry sells almost entirely to the Federal Government; therefore, little advertising and promotion is necessary.

The question comes to mind: Why treat defense contractors differently? Well, Mr. President, defense contractors are already treated differently. What other companies have their research and development costs paid for? What other companies have government-owned facilities in which to conduct business? What other companies receive 90 percent of their costs each month? What other companies have a public law to provide "Extraordinary Contractual Relief Costs?"

For many months, stories about waste and possible fraud continue to flood the front pages of this Nation's newspapers. The Department of Defense continues to flounder in attempts to correct these abuses. The latest is a "Certificate of Overhead Costs" to be signed by a corporate official verifying the contents of their claims. It is very unclear as to what official must sign, what the penalty would be and to whom it would be charged. DOD also recently published changes in its regulations to control the present practice of collecting public relations costs in the contracts. And yet, the reports of abuse continue to mount.

In 1985, 54,000 personnel in the Department of Defense will have the responsibility of supervising 15 million contracts, according to the recent series in the Washington Post. There are 20,000 prime contractors and 150,000 subcontractors and vendors. The purchasing rules alone number 7,500 pages.

Mr. President, at this point in time I am not in the least convinced that we can get a handle on the immense problem of defense contract accounting. This bill would at least insure that contractors cannot collect for advertising and other public relations costs and then turn around and deduct them as ordinary business costs from their taxes. The American public deserves a better deal than the defense corporations presently seem willing to give.

I urge my fellow colleagues to join me in sending a strong signal to the defense industry that it is long past time to assist the administration and the Congress to insure the strongly possible defense posture at the least possible cost to the American taxpayer.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 986

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) part IX of subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to items not deductible) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 280H. ARMS SALES PROMOTION EXPENSES.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—No deduction shall be allowed under this chapter for any arms sale promotion expense.

"(b) ARMS SALE PROMOTION EXPENSE.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'arms sale promotion expense' means any amount otherwise allowable as a deduction under this chapter with respect to—

"(A) any advertisement primarily for purposes of—

"(i) promoting the sale of arms, or

"(ii) informing or influencing the general public (or any segment thereof) with respect to defense expenditures, or

"(B) any of the following incurred or provided primarily for purposes described in subparagraph (A)—

"(i) travel expenses (including meals and lodging),

"(ii) any amount attributable to goods or services of a type generally considered to constitute entertainment, amusement, or recreation or to the use of a facility in connection with the providing of such goods or services,

"(iii) gifts, or

"(iv) other promotion expenses.

"(2) ARMS.—The term 'arms' means any arm, ammunition, or implement of war designated in the munitions list published pursuant to the Military Security Act of 1954.

"(c) REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of this section.".

(b) The table of sections for part IX of subchapter B of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Sec. 280H. Arms sales promotion expenses.".

(c) The amendments made by this section shall apply to amounts paid or incurred after the date of the enactment of this Act in taxable years ending after such date.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished Senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN] in introducing legislation to prohibit weapons makers from passing along to the Government their public relations and advertising costs. This legislation would disallow business expense deductions for money spent advertising or promoting the sale of any weapons system to the U.S. Government.

Current Pentagon regulations are sufficiently ambiguous to permit contractors to bill the Government millions of dollars annually to recover their public affairs costs. The Defense Contract Audit Agency and the General Accounting Office recently estimated that this costs taxpayers $140 million each year. Another GAO review of 12 contractors placed the figure at $500 million. Even assuming the more conservative figure is correct, we are dealing with sufficient funds to purchase 7,000 antitank missiles for the Army, 140 Harpoon anti-ship missiles for the Navy, or 7 F-16 fighter planes for the Air Force.

Instead of supporting our soldiers in the field—where it belongs—this money now is buying plastic models of military equipment; glossy advertisements in trade magazines and general publications; and exhibit space in military trade shows.

I am aware that the Pentagon has attempted to revise the regulations responsible for this significant loophole. The current fiscal situation, however, requires immediate action to close it. At a time when the Congress is being asked to cut back or eliminate so many worthwhile domestic programs, we cannot turn a blind eye to such a blatant waste of Government resources.

Specifically, this bill would amend the Internal Revenue Code to prohibit business expense deductions for any advertisements promoting weapons sales to the United States. We simply do not need to subsidize slick media spreads, especially when the advertising promotes weapons we've been buying for years from a single source. What's the point of it?

Weapons advertising doesn't influence Government officials who make procurement decisions. In fact, the Government is not the intended recipient of these ad campaigns at all. The real purpose is to get the company's name before the public, generate name recognition, and thereby promote the firm's other products or services. When viewed in this light, there simply is no way to justify any taxpayer subsidy fo such advertising costs.

This legislation also would disallow business deductions for promotional travel and entertainment expenses. Moreover, it would discontinue subsidizing expenditures for gifts such as models and calendars, even when less than the current $25 business-gift maximum. Our Nation's military needs high-quality weaponry, not plastic models of it. It needs the best available tanks, ships, and planes, not a media blitz about them. In short, our defense dollars should be subsidizing muscle, not Madison Avenue.

Mr. President, I strongly urge the Senate to follow Senator BOREN's lead by approving this much-needed reform legislation. We need to stop defense contractors from passing their advertising expenses along to the Government.

Mr. President, I ask permission that my speech be inserted in the RECORD following the remarks on this subject by the senior Senator from Oklahoma, Senator BOREN.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, for the last several months the press has carried what seems to be almost daily accounts of more than questionable billing practices by defense contractors and extremely lax oversight of contracts by the Department of Defense. This waste of our defense dollars sickens and angers me. How can this occur at a time of record Federal deficits, at a time when the Congress, in trying to bring the budget back into balance, is having to cut deeply into domestic programs on one hand and is asked to increase defense spending on the other? It is incredible to me, and it is impossible to explain to my constituents. Among the numerous letters I have received from Kentuckians on the subject has come the suggestion that if private businesses operated the way the Defense Department does, they would be bankrupt, and I cannot argue with that.

We must try to get control of the defense contracting system. I do not know exactly how we are going to do this, but at the very least we are going to need direction from the President, plus the combined efforts of the Secretary of Defense, the Service Secretaries and the Congress. Stricter oversight is certainly necessary, but it will not come from within the Defense Department unless there is pressure from the top. While I do not feel it is the duty of the Congress to involve itself in actual oversight of defense contracts, we can tighten laws and guidelines and perhaps even reduce the Department's budget so that it will treat our tax dollars a little less cavalierly.

I have notice that several committees are investigating these latest reported abuses by defense contractors, and I am sure that some corrections in the system will result from this. Additionally, a number of my colleagues have ideas on how to turn around the waste, fraud and abuse in the Department of Defense budget that appears, I am sorry to say, to be more flagrant than originally anticipated. I am joining their efforts today as I cosponsor with the senior Senator from Oklahoma legislation designed to close a loophole in the Internal Revenue Code.

The bill, which I recommend to my colleagues, would eliminate the ability of defense contractors to deduct public relations expenses as a business expense. The Code provides deduction for ordinary and necessary expenses of doing business. But the defense industry sells almost exclusively to the Federal Government, so why is advertising necessary, and why should we pay for it? Furthermore, as a double whammy, these contractors bill the defense department for advertising and other public relations costs, and then turn around and deduct them from their taxes.

If this were not bad enough, the list of items billed as the cost of doing business is shocking: Country club fees, dinner parties, babysitting expenses, golf shirts, hats, and promotional giveaways. To my mind, these are not legitimate tax-deductible expenses.

I hope our colleagues will join us in sending a strong signal to the Defense Department and to the defense industry that the Congress and the American people want more, a lot more, for their defense dollar.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 987. A bill to recognize the organization known as The Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War 1861-1865; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DAUGHTERS OF UNION VETERANS OF THE CIVIL WAR

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased and honored to offer a bill today which would grant "The Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War 1861-1865" a Federal charter.

We who live here in Washington or spend a good deal of time here are reminded more often than most Americans of the great struggle years ago which first divided our Nation and then inseparably bound it together. One does not have to venture far in any direction from this Chamber to find a monument or marker paying tribute to those who participated in that struggle. Many of the major battlefields of the Civil War are located just a short drive from Washington and today provide scenic parks in which to spend a relaxing day.

The Civil War is part of our rich American heritage and its events and outcome should be remembered by all Americans.

One organization which has worked hard to preserve this part of our national heritage is "The Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War 1861-1865." This fine organization of 7,000 members nationwide encourages the preservation of historic sites and the construction and preservation of monuments commemorating the struggle between the North and South. It maintains a museum of Civil War history and a library containing official documents of the Civil War, as well as artifacts, biographies, and personal accounts of the conflict. Both are open free of charge to the public.

The efforts of The Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War go well beyond preserving the Civil War as part of our history. Members also care for veterans of all wars through volunteer programs in Veterans' Administration medical centers and in homes and other institutions maintained by our States for the welfare of our veterans. The organization also conducts scholarship programs at the State and national levels, encourages contests of educational merit, and works with other groups devoted to American history, veterans' affairs, and community interests.

I first heard of the many efforts of this fine organization through one of its leading members and a fellow Nebraskan, Leah Way.

"The Daughters of Union Veterans of the Civil War 1861-1865" is an organization that merits the recognition of the Congress and all Americans. The granting of a Federal charter this year, the centennial of the organization's existence, would be a most appropriate gesture.

S. 988. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to prohibit the Secretary of Health and Human Services from requiring certain physician certifications relating to inpatient hospital services, and to allow physicians to charge Medicare beneficiaries without regard to the fee freeze if the patient chooses to pay the physician from private sources; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 989. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to allow physicians to charge Medicare beneficiaries without regard to the fee freeze if the patient chooses to pay the physician from private sources; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE LEGISLATION

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, today I am introducing two bills to amend the physician services part of the Medicare Program. The bills will correct several problems in the operation of this program which have been brought to my attention by Wyoming physicians.

The first bill involves the so-called penalty statement which the Health Care Financing Administration requires physicians with Medicare patients to sign. The form is basically a statement by physicians that they are not crooks. I cannot think of a more demeaning or arrogant exercise of bureaucratic power.

It is my understanding that the form is required because the Inspector General at HHS and other authorities are worried that physicians might abuse the Medicare prospective payment system. The abuse would result from alleged misdiagnosis and utilization of unnecessary services. However, there are already several means by which the physicians are either self-policed or independently reviewed. For each hospital patient, Medicare or otherwise, a physician must sign the chart indicating the medical problem and method of treatment. Also, PRO's review Medicare cases. The penalty statement is obviously uncalled for, and the bill I am introducing would prohibit HCFA from requiring that physicians sign such forms, either on a case-by-case basis, an annual basis, or once in a lifetime.

The second bill involves the Medicare physician fee freeze which was included as part of the deficit reduction of 1984. Under the act, physicians cannot, for a 15-month period, charge Medicare patients a fee higher than what was charged during a base period. This is similar to the fee freeze which was tried back in 1971 when wage and price controls were ineffectively used to bring inflation under control. In the next few days, we may vote here in the Senate to further extend the physician fee freeze.

The legislation introduced today responds to one small problem with the freeze. The fee freeze is in effect for every Medicare patient seen by a physician. However, some Medicare-eligible patients do not participate in the Medicare Program. They may pay for their medical expenses out of pocket, or they may still be working and are covered by private insurance. But, the physician's fees are frozen, regardless of the cost of the services or source of payment. My bill simply unfreezes the physicians whenever their Medicare-eligible patients have their medical expenses paid by a means other than Medicare.

Both bills provide some sanity to a very confusing, irritating and demoralizing situation. I would ask unanimous consent that the two bills I am introducing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 988

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 1886 of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) The Secretary may not require, as a condition for payment for inpatient hospital services, that a physician make a certification with respect to the accuracy of the diagnosis of a patient who received inpatient hospital services, or with respect to the necessity of such services.".

(b) Section 1842 (j) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any case where no payment is made or requested under this part with respect to the particular physicians' services involved.".

(c) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall apply to services furnished after the date of the enactment of this Act.

S. 989

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) Section 1842(j) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) Paragraph (1) shall not apply to any case where no payment is made or requested under this part with respect to the particular physicians' services involved.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to services furnished after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

S. 990. A bill to consolidate and authorize program support and certain ocean and coastal programs and functions of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration under the Department of Commerce; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

S. 991. A bill to provide authorization of appropriations for certain fisheries activities; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

NATIONAL OCEANIC AND ATMOSPHERIC ADMINISTRATION REAUTHORIZATION LEGISLATION

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, today I am introducing, along with my colleagues from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD], Washington [Mr. GORTON], and Alaska [Mr. STEVENS], two bills to provide for comprehensive authorization of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's [NOAA] Fisheries Programs, Ocean and Coastal Programs, and program support functions.

Over the past several years, the Commerce Committee has worked to achieve a goal of bringing all of NOAA under active authorization, rather than operating under a standing authorization. The purpose of this approach is to ensure that NOAA is held fully accountable in carrying out its activities and functions.

This year, funding pressures on all Federal agencies, including NOAA, will be quite severe. Funding levels are expected to be frozen at the fiscal year 1985 level. The bills that I am introducing today reflect these budget concerns. Therefore, it is vital that we direct our limited resources to the areas of greatest need.

Reauthorization hearings on NOAA are expected to illuminate the areas and programs most deserving of support. The bills introduced, as part of a comprehensive NOAA package, freeze funding levels for these NOAA programs, setting the fiscal year 1986 level at the fiscal year 1985 appropriation level and allowing a 4.5-percent increase for fiscal year 1987. After the hearing process, authorization levels may be adjusted or shifted to reflect priorities identified during the hearings.

The Marine Fisheries Program authorization provides $64,710,000 during fiscal year 1986, and $67,621,950 for fiscal year 1987, for NOAA's National Marine Fisheries Service to carry out a portion of its duties in the areas of information collection and analysis, fishery conservation and management, and State and industry assistance programs. The balance of the funding needed by the fisheries service to carry out these functions is authorized under several cyclical authorizations, the primary one being the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act [MFCMA].

The fisheries authorization bill also includes a 2-year reauthorization of the Commercial Fisheries Research and Development Act at the fiscal year 1985 appropriation level of $4,500,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $4,702,500 for fiscal year 1987.

A 2-year reauthorization of the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act is also provided at a funding level of $3,500,000 for fiscal year 1986 and $3,657,500 for fiscal year 1987.

NOAA's Ocean and Coastal Programs and program support functions are contained in a second authorization bill. In the area of program support, $47,954,000 is provided for NOAA's overall executive management and retirement pay for commissioned officers of the NOAA corps during fiscal year 1986, and $50,111,930 for fiscal year 1987. NOAA's marine fleet operations are authorized at $64,886,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $67,805,870 for fiscal year 1987. Aircraft support services are authorized at $12,744,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $13,317,480 for fiscal year 1987. The bill proposes to fund the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere at the fiscal year 1985 appropriation level of $630,350 for fiscal year 1987.

Title II contains reauthorizations of two important ocean and coastal programs, the Ocean Dumping Research Program carried out under the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act and the National Ocean Pollution Planning Act. Also, the bill authorizes $2,000,000 during fiscal year 1986, and $2,090,000 during fiscal year 1987, for continuing programs associated with development of ocean mineral resources.

NOAA's ocean research activities are reauthorized at $28,471,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $29,752,195 for fiscal year 1987. Ocean service centers such as tide data surveys and operation of ocean service centers, are authorized at $20,314,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $21,228,000 for fiscal year 1987. Finally, reauthorization is provided for NOAA's mapping, charting, and geodesy functions, including production and distribution of nautical and aeronautical charts.

The authorization levels provided in these bills reflect the need to restrain Government spending and still provide essential services.●

By Mr. COHEN (for himself, Mr. ROTH, and Mr. CHILES) (by request):

S. 992. A bill to discontinue or amend certain requirements for agency reports to Congress; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CONGRESSIONAL REPORTS ELIMINATION ACT

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, at the request of the administration, I am introducing today, along with Senators ROTH and CHILES, the Congressional Reports Elimination Act of 1985. This legislation is modeled after the Congressional Reports Elimination Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-375) and is designed to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of agency operations by eliminating or modifying recurring reports to Congress which, in the administration's view, no long serve a useful purpose.

Thousands of requirements in Federal law require agencies to make recurring reports to Congress. Periodically, the Office of Management and Budget [OMB] review these requirements to determine if they are serving their original purpose. Repeal or modification of the statutory reporting requirement is recommended if:

A report no longer serves its original purpose;

No congressional use is evident;

The information is available to Congress from other sources; or

The cost and time involved in preparing the report outweigh the benefit of the report to the public.

In this case, OMB has recommended repeal of 185 requirements and modification of 49 others.

Although the reports slated for repeal represent only a small fraction of the reporting requirements now in Federal law, I am well aware that not everyone in the Senate may agree with OMB's assessment of what is necessary and what is not.

Therefore, the Subcommittee on Oversight of Government Management, of which I am chairman, will carefully review the bill and distribute copies of it to each of the affected committee chairmen for their comments. If a chairman feels a report is still necessary, we want to know about it. Every effort will be made to respect the chairman's interests. I hope and trust, however, that the chairmen will not automatically request the retention of reports but will determine whether or not they are truly needed. We will also be happy to consider additional reporting requirements which any chairman believes should be eliminated.

Mr. President, I hope that we will be able to move quickly on this matter, since it is estimated that passage of this bill will save the Government over $10 million each year.●

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 993. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to allow a credit for the occupational training of displaced homemakers; to the Committee on Finance.

DISPLACED HOMEMAKERS OPPORTUNITY ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Mother's Day is less than a month away; on this day we will recognize and show our formal appreciation for the marvelous achievements and unselfish efforts of mothers everywhere. Mothers spend innumerable hours caring for children and ensuring that families have warm, comfortable homes. In so doing, they have often sacrified academic and employment opportunites. To be sure, these full-time homemakers have greatly enriched the lives of many American families and have earned the gratitude and admiration of us all.

Unfortunately, these deserving mothers are not always rewarded for their achievements and sacrifices. In fact, their sacrifices in particular place some of these homemakers at a severe disadvantage when they are faced with the death, divorce, or disablement of a husband. Suddenly, these homemakers must enter the labor market in order for their families to subsist. Since these displaced homemakers have devoted their time, energy, and creativity to raising and providing a home for a family, they often do not possess the skills necessary to obtain employment outside the home at wages high enough to maintain a family alone. Often, they must turn to forms of public assistance. In fact, of the over 10 million American families headed by women, 50 percent must resort to some form of public assistance.

Of these same 10 million family heads, 41 percent earn less than $5,000 per year and 60 percent earn less than $10,000 per year. In harsher terms, over half of the American families headed by women exist below the poverty level. If one considers the numbers involved here—6 million women and more than twice that many children—it is apparent that we need to investigate this disturbing problem and take steps toward its resolution. It is time our gratitude helped pay the rent.

We in the Congress can take these steps. We can provide greater opportunities for these displaced homemakers to receive job training. This training would improve their ability to command a decent wage, thus freeing these women from their dependence on public assistance. With these actions, we would greatly bolster these women's sense of self-sufficiency and self-worth.

The legislative initiative which I introduce today, the Displaced Homemakers Opportunity Act, would provide this needed assistance by expanding the number of private sector job training opportunities for this special category of women. The bill permits employers to claim a tax credit equal to 50 percent of wages for hiring a displaced homemaker and providing on-the-job training, or a credit worth 50 percent of the expenses incurred by sending a displaced homemaker to a qualified independent training program.

An employer may also take a credit for upgrading the skills of already employed displaced homemakers earning less than $10,000 per year.

The credit may be 50 percent of the training cost if release time is provided, or 40 percent if it is not.

This program could be implemented using IRS' existing administrative system, so it would not require new offices or significantly more personnel. Moreover, since the training program would be in the form of a tax credit, there would be no direct Federal Government expenditure and virtually no waste—a displaced homemaker is either employed and being trained in a job or she is not. It's that simple.

With this legislation, we will give these displaced homemakers greater opportunities for meaningful employment and independence from public welfare programs. The children of these displaced homemakers will have some sense of security as well as an appreciation for the benefits, satisfaction, and ethics of work. Furthermore, we will cease to penalize these mothers for their commendable efforts to be good mothers, good wives, and good homemakers.

I welcome the support of my colleagues in enacting the Displaced Homemakers Opportunity Act. With this legislation, we will be providing millions of American women with a way out of poverty and a way to achieve a true sense of independence and personal worth.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the text of the bill to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 993

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Displaced Homemakers Opportunity Act".

SEC. 2. DISPLACED HOMEMAKER TAX CREDIT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits allowable against tax) is amended by inserting after section 44H the following new section:

"SEC. 44I DISPLACED HOMEMAKER CREDIT.

"(a) IN GENERAL—At the election of the taxpayer, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to the sum of—

"(1) 50 percent of the aggregate wages paid or incurred by the taxpayer during such taxable year to displaced homemakers who received on-the-job training from the taxpayer, or

"(2) 50 percent of the aggregate amount paid or incurred by the taxpayer during the taxable year to a qualified training organization for the provision of occupational training services to displaced homemakers, or

"(3) 50 percent of the aggregate amount paid or incurred by the taxpayer to a qualified training organization for the provision of upgrade occupational training services to displaced homemakers who are compensated displaced homemakers, but whose earnings do not exceed $10,000 per annum, or

"(4) 40 percent of the aggregate amount paid or incurred by the taxpayer to a qualified training organization for the provision of upgrade occupational training services to displaced homemakers who are not compensated displaced homemakers, and whose earnings do not exceed $10,000 per annum.

"(b) LIMITATION.—

"(1) ONLY WAGES AND AMOUNTS PAID WITHIN 2 YEARS OF HIRING TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—Wages or other amounts paid or incurred by the taxpayer with respect to any displaced homemaker shall not be taken into account under this section if such wages or amounts are paid or incurred more than 2 years after the date on which the taxpayer first paid or incurred wages or other amounts with respect to such displaced homemaker which were taken into account under this section.

"(2) NO CREDIT IF ANY DISPLACED HOMEMAKER DISCHARGED WITHOUT REASONABLE CAUSE.—No credit shall be allowed under this section for the taxable year if—

"(A) the taxpayer was allowed a credit under this section for any taxable year preceding such taxable year with respect to any displaced homemaker, and

"(B) the taxpayer discharged such displaced homemaker without reasonable cause at any time prior to the close of such taxable year.

"(3) LIABILITY FOR TAX.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the credit allowed by subsection (a) for any taxable year shall not exceed the excess of—

"(i) the amount of the tax imposed by this chapter, over

"(ii) the sum of the credits allowable under a section of this part having a lower number or letter designation than this section, other than the credits allowable by sections 31, 39, and 43.

For purposes of the preceding sentence, the term 'tax imposed by this chapter' shall not include any tax treated as not imposed by this chapter under the last sentence of section 53(a).

"(B) SPECIAL RULE FOR PASSTHROUGH OF CREDIT.—In the case of an individual who—

"(i) owns an interest in an unincorporated trade or business,

"(ii) is a partner in a partnership,

"(iii) is a beneficiary of an estate or trust, or

"(iv) is a shareholder in an electing small business corporation (within the meaning of section 137(b)), the credit allowed by subsection (a) for any taxable year shall not exceed the lesser of the amount determined under subpara-graph (A) for the taxable year or an amount (separately computed with respect to such person's interest in such trade or business or entity) equal to the amount of tax attributable to that portion of a person's taxable income which is allocable or apportionable to the person's interest in such trade or business or entity.

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) COMPENSATED DISPLACED HOMEMAKER.—The term 'compensated displaced homemaker' means any displaced homemaker who is paid wages by the taxpayer which—

"(A) are for not less than 5 of the hours per day during which such displaced homemaker receives occupational training services from a qualified training organization, and

"(B) are at the same rate of compensation the taxpayer pays such displaced homemaker for services performed when such displaced homemaker is not receiving such occupational training services.

"(2) DISPLACED HOMEMAKER.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'displaced homemaker' means any individual who—

"(i) was a homemaker for 5 years,

(ii) had no occupation skills or insufficient occupational skills on the date on which such person was hired by the taxpayer,

(iii) entered the work force due to—

"(I) the death or disability of the wage-earning spouse of such person, or

"(II) the divorce of such person from the wage-earning spouse, and

"(iv) is employed by the taxpayer at the close of the taxable year.

"(B) MEMBERS OF TARGETED GROUPS.—The term 'displaced homemaker' does not include any individual with respect to whom the taxpayer has been allowed a credit under section 44B for any taxable year.

"(3) ON-THE-JOB TRAINING.—The term "on-the-job training' means any occupational training program which provides a displaced homemaker with the general training and supervision necessary to learn the specific tasks required for satisfactory performance of the work that comprises an occupation.

"(4) QUALIFIED TRAINING ORGANIZATION.—The term 'qualified training organization' means any organization which is certified by the Secretary of Labor as qualified to provide occupational training services.

"(5) OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING SERVICES.—The term 'occupational training services' includes—

"(A) remedial education and basic occupational skills training,

"(B) job counseling,

"(C) institutional skill training,

"(D) programs of advanced career training which provide a combination of on-the-job training and institutional training and internship assignments which prepare individuals for career employment,

"(E) programs to develop work habits and other services to individuals to help them obtain and retain employment,

"(F) upgrading of occupational skills,

"(G) retraining of occupational skills, and

"(H) literacy training and bilingual training.

"(6) WAGES.—The term 'wages' has the meaning given to such term by section 3306(b) (determined without regard to any dollar limitation contained in such section).

"(d) DENIAL OF DOUBLE BENEFIT.—No deduction or credit shall be allowed under any other provision of this chapter with respect to any amount for which a credit is allowed under subsection (a).

"(e) RECAPTURE OF TAX BENEFIT.—

"(1) IMPOSITION OF ADDITIONAL TAX.—If, at any time after the close of the taxable year for which the taxpayer is allowed a credit under subsection (a) with respect to a displaced homemaker, the taxpayer discharges such displaced homemaker without reasonable cause, then there is hereby imposed an additional tax on the income of the taxpayer which shall be in an amount determined with respect to such displaced homemaker.

"(2) AMOUNT OF ADDITIONAL TAX.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The amount of the additional tax imposed by paragraph (1) with respect to any displaced homemaker shall be equal to the sum of—

"(i) the excess of—

"(I) the income tax liability of the taxpayer for the taxable year in which the credit was allowed under subsection (a) with respect to such displaced homemaker (determined without regard to the portion of such credit attributable to the training of such displaced homemaker), over

"(II) the income tax liability of the taxpayer for such taxable year, plus

"(ii) interest on the excess described in clause (i) at the annual rate established under section 6621 for the period beginning on the date on which the return of the tax imposed by this chapter for such taxable year was required to be made and ending on the date on which payment of such additional tax is made.

"(B) INCOME TAX LIABILITY.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'income tax liability' means the tax imposed by this chapter reduced by any credit allowable against such tax.

"(3) DUE DATE.—The additional tax imposed by paragraph (1) shall become due and payable on the date which is 90 days after the date such tax is imposed.

"(4) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.—If an additional tax is imposed under paragraph (1)—

"(A) the statutory period for the assessment of such additional tax shall not expire before the expiration of 3 years from the date the Secretary is notified (in such manner as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe) of the occurrence which gives rise to the imposition of such additional tax; and

"(B) such additional tax may be assessed before the expiration of such 3-year period notwithstanding the provisions of any other law or rule of law which would otherwise prevent such assessment.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) The table of sections for subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 44H the following new item:

"Sec. 44I. Displaced Homemaker credit.".

(2) Section 6096(b) of such Code (relating to designation of income tax payments to Presidential Election Campaign Fund) is amended by striking out "and 44H" and inserting in lieu thereof "44H, and 44I".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1983.

By Mr. JOHNSTON:

S. 994. A bill to facilitate the national distribution and utilization of coal; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

COAL DISTRIBUTION AND UTILIZATION ACT

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, today I rise to introduce a bill that would facilitate the development of coal slurry pipelines. This measure would grant the Federal power of eminent domain to those interstate coal pipeline systems determined by the Secretary of Energy to be in the national interest.

More than ever I am convinced that the development of alternative modes of transportation is in the national interest. Coal slurry, in particular, is a known and reliable method of coal transport which is economical and causes minimal environmental impacts.

Legislation similar to this measure has been considered since 1974. This bill is essentially the same version as the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources reported favorably in the 98th Congress. I have made technical corrections, eliminated redundancies, and added a new section to allow pipeline operators to enter into long-term contracts.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD followed by a section-by-section summary of the bill.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 994

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Coal Distribution and Utilization Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress hereby finds and declares that—

(1) the continuing dependence of the United States on foreign sources for petroleum and petroleum products entails grave national security risks, results in major balance-of-payment deficits, and increases inflation and unemployment in the domestic economy;

(2) the United States possesses extensive coal reserves that must be produced, distributed, and utilized to reduce the Nation's dependence on imported petroleum;

(3) domestic coal reserves cannot be developed and used for fuel unless adequate transportation systems and facilities exist for the efficient and economic distribution of large quantities of coal across great distances to markets in interstate and foreign commerce at competitive prices;

(4) the Nation's coal distribution system must include interstate coal pipeline distribution systems that will assist the Nation in the development and efficient utilization of coal resources;

(5) the construction of interstate coal pipeline distribution systems to distribute domestic coal will be facilitated by granting the power of eminent domain to certain interstate coal pipeline distribution systems;

(6) the construction of interstate coal pipeline distribution systems is a public use that justifies granting the Federal power of eminent domain to those systems for which a determination of national interest has been made pursuant to this Act;

(7) the water resources of the States are necessary for the development of other resources within those States, and State water laws or terms and conditions of permits and authorizations for the appropriation, use, and diversion of water that restrict, limit, or condition the export of water in interstate coal pipeline distribution systems are reasonable and permissible means for the protection of the resources and the public interests of States;

(8) State water law and interstate compacts are carefully balanced and structured systems for the allocation of water;

(9) the national interest is best served by developing interstate coal pipeline distribution systems pursuant to those State water laws, interstate compacts, and laws governing the interstate allocation of water, including, notwithstanding any adverse impact such law may have on interstate commerce, laws relating to or prohibiting the export or use of water within or outside the State granting or denying such export or use; and

(10) the need for a national coal distribution system is subservient to the national interest in the primacy of State water law, interstate compacts, and laws governing the interstate allocation of water.

(b) The purpose of this Act is to facilitate the development of interstate coal pipeline distribution systems by granting the Federal power of eminent domain to those interstate coal pipeline distribution systems that are determined to be in the national interest: Provided, That such development is subject to State water law, interstate compacts, and laws governing the interstate allocation of water.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this Act the term—

(1) "coal" means any of the recognized classifications of coal, including anthracite, bituminous, semibituminous, subbituminous, and lignite;

(2) "interstate coal pipeline distribution system" means any pipeline system the primary economic purpose of which is the distribution of coal in a liquid or solid state—

(A) from one or more points outside a State to one or more points within a State or between two or more points within a State through another State, or

(B) from one or more points within Alaska to one or more points in a foreign country. Such a pipeline system shall be deemed to be in interstate or foreign commerce if coal that enters the pipeline system is delivered for commercial use in a State other than Alaska, in a territory of the United States, or in a foreign country.

An interstate coal pipeline distribution system includes line pipe, valves, pumping stations, water supply pipelines, and such dewatering facilities as are necessary. Such systems shall not include rail, port, highway, or other ancillary coal-gathering or coal-storage facilities.

(3) "private lands" means any interest in any land other than interests—

(A) owned by the United States or agency thereof or owned by any State or any political subdivision thereof;

(B) held in trust by the United States for an Indian or Indian tribe or owned by an Indian or Indian tribe subject to a restraint against alienation imposed by the United States or

(C) owned by a regional or village corporation established under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, as amended, if such land was transferred to such corporation pursuant to said Act;

(4) "right-of-way" means such interest in private lands, excluding any interest in water, as may be necessary for construction, operation, and maintenance of an interstate coal pipeline distribution system;

(5) "Secretary" means the Secretary of Energy or his successor;

(6) "State" means a State of the United States and the District of Columbia; and

(7)(A) "State water law" includes but is not limited to all substantive and procedural State constitutional provisions, statutory law, judicial decisions, administrative regulations, and administrative decisions authorized by the State which apply to water; and

(B) in the case of any State water law which might be argued to be invalid as an improper burden, interference, or regulation of interstate commerce, such State water law shall not be deemed to be invalid for that reason insofar as such law applies to the export or use of water within or outside the State granting or denying the export or use of water for any interstate coal pipeline distribution system. State water law includes both existing law and that new law properly enacted or created in the future.

EMINENT DOMAIN AUTHORITY

SEC. 4. (a) AUTHORITY TO MAKE NATIONAL INTEREST DETERMINATION.— (1) Upon application of any person proposing to construct an interstate coal pipeline distribution system, who has filed and secured approval of a water permit or acquired other appropriate authorization to control, reserve, appropriate, purchase, transfer, use, export, divert, dedicate or claim water under State water law as provided in section 5, the Secretary shall determine whether the construction of such system is in the national interest.

(2) The determination of the Secretary under paragraph (1) shall be based on the record as a whole, taking into consideration each of the criteria set forth in subsection (b).

(b) FINDINGS.—In making a determination under subsection (a) the Secretary shall make findings concerning the extent to which the system—

(1) would help meet national needs for coal distribution and utilization considering, among other matters, alternative routes, or means of distributing coal;

(2) would enhance competition and provide new market outlets and opportunities for coal producers, including small and independent producers;

(3) would contribute to the national security by encouraging the displacement of imported petroleum, petroleum products, and coal with domestic coal;

(4) would result in economic benefits including—

(A) reduced coal transportation costs;

(B) reduced wholesale and retail electric rates; and

(C) enhanced reliability of supplies of both coal and electric energy; and

(5) would affect the environment, compared to the environmental impacts of alternatives, including—

(A) railroad transportation;

(B) alternative pipeline routes; and

(C) coal utilization facilities, including electric generating plants at coal mine sites and coal gasification plants.

(c) SMALL AND INDEPENDENT COAL PRODUCER ACCESS.—(1) For purposes of protecting small and independent coal producers, the Secretary shall require, as a condition of his determination under subsection (a), that the applicant, prior to application, shall offer to make available to such producers the lesser of—

(A) 10 per centum of the total pipeline capacity of the proposed interstate coal pipeline distribution system; or under the same terms and conditions as other contracting entities.

(B) that portion of the total capacity necessary to satisfy the total interstate coal pipeline distribution system transportation demand of all such small and independent producers located in the geographic region (as determined by the Secretary) served by such pipeline;

(2) For purposes of this subsection, the term "small and independent coal producer" means a coal producer, or a broker or cooperative that represents individual coal producers—

(A) who produced two hundred thousand tons or less of coal during the calendar year preceding the calendar year in which the application is filed, and

(B) are not affiliated with any other company. For purposes of this subparagraph, a coal producer shall be treated as affiliated with another company if such company controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with such coal producer. The term "control" shall have the same meaning as provided by section 10102 of title 49, United States Code.

(d) PROCEDURES.—(1) Any decision under subsection (a) shall be made after notice and opportunity for presentation of written data, views, or arguments in accordance with section 553 of title 5 of the United States Code. If the Secretary, in his discretion, decides to hold hearings, the Secretary shall expedite such hearings and proceedings, and shall schedule all hearings, proposed findings and conclusions, exceptions and any recommended decisions so that the Secretary's final decision under this section shall be issued and completed within eighteen months from the date of receipt of a complete application, except that the Secretary may, for good cause, extend such eighteen-month period for additional periods of not more than ninety days.

(2) Within thirty days after receipt of an application for a determination under this section, the Secretary shall determine whether the application contains all of the information required for its consideration whereupon he shall, within seven days, publish notice of receipt of the application in the Federal Register. The Secretary shall further notify the Governor of each State in which the interstate coal pipeline distribution system will be located. Each notification shall identify the lands over which the interstate coal pipeline distribution system is to be constructed or operated and the water source to be used. If the Secretary determines that all of the required information is not in the application, he shall immediately notify the applicant of all the deficiencies in the application and provide a reasonable period of time for such applicant to provide additional information.

(3) Each applicant for such a determination shall reimburse the Secretary for administrative and other costs incurred by the Secretary in processing the application in such manner as the Secretary shall, by rule, prescribe.

(e) ANTITRUST REVIEW.—(1) Not later than ten days after any application for a determination under this section is received by the Secretary, the Secretary shall notify the Attorney General of the filing of such application and shall provide the Attorney General with a copy of such application and such other information as the Attorney General may request. The Attorney General shall conduct an antitrust review to determine the likely effects upon competition of approval of such application, and not later than one hundred and twenty days after the date of receipt of such notification shall advise the Secretary of the results of such review, including, but not limited to, findings, and recommendations concerning such terms and conditions as the Attorney General deems necessary to protect and promote competition. No application may be determined to be in the national interest under this section if the Attorney General advises the Secretary in writing that, on the basis of such review, approval of such application is not consistent with the antitrust laws.

(2) For the purpose of paragraph (1), the term—

(A) "antitrust laws" has the meaning such term has under section 1 of the Clayton Act (15 U.S.C. 12); and

(B) "antitrust review" has the meaning the term "antitrust investigation" has under section 2 of the Antitrust Civil Process Act (15 U.S.C. 1311).

(f) EMINENT DOMAIN AUTHORITY.—(1) Any person proposing to build an interstate coal pipeline distribution system, the construction of which has been determined by the Secretary to be in the national interest, may, after making good faith efforts to acquire such rights-of-way by negotiations between such person and private landowners, acquire rights-of-way over, under, upon, or through private lands by exercise of the power of eminent domain in the United States district court for the district in which such lands are located or in the appropriate court of the State in which such lands are located. In any action or proceeding to acquire rights-of-way under this section, such action or proceeding shall conform to the laws, practices, and procedures relating to the general eminent domain law of the State where the property is situated, except that in the case of any such State law, practice, or procedure, the effect of which would prohibit any acquisition under this section, or which discriminates against interstate coal pipeline distribution systems, such State law, practice, or procedure shall not be applicable.

(2) Nothing in this section shall be construed to permit any person to acquire any water right through the exercise of the power of eminent domain granted under this Act.

(3) No interstate coal pipeline distribution system constructed pursuant to the authorities of this section shall be considered to be a Federal project for purposes of the application for or assignment of water rights.

(4) Unless there is no feasible and prudent alternative to the acquisition of right-of-way and reasonable planning is made to minimize harm resulting from the acquisition, no such right-of-way may be acquired through exercise of the power of eminent domain under this Act if such right-of-way is over, under, upon, or through—

(A) lands of National, State, or local historic significance as determined by the Federal, State, or local officials having jurisdiction thereof; or

(B) lands held by a qualified organization as defined in section 170(h)(3) of the Internal Revenue Service Code of 1954 primarily for wildlife refuge, sanctuary, recreational or natural resource conservation purposes.

(g) ALTERNATIVE ROUTES.—(1) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to prohibit the applicant from amending his application to request a right-of-way over any alternative route.

(2) The Secretary may require the relocation of any right-of-way sought pursuant to this Act upon a showing that—

(A) such relocation is necessary to enable the United States to realize fully the value of its mineral interest;

(B) such alternative route is available; and

(C) such relocation would not result in unreasonable expense.

(h) PAYMENT FOR FEDERAL COAL.—(1) Each application for a determination of national interest filed pursuant to subsection (a) shall list each instance where the proposed right-of-way crosses lands wherein the United States maintains a mineral interest regarding coal (hereinafter referred to as "Federal coal"). Not later than ten days after any such application is received by the Secretary, the Secretary shall notify the Secretary of the Interior of the filing of such application and shall provide the Secretary of the Interior with a copy of such application and such other information as the Secretary of the Interior may request.

(2)(A) The Secretary of the Interior shall evaluate the effects of approval of such application upon the ability of the United States to realize the value of such mineral interest as a result of approval of the application.

(B) The Secretary of the Interior shall—

(i) establish terms and conditions necessary to minimize the impact of such right-of-way on the establishment of logical mining units; and

(ii) determine the extent to which alternative routes are available which would minimize the impact of granting the right-of-way on the ability of the Federal Government to realize the value of Federal coal.

(C) The Secretary of the Interior shall establish the fair market value of the Federal coal precluded from being recovered as a result of the proposed right-of-way. The Secretary of the Interior shall also establish the amount of reduction of the fair market value of Federal coal which will be more costly to recover as a result of the proposed right-of-way.

(3) The Secretary shall thereafter establish such terms and conditions requiring the applicant to pay the United States the amount established by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to subparagraph (C).

(i) RULES AND REGULATIONS.—The Secretary shall promulgate such rules and regulations as are necessary for the expeditious exercise of the authority granted in this section.

(j) ADDITIONAL REQUIREMENT.—In implementing this section, the Secretary shall be subject to the provisions of section 210 of Public Law 90-537, as amended (43 U.S.C. 1511).

PRIMACY OF STATE WATER LAW

SEC. 5. (a) No person, legal entity, or governmental entity (including the United States, a State or subdivision thereof), their agents, permittees, licensees, or transferees, or any interstate coal pipeline distribution system, shall control, reserve, appropriate, purchase, transfer, use, divert, dedicate, dispose of, distribute, acquire, exercise, export or claim water, or any right or interest therein, for export or use within or outside the State granting or denying the export or use of water in an interstate coal pipeline distribution system, unless such control, reservation, appropriation, purchase, transfer, use, diversion, dedication, disposal, distribution, acquisition, exercise, export or claim takes place pursuant to and in compliance with the State water law of that State. Such State water law shall be enforced even though enforcement would result in the failure to build an interstate coal pipeline distribution system, and even though it would result in uneven and disparate effects on interstate commerce.

(b) In full recognition of its powers under Article I, section 8, of the United States Constitution, Congress expressly delegates to the States the power to regulate the use or export of water in interstate coal pipeline distribution systems, through State water laws, notwithstanding any adverse impact such delegation may have on interstate commerce or on any interstate coal pipeline distribution system. This delegation expressly includes but is not limited to provisions of State water law which provide for the establishment or exercise of terms or conditions (including terms or conditions terminating use or relating to or prohibiting the export of water) on permits or authorizations for, interests in, or rights to control, reservation, appropriation, purchase, transfer, use, diversion, dedication, disposal, distribution, acquisition, exercise, export or claim of water for the export or use in any interstate coal pipeline distribution system.

(c) Nothing in this act shall—

(1) impair the validity of or preempt any provision of state water law, or of any interstate compact governing water;

(2) alter the rights of any State to its apportioned share of the waters of any body of surface or groundwater, whether determined by past or future interstate compacts, or by past or future legislative or final judicial allocations;

(3) preempt or modify any State or Federal law or interstate compact dealing with water quality or disposal;

(4) confer upon any non-Federal entity the ability to exercise any Federal right to the waters of any stream or to any ground water resources; or

(5) affect water rights of any Indian or Indian tribe which were established by the setting aside of a reservation by treaty, executive order, agreement or Act of the Congress.

(d) No waters to which a Federal right can be asserted shall be used or exported in any interstate coal pipeline distribution system, unless authorized pursuant to and subject to State water law in the same manner as provided for in subsection (a).

APPLICATION OF STATE AND LOCAL LAWS OTHER THAN STATE WATER LAW

SEC. 6. (a) Nothing in this Act shall impair the validity of or preempt any State or local law, regulation, or rule of law pertaining to the location, construction, operation, or maintenance of an interstate coal pipeline distribution system except where such State or local law, regulation, or rule of law discriminates against interstate coal pipeline distribution systems.

(b) Access to water for the operation and maintenance of an interstate coal pipeline distribution system shall be governed by State laws and procedures except where such State laws and procedures would discriminate against such access.

UNDERGROUND CONSTRUCTION

SEC. 7. All coal pipelines granted Federal powers of eminent domain, pursuant to the provisions of this Act, for rights-of-way and extensions thereof shall, to the maximum extent practicable, consistent with environmental protection, safety, and good engineering and technological practices, be located underground, and the person holding such right of Federal eminent domain shall replace sufficient topsoil on disturbed areas so that a vegetative cover, comprised of native species where practicable, can be re-established at least equal in extent of cover as that which sustained the natural vegetation in the area.

CONTINUING JURISDICTION OF STATE PUBLIC UTILITY COMMISSIONS

SEC. 8. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to require any forms of automatic passthrough of, or preempt the ratemaking authority of any State utility regulatory agency or the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission with respect to costs related to construction, operation, and maintenance of any interstate coal pipeline distribution system, whether or not such costs have been provided for by contract between a utility and the interstate coal pipeline distribution system operator.

LIMITATION ON FURTHER REGULATION

SEC. 9. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the further regulation of, or to relate to or otherwise affect the regulation of, interstate common carriers.

APPLICABILITY OF ENVIRONMENTAL CONTROL LAWS

SEC. 10. Any interstate coal pipeline distribution system authorized under this Act shall be subject to the requirements of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, as amended (33 U.S.C. 466 et seq.), and any other applicable Federal environmental control laws.

WATER DISCHARGE REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 11. Prior to the issuance of any findings pursuant to section 4 of this Act, the Secretary shall notify the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency of his consideration of the application for a determination under subsection (4)(a). The Secretary and the person applying for such determination shall provide such information as the Administrator shall require to conduct a review of the ability of the proposed interstate coal pipeline distribution system to comply with Federal water discharge requirements. The Administrator shall have one hundred and twenty days from the date of receipt of such notification to conduct such review and to advise the Secretary with respect thereto. The Secretary shall not issue any findings pursuant to section 4 unless he has received a report from the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency advising that, in the judgment of the Administrator, it can reasonably be expected that the water discharge can meet the requirements of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

ACCESS TO COAL PIPELINE TRANSPORTATION CONTRACTS

SEC. 12. (a)(1) By filing a contract between a prospective shipper and a pipeline carrier with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission (hereinafter referred to as the Commission), within ten business days of signing said contract, any person operating or proposing to operate an interstate coal pipeline distribution system may enter into contracts with one or more shippers of coal to provide transportation under specified rates, terms and conditions but may not unreasonably discriminate by refusing to enter into similar contracts under similar rates, terms and conditions with other shippers who are seeking service from the same origin areas to the same terminus areas and are ready, fit, willing, and able to enter into such contracts in a contemporaneous period. The term "ready, fit, willing and able" as used in this section includes, but is not limited to financial fitness. Such contract filing shall include all rates, terms and conditions of said contract.

(2) Service under a contract executed pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection is deemed to be a separate and distinct class of service. Persons operating interstate coal pipeline distribution systems shall be obligated to perform only those duties specified by the terms and conditions of any such contract in connection with the services provided under such contract. Service under such contracts shall not be interrupted for the purpose of prorating or allocating to other shippers the pipeline capacity committed to service under such contracts.

(b)(1) Any person operating or proposing to operate an interstate coal pipeline distribution system who files contract under this section for the transportation of a volume of coal that would totally obligate the capacity of the pipeline shall, in the 60-day period beginning on the date of the filing of such contract, enter into contracts with shippers who are ready, fit, willing and able to enter into such contracts under rates, terms and conditions similar to the rates, terms and conditions contained in the contract that has been so filed. That person shall enter into such similar contracts in the chronological order in which binding written offers to enter into such similar contracts are submitted to such person. The obligation imposed by this subsection shall remain in effect—

(A) until the capacity of the pipeline is totally committed for providing transportation under contracts approved under this section, or

(B) until the end of the 60-day period, whichever occurs first.

(2) Not later than the 30th day following the end of such 60-day period, a shipper of coal may file a complaint with the Commission on the grounds that the person operating the interstate coal pipeline distribution system is violating this subsection.

(3) If, following a notice and an opportunity for a hearing, but not later than the 30th day following the filing of a complaint in accordance with paragraph (2) of this subsection, the Commission finds that the person is violating this subsection and has, with respect to the complaining shipper, an obligation under this subsection to enter into a contract, the Commission shall order that person to provide the service specified in the offer under such rates, terms and conditions contained in the contract that is filed with the Commission under paragraph (1) of this subsection. In addition, if the Commission finds that a person is violating this subsection by entering into contracts with shippers of coal pursuant to paragraph (1) of this subsection in an order other than the order in which binding offers are submitted, the Commission shall establish the proper order of such for approval under subsection (c) of this section.

(4) The Commission may not approve, under this section, any contract for the transportation of coal by pipeline—

(A) if approval of such contract will result in the total tonnage of coal obligated to be transported by the pipeline in any period under contracts approved under this section exceeding the maximum capacity of the pipeline in such period; or

(B) if the provision of coal transportation services under such contract would result in a destructive competitive practice.

SUMMARY

Section 2 sets forth the findings and purpose of the bill which is to facilitate the development of interstate coal slurry pipeline systems by granting the Federal power of eminent doman to those systems that are determined to be in the national interest. Any such development shall be subject to state water law.

Section 3 sets forth the definitions within the bill. Significant among these is a definition of "state water law". This phrase, as defined, includes existing and future substantive and procedural statutory law, State constitutional provisions, judicial decisions and administrative law which apply to water. It also makes clear that State water law which might be invalid in the absence of this legislation on the grounds that it poses an impermissible burden on commerce, shall not be deemed invalid as it applies to interstate coal pipeline systems.

Section 4 sets forth procedures for granting and acquiring the Federal power of eminent domain. Subsection (a) requires the Secretary of Energy to determine whether the construction of the proposed interstate coal pipeline system would be in the national interest. Prior to a determination, the applicant must file and secure approval of a water permit or other appropriate authorization.

Section 4 (b) requires the Secretary of Energy to make findings on five specified criteria as a basis for determining whether the pipeline is in the national interest. The criteria include transportation needs, competition, economic benefits, national security, and the environment.

Section 4 (c) sets aside a portion of the capacity of the pipeline for small and independent producers, defined as those who produce 200,000 tons of coal or less, and are not affiliated with other companies.

Section 4 (d) provides for procedures and time limitations on proceedings required for the Secretary to make a national interest determination.

Section 4 (e) requires the Attorney General to assess the effects upon competition of approval of the application for an interstate coal pipeline system. No application may be determined to be in the national interest if the application is not consistent with the antitrust laws.

Section 4 (f) authorizes the use of Federal eminent domain power to those persons whose applications for constructing an interstate coal pipeline system have been determined to be in the national interest. This provision imposes certain limitations on rights-of-way that may be acquired by exercising the power of eminent domain.

Section 4(g) permits the applicant to amend his application to request a right-of-way over any alternative route. The Secretary may also require the relocation of any right-of-way under certain circumstances.

Section 4(h) requires the Secretary of the Interior to evaluate the effects of a proposed interstate coal pipeline system upon the ability of the United States to recover the value of affected mineral interests. The Secretary shall require the applicant to pay the fair market value of coal precluded from being recovered as a result of the proposed right-of-way.

Section 4(i) requires the Secretary of Energy to promulgate rules and regulations necessary to exercise the eminent domain authority provided for in this section.

Section 5 establishes the primacy of State water law. Subsection (a) prohibits any person from using water for export or use in any interstate coal pipeline system, unless such export or use is pursuant to the substantive and procedural law of the State where the diversion takes place. State water law shall be enforced even if such enforcement means that an interstate coal pipeline system shall not be constructed.

Section 5(b) delegates to the State the power to regulate the export or use of water in an interstate coal pipeline system, even if it would constitute an impermissible burden on interstate commerce.

Section 5(c) provides that this bill does not impair the validity of or preempt any provision of State water law or interstate compact governing the use of water.

Section 5(d) denies the use of any water for which a Federal right can be asserted unless it is authorized under State water law.

Section 6(a) provides that State and local laws and regulations are not preempted by the bill unless such laws discriminate against interstate coal pipeline systems.

Section 6(b) provides that access to water for the operation and maintenance of an interstate coal pipeline system shall be governed by State laws and procedures except where they discriminate against such access.

Section 7 requires underground construction, to the maximum extent practicable, of interstate coal pipeline systems. This section also requires the replacement of topsoil in disturbed areas.

Section 8 makes clear that nothing in this measure requires any form of automatic passthrough of, or preempts the ratemaking authority of any State utility regulatory agency or the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission with respect to costs associated with the interstate coal pipeline system.

Section 9 makes clear that nothing in this bill shall be construed to authorize the further regulation of interstate common carriers.

Section 10 provides that interstate coal pipeline systems authorized by this bill are subject to the requirements of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, and other relevant Federal environmental control laws.

Section 11 requires the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a review of the ability of an interstate coal pipeline system to comply with Federal water discharge requirements. The Secretary shall not make a determination of national interest unless the Administrator reasonably expects that the water discharge from the proposed system can meet the requirements of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

Section 12(a) provides that any person who proposes to operate an interstate coal pipeline system, and files with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission a contract between a prospective shipper and a pipeline carrier within ten business days of signing the contract, may enter into long-term contracts with one or more shippers of coal to provide transportation under specified rates, terms and conditions. Coal pipeline operators are obligated to perform only those duties specified by such contract. These contracts shall be enforceable and are not subject to prorationing once in effect.

Section 12(b) provides that in cases where the pipeline operator files a contract under this section for the transportation of a volume of coal which is less than the total pipeline capacity the operator shall enter into subsequent contracts with shippers in the chronological order in which written offers are submitted, provided the shipper is "ready, fit, willing, and able". This section also provides a shipper with the right to file a complaint with the Commission if access to the pipeline is unfairly denied by the pipeline operator. This provision further provides that the Commission may not approve a contract if it would result in a transportation obligation that exceeds the maximum capacity of the pipeline, or if it would result in a destructive competitive practice.●

By Mr. LUGAR (for himself, Mr. MATHIAS, and Mr. DOLE):

S. 995. A bill to express the opposition of the United States to the apartheid policies of the Government of South Africa and to encourage South Africa to abandon such policies; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

OPPOSITION TO APARTHEID POLICIES OF THE GOVERNMENT SOUTH AFRICA

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, today I introduce on behalf of myself, Senator MATHIAS, and Senator DOLE a bill to address the important issues surrounding American policy toward the Republic of South Africa. The bill seeks to provide direct, tangible assistance to the black majority in South Africa in its effort to gain full political, economic, and social rights in South Africa and to provide that in the absence of progress in eliminating apartheid, it shall be American policy to consider economic measures against the Government of South Africa.

The bill provides for the creation of a $15 million scholarship program for black South Africans, one-third of which will be reserved for programs to enable black teachers to improve their educational credentials. Education has been a high priority for blacks in South Africa, since it will only be through the creation of a strong, viable, and well-educated black community that they will be able to wage successfully their own political struggle for human rights and justice.

The bill also provides for making permanent the Kassebaum Human Rights Fund, which was started in 1983, and for increasing the funding level of this program to $1.5 million. This program provides small grants to community organizations in South Africa promoting a more just society or aiding the victims of apartheid. The grants are small in part to avoid turning the community organizations into U.S. Government aid programs. It is important to remember, in our desire to help, that the impetus for change in South Africa must always be from the South African people themselves. We can support their efforts, but we cannot seek to manage or control their efforts.

The Sullivan Principles effort has been a major success story of American private initiative in fostering a more just society in South Africa. Much of the credit for this effort must go to the leadership of the Rev. Leon Sullivan of Philadelphia, who had the courage and vision to come up with an innovative approach to the challenge that apartheid presents the world. The bill we are introducing today provides for the Sullivan Principles to be mandatory for all American companies in South Africa which employ more than 25 persons there. The penalty for failing to comply with the principles is the denial of U.S. Government assistance for export activities of noncomplying firms, and a prohibition on new investment in South Africa for those firms. A company which is not a good corporate citizen in its operations in South Africa should not benefit from the prestige of the U.S. Government in carrying out its activities in either South Africa or in other parts of the world.

The bill also addresses the employment practices of the U.S. Government in South Africa. The U.S. Government is one of the larger American employers in South Africa, with some 181 direct hire, contract, or official residence employees. As a government, we are not taking those positive steps that other American employers have deemed necessary to enable black employees to overcome the handicaps that inevitably arise in an apartheid society. For instance, many American employers in South Africa provide assistance to their black employees to move into new career fields because the opportunity to have done so in the past was so severely limited. Under standard government employment practices, we are limited to providing only training and education to enable employees to carry out their present duties more effectively. Some of the American companies provide additional assistance to their black employees to enable them to send their children to nonsegregated private schools rather than to the segregated public schools. Others make a deliberate effort to channel contracts to the emerging black business community. These are examples of ways in which we should be acting in South Africa, to set an example for other American entities in South Africa rather than legislating for others what we do or not do as a government.

The bill also directs the Export-Import Bank and the Overseas Private Investment Corp. to carry out their activities in an effort to promote black business enterprise. For many years, black South Africans were severely hampered in their independent businesses by a host of apartheid laws. These laws are being changed, but their legacy has been to deny black South Africans the financial resources to take advantage of today's opportunities. Perhaps in some small way, we can help them overcome this legacy of apartheid. And I believe firmly that we should assist black South Africans to overcome the legacy of apartheid in this as well as in other areas.

OPIC will be directed to provide a full range of its services on behalf of joint ventures between Americans and black South Africans as long as the South African partner or partners have a majority interest in the venture or as long as there is a program for the South Africans to assume a majority position over the term of the joint venture. American businesses have taken the lead in this field, and it is time the American Government got behind their efforts. American banks helped provide the financial backing that created the first black-owned bank in South Africa, and IBM recently helped establish the first black-owned computer dealership in the heart of the formerly white-only Johannesburg downtown business district. Mobil and Ford have helped launch black automobile dealerships. More can be done with our assistance.

Finally, the bill incorporates the language of the Mathias bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations on March 27 by a vote of 16 to 1. This bill sets forth American expectations for progress on the elimination of apartheid and states that the President shall make a report to Congress within 2 years on the progress that is being made to eliminate apartheid. In the event the President determines that sufficient progress has not been made, he will recommend one or more of a specified list of economic measures. I sincerely hope that the South African Government will so conduct its policy that the President will be able to report to Congress that significant progress has been made.

The message of the bill is a two-fold message: Apartheid must end and the United States stands ready to provide tangible help to South Africans to enable them to overcome the burdens of apartheid. As President Reagan said 4 years ago, apartheid is abhorrent. He also asked "Shouldn't we be trying to be helpful?" I think he spoke for all Americans. This bill is a step toward ending apartheid and beginning the process of erasing its effects on South Africa. I ask that all Members of the Senate consider this approach carefully and join as cosponsors of this bill. It is important that the Senate speak with a strong, united voice on this important and complex foreign policy issue.●

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today I join in sponsoring a bill introduced by Mr. LUGAR and supported by Mr. DOLE that addresses the problem of apartheid in South Africa. The heart of this bill is the legislation adopted by the Foreign Relations Committee by a vote of 16 to 1 on March 27, which I introduced. That committee passed bill is also being reported to the Senate today.

The administration's policy of constructive engagement has born little fruit and needs to be reassessed. The massacre at Uitenhage reinforced for Americans everywhere the daily discrimination and dangers faced by South Africa's black population. The abhorrent policy of apartheid that led to this massacre must end. It is time for the U.S. to act.

The question that faces the Senate is how best to fashion legislation which creates the rewards and punishments needed to bring reform to South Africa. To answer this question, I turned to the principles of Bishop Tutu who is a South African and can best tell us what will work in his country.

Bishop Tutu's advice was to create a time period for reform, perhaps 2 years, and to put the Government of South Africa on notice that economic sanctions would be imposed if certain reforms were not made. I believe Bishop Tutu was wise in the advice that he gave because it allows for human nature. Economic sanctions imposed now and implemented immediately could simply lead to a hardening of South Africa's policies because they would have already paid the penalty and no incentives are provided.

The bill states that it is now the policy of the United States to implement economic sanctions if within 2 years significant progress has not been made toward ending the policy of apartheid. It provides both a carrot and a stick. The carrot is continued economic relations on the current basis if reforms are made. The stick is economic sanctions if these reforms are not made.

I also turned to the works of Bishop Tutu to determine which specific reforms are of immediate importance to the blacks of South Africa. The bill requires the President to report to Congress on Bishop Tutu's criteria by March 1, 1986, and to use them in making a judgment as to whether significant progress has been made in reforming apartheid. It will be clear to the Government of South Africa what they have to do to maintain their current economic relationship with the United States.

The criteria that I understand were suggested by Bishop Tutu and contained in the bill are progress in: First, housing black workers with their families; second, abolishing the pass laws which prevent blacks from moving freely into the cities; third, terminating the migrant labor system; fourth, allowing unrestricted labor union rights for all; and fifth, increasing local investment in black education and training.

If the President, using these criteria, determines that significant progress has not been made, then it will be the policy of the United States to implement economic sanctions. The bill lists four sanctions for the President to consider. If the President under these circumstances fails to impose sanctions, the bill also provides for expedited procedures in the Senate and highly privileged procedures in the House of Representatives for any joint resolution seeking to implement sanctions.

In addition to these measures, the bill calls upon the President to raise the issue of reform in South Africa during the upcoming economic summit and to suggest the creation of an Inter-Allied Working Group on South Africa. The effort to reform apartheid will not work unless the effort includes all the industrialized democracies.

The bill which I am cosponsoring with Mr. LUGAR and Mr. DOLE contains other provisions which should ease the plight of some black South Africans while reforms are hopefully being made to the apartheid system. These provisions include:

A $15 million scholarship program for black South Africans.

The provision of $1.5 million for the Human Rights Fund for South African blacks.

Authority for the Overseas Private Investment Corporation and the Export Import Bank to encourage black-run business in South Africa.

The establishment of model labor practices for blacks in South Africa employed by the U.S. Government.

Strong incentives for U.S. businesses in South Africa to use these same model labor practices.

Mr. President, these measures may not convince the Government of South Africa. We do not control that government, we can only try to influence it. I believe the measures contained in my bill, as reported by the committee, and now those in the bill I have cosponsored with Mr. LUGAR and Mr. DOLE, offer a reasonable prospect of persuading that government to join the march of history toward justice and freedom.●

By Mr. CHILES:

S. 996. A bill to amend Public Law 96-350 to further define the customs waters for the purposes of certain drug offenses; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

JURISDICTION OF DRUG TRAFFICKERS IN INTERNATIONAL WATERS

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, for years our Nation has been fighting a war against drug traffickers. Florida has been on the front lines of that war since the beginning.

While we are still a long way from winning the war, we have won some battles. Several years ago, we amended the posse comitatus statute so that now the military can assist, to a limited degree, in drug interdiction missions.

Unfortunately, drug traffickers have found a legal loophole which enables them to escape conviction even after our law enforcement agencies, often aided by the Coast Guard, Customs and the military, have made arrests.

Their defense tactic argues that the United States does not have jurisdiction in international waters to arrest or seize foreign drug ships. This argument has held up in court even in cases when our Coast Guard has received authority from the flag country for the arrest.

To remedy this problem I am introducing companion legislation to H.R. 2132, introduced by Congressman SHAW in the House, which will close that loophole by amending 21 USC sec. 955(a). With this change, the law will more clearly define the kind of authority we must obtain from a foreign country in order to have jurisdiction over drug traffickers in international waters. The intent of the law we seek to amend was to allow the United States to interdict criminals in international waters. This legislation will restore the enforcement power to that law.●

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S. 997. A bill to improve the operation of the strategic petroleum reserve and to authorize emergency financial assistance during an oil supply disruption; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS ACT

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing the Emergency Preparedness Act of 1985. This bill is similar to the bill I introduced last year that was marked up in the Energy and Natural Resources Committee last June, and it is similar to the bills and amendments I have offerred in committee and on the floor since 1981.

The state of our preparedness for the next disruption to our oil supplies is, ironically, both shocking and well known. We know that the world now relies, and will increasingly rely, on oil from the Middle East, a region continually buffeted by instability, confrontation, and war. We know that a disruption in the world's oil supply will raise the price of oil in all economies that participate in the world oil market. We know that the increase in oil prices will be about the same in all countries, no matter how much the countries depended on Middle East oil the day before the disruption. The United States, with our relatively low level of purchases from the Middle East, will face the same price increase as Europe and Japan, with their relatively high levels of purchases from the Middle East.

We know all this, and yet we hesitate to fill our strategic petroleum reserve. We allow the procedures for extracting oil from the SPR to be cumbersome and untested. We neglect to make any allowances for those people and local governments who will be least able to adapt to the higher prices that will accompany the oil supply disruption. The bill I am introducing addresses these glaring deficiencies in our preparedness for the inevitable.

The bill is straightforward. First, it allows the President to conduct a test sale of the oil in the SPR. A test sale would demonstrate that the oil can be withdrawn, sold, transported, and refined. Current law prohibits such a demonstration.

Second, the bill allows the President to divert oil destined for the SPR onto the market if an oil supply disruption appears imminent. Again, this is not allowed under current law.

Third, the bill authorizes the President to establish programs to sell a limited portion of SPR oil in anticipation of, instead of in response to, an oil supply disruption. One promising method is the sale of SPR options.

Finally, the bill require the President to prepare, and authorizes him to implement, a program of emergency block grants to States to enable them to deal with the effects of suddenly higher oil prices during an oil emergency. These block grants would be sent to States pursuant to an emergency supplemental appropriation which would also specify how much emergency assistance would be provided to each State.

Mr. President, we are not prepared for the next oil supply disruption. The provisions of this bill, together with continued construction and fill of the strategic petroleum reserve, are desperately needed. The Energy and Natural Resources Committee will soon take up the reauthorization of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act. This law provides the basic emergency authorities, including SPR authorities. This reauthorization is the logical vehicle for the authorities contemplated in the bill I introduce today. I look forward to the hearings on this reauthorization at which I will ask the witnesses for their opinions on the privisions of this bill.

I urge my colleagues to examine and support this bill. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be included at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 997

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "Emergency Preparedness Act of 1985."

STATEMENT OF FINDINGS AND PURPOSES

SEC. 2. (a) Congress finds and declares that—

(1) disruptions in the supply of imported oil are likely during the next decade;

(2) such emergencies will disrupt normal petroleum market operations; the Strategic Petroleum Reserve should be used, and used early, to mitigate the potential for market turmoil;

(3) if oil stockpiles are unavailable or insufficient to fully offset the reduction in oil available to the world oil market, oil prices will rise, possibly rapidly and to high levels;

(4) without compensating action, such high prices will create severe economic dislocations and individual hardships;

(5) severe oil supply disruptions constitute a threat to public health, safety and welfare which can most effectively, efficiently, and equitably be dealt with through early use of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve and prompt fiscal action by the executive branch of Government; and

(6) no emergency program will be able to avoid entirely the market disruptions and personal hardships that will accompany a petroleum supply disruption; however, prompt fiscal action by the executive branch of Government will reduce individual hardships and economic dislocations more effectively than other mechanisms used in the past.

(b) The purpose of this Act is to grant the President of the United States authority to sell in advance of a supply disruption options to purchase SPR oil, to improve the operation of the SPR, to authorize a test sale of SPR oil, and to provide financial assistance to low-income Americans during an oil supply disruption.

SEC. 3. (1) Definitions "United States" means the several States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and the Trusts and Territories of the United States.

(2) "State" means the 50 states, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, or the Trusts and Territories of the United States.

TITLE I—STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE

SEC. 101. Part B of title I of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. Sec. 6231-6247) is amended by inserting after section 167 the following new section:

"STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE PETROLEUM TEST SALE

"SEC. 168(a). Notwithstanding any provision of this Part other than this section, the Secretary of Energy may conduct a test sale of at least 1.0 million but not more than 5 million barrels of Strategic Petroleum Reserve petroleum products.

"(b) Any such test sale shall be in accordance with the provisions of the Strategic Petroleum Distribution Plan and implementing regulations and contract provisions, modified as the Secretary of Energy believes appropriate to adjust them to the artificialities of a test and the absence of an actual energy supply shortage.

"(c) All petroleum products shall be sold during test sale at a price not less than that which the Secretary of Energy determines appropriate in the circumstances of the test nor, in any event, at less than eighty (80) percent of the price estimated by the Secretary of Energy for comparable petroleum product being sold in the same area at the time the Reserve's petroleum product is offered for sale.

"(d) For any fiscal year in which a test sale is conducted, the minimum required fill rate in effect under section 160(c) and Public Law 98-146 shall be reduced by the amount of any oil withdrawn, pursuant to the test sale, from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve during the fiscal year in which the test sale occurs, and the minimum required fill rate otherwise in effect for next fiscal year shall be increased by the same amount."

CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

SEC. 102. Section 167(b) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. sec. 6247(b) is amended—

(a) in the first sentence, by adding "test sales of petroleum products from the Reserve," before "and the drawdown", and

(b) in paragraph (3) by adding "test sale under section 168 or" before"drawndown".

PREDRAWNDOWN DIVERSION OF SPR OIL

SEC. 103. Section 161 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act (42 U.S.C. 6241) is amended by adding the following new subsection:

"(g) If the President finds that a severe energy supply interruption appears to be imminent and that the world price of crude oil has as a result begun to increase, then the execution of new contracts for the purchase of petroleum products for and the injection of petroleum products into the Strategic Petroleum Reserve may be curtailed or suspended, and the provisions of sections 160 (c) and (d) shall not apply. The period during which such Presidential declaration is in effect and the quantity of any petroleum products involved shall be disregarded in applying the provisions of such subsections for periods following the effective period of such declaration. When such a declaration is in effect, the Secretary is authorized to sell, in accordance with the rules or regulations which he shall promulgate, any petroleum products acquired by contract and produced for storage in, but not injected into, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve. The receipts from such sales shall be deposited in the "SPR Petroleum Account" under section 167 and shall be subject to section 167(d)."

STRATEGIC PETROLEUM RESERVE OPTIONS

SEC. 104. The President may by rule establish programs which provide for the sale in advance of an oil supply disruption, notwithstanding section 161 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, of oil from the strategic petroleum reserve. Such programs may include the sale in advance of an oil supply disruption of rights to be exercised at the option of the buyer to purchase SPR oil at a specified price during a limited period of time following the sale of such rights. The programs established by such rule shall serve the purpose of Section 151(b) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act and shall only permit the sale of the volume of strategic petroleum reserve oil that the President determines to be consistent with national security interests and international obligations, and in no case more than 30 percent of the total volume of oil in the strategic petroleum reserve at the time of the sale.

TITLE II—EMERGENCY FINANCIAL RESPONSE

AUTHORITY TO PROVIDE EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE

SEC. 201. (a) The President shall under the authority of this Act supplement the rules implementing the Low Income Energy Assistance Program to provide an independent mechanism for emergency financial assistance in the form of standby block grants to State Governors (acting in accordance with State law) as part of the Federal Government's response to a petroleum disruption.

(b) The standy block plan under subsection (a), to the maximum extent practicable, shall provide for—

(1) the maintenance of essential public services so as to protect public health, safety, and welfare;

(2) the mitigation of extreme personal hardship caused by higher prices during the petroleum supply disruption; and

(3) maintenance of economic efficiency.

(c) The standby block grant plan shall include guidelines and requirements for State Governors (acting pursuant to state law) under which the block grants are conditioned, including provisions for submittal of State plans to ensure the objectives listed in subsection (b) are met. Reasonable accounting and auditing procedures shall be established. The standby block grant plan shall be developed in consultation with State Governors and State Legislatures and with the benefit of public participation.

(d) The requirements described in subsection (c) shall provide for a limitation on the percentage of the funds that may be used by state agencies for planning and administrative costs.

(e) The Secretary shall submit to the Congress within 90 days the standby block grant plan described in this Title.

IMPLEMENTATION OF THE STANDBY BLOCK GRANT PLAN

SEC. 202. If the President determines to implement the standby block grant program, then he shall transmit his determination to the Congress together with his request for an emergency supplemental appropriation, including his recommendation for a formula allocating the appropriated funds among the several States.

DIRECT FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 203. The President shall within 90 days of the enactment of this Title provide to the Congress his recommendations for changes in existing law so as to provide for direct Federal assistance to recipients to complement the standby block grant plan established under this Title. The President's recommendations shall provide for changes in existing Federal direct assistance programs, such as the Low-Income Energy Assistance Program or for such other forms of direct federal assistance as he deems appropriate, where the use of such programs in conjunction with the standby block grant plan would more effectively or more efficiently achieve the objectives in Sec. 201(b).

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 204. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such funds as may be necessary to carry out this title; the allocation of such funds among the several States shall be determined as provided in the emergency supplemental appropriation required by Section 202 of this Act.

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S.J. Res. 121. Joint resolution to designate June 15, 1985, as "National History Day;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL HISTORY DAY

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, today I introduce a joint resolution to designate June 15, 1985, as "National History Day." This special designation highlights the contribution the National History Day Contest makes to our young people's interest in history.

Since 1974, when the program started, it has attracted more and more attention among scholars and students; 10 years ago, only 100 students from one State were involved. Last year nearly 150,000 students from all over the United States took part in the competition. Local and regional contest winners progress to the national finals held at the University of Maryland where they display their research, reports, or rehearse their plays, all dealing with an annual theme.

The competition encourages greater understanding of world history, develops research skills, and fosters creative expression. It also produces better educated and more civic-minded citizens. Such results surely deserve our attention and support.

The success of our national effort to improve the American educational system will to a very large extent determine our potential for continued world leadership. Of particular importance to this effort is encouraging the study of history. History not only allows us to understand our past; it also illuminates our present society and provides a framework for the future. The study of history also helps our children to become responsible citizens—the bedrock of a democratic society.

On June 15, 1985, the award ceremony of the national history contest will be held. By adopting this resolution, the Congress can pay tribute to this program and the important contribution it makes to the teaching of history in the United States. I urge my fellow Senators to join me in cosponsoring this joint resolution.

By Mr. BRADLEY:

S.J. Res. 122. Joint resolution to authorize the President to proclaim the last Friday of April each year as "National Arbor Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL ARBOR DAY

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today a joint resolution to designate the last Friday in April as "National Arbor Day."

In 1970 and 1972, Congress legislated and the President proclaimed "the last Friday in April" in those 2 years as National Arbor Day. The legislation I am introducing would make this observation an annual event.

Our Nation's trees are one of our most important natural resources. Trees not only provide the raw materials for some of our basic industries, they are important stabilizers of our environment and they also provide natural grace and beauty to our lives. The establishment of an annual National Arbor Day would provide an important reminder to all our citizens to appreciate and protect this vitally important natural resource. Furthermore, this observance need not cost the Federal Government a cent. There is no need to establish an agency or a staff. The news media would gladly promote this date, provided it is on a uniform date each year.

The importance of this natural resource ought to also impel us to act promptly on the problem of forest decline. Scientists have observed growth declines, serious damage and death of a number of species of trees in large areas of Europe and the Eastern United States.

The most extensively documented case of forest damage is occurring in West Germany. In 1982, the Federal Minister of Food, Agriculture and Forestry reported damage to 8 percent of all trees; coniferous species were most seriously affected. In 1983 this figure increased to 34 percent. Today an estimated 55 percent of West Germany's forested area is damaged. And the damage does not end at the West German border. Switzerland, Austria, and Czechoslavakia report 10 percent of their forests have suffered damage or have died.

Here in the United States, damage to forests has ranged from decline in growth of several species of pines in southern New Jersey to widespread damage to the ponderosa pine in southern California. A number of other coniferous species have experienced growth decline in an 11 State region extending from Maine to Alabama.

While forest damage is well documented, the scientific debate continues as to the exact causes. Several causes have been hypothesized including such factors as aluminum toxicity, magnesium deficiency, ozone damage, excess nutrients and general stresses such as drought or insect infestation. Even though the mechanisms are as yet unclear, the role of air pollution in general and acid deposition in particular seem directly related. Research efforts have indicated that nitrous oxides may play an equal or greater role than sulfur oxides in damaging forests.

Last year I introduced legislation to transfer Forest Service resources from road building to pollution damage research. While research efforts continue, we must explore potential intermediate steps to protect this precious national resource.

Because of our concern about damage to our forests and trees it is particularly appropriate that we annually take special note of the importance of trees through designation of a National Arbor Day.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. NUNN, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. BOREN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. WILSON):

S.J. Res. 123. Joint resolution to designate Dr. Jonas Salk Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DR. JONAS SALK DAY

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a resolution honoring the man who developed the first vaccine against polio, Dr. Jonas E. Salk, by designating May 6, 1985 as Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day. Thirty years ago, in April 1955, the Salk polio vaccine was officially declared safe and effective for general use.

Many still remember the days when poliomyelitis, more commonly known as polio, killed and crippled thousands of men and women each year. The disease is known to have existed in ancient Egypt, but it was not identified in this country until 1894. By 1916, it had become a dreaded affliction. In that year more than 6,000 people died and 27,000 more were crippled by polio. Another outbreak in 1921 left Franklin Delano Roosevelt paralyzed from the waist down. Nearly four decades later, in 1949, more than 24,000 people were stricken. Polio was a grim part of American life. Four years later, Dr. Salk developed the vaccine, sparing millions from the disease.

Dr. Salk was born in New York City in 1914, the son of a garment worker. He attended City College on a scholarship, and graduated from the New York University School of Medicine in 1939. After a 2 year internship at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, he became a professor of epidemiology at the University of Michigan. In the late 1940's, while serving as director of the Virus Research Laboratory at the University of Pittsburgh, Dr. Salk began his extensive research on influenza and poliomyelitis. In 1953, he developed the polio vaccine. The vaccine consists of the three principal strains of the polio virus, neutralized with formaldehyde and injected into the body. The neutralized virus stimulates the body to produce polio antibodies, which then can repel later exposure to the polio virus. Dr. Salk and his own family were among the first tested with the experimental vaccine.

In 1954, the March of Dimes led a massive nationwide project to test the vaccine's effectiveness. More than 20,000 physicians and public health officials, 40,000 registered nurses, 220,000 volunteers and a half million school children participated in the tests; and finally, on April 12, 1955, the Salk vaccine was declared safe and effective for public use. The benefits were immediate, and by the time the Sabin oral vaccine was approved 7 years later, polio outbreaks had declined 97 percent. President Dwight D. Eisenhower awarded Dr. Salk the Congressional Medal of Honor for this "great achivement in the field of medicine."

Today, 90 percent of American children between the ages of 5 and 14 have received one of the polio vaccines, and in 1983, just eight cases of this disease were reported in the United States. It is difficult to fully express our thanks to Dr. Salk and the others who developed the polio vaccine. This resolution, to honor Dr. Salk on the 30th anniversary of the Salk vaccine's approval, is one small way to pay tribute.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 123

Whereas Dr. Jonas E. Salk discovered the first effective vaccine that was approved for widespread use against poliomyelitis in 1955 and was awarded a congressional gold medal for the discovery;

Whereas poliomyelitis epidemics were a fact of life in the United States before the Salk vaccine was discovered;

Whereas during the most severe epidemic of poliomyelitis, which occurred in 1952, 57,626 persons were stricken with the disease and 3,330 persons died;

Whereas the incidence of poliomyelitis in the United States was reduced by 97 percent through the use of the Salk vaccine before another effective vaccine against the disease was discovered;

Whereas Dr. Salk still serves the Salk Institute for Biological Studies, which he founded in 1963, as a distinguished professor of international health sciences;

Whereas the Salk Institute for Biological Studies, under the leadership of Dr. Salk, has earned a reputation for being in the vanguard of basic biological research on molecular-cellular mechanisms in genetics, immunology, and neurobiology;

Whereas on May 6, 1985, the City University of New York will host a dinner to honor Dr. Salk, who is a graduate of the City College of New York, and to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the licensing of the Salk vaccine for public use;

Whereas the proceeds from the honorary dinner for Dr. Salk will be used to support the Jonas E. Salk Scholarships for Medical Study; and

Whereas the historic achievement of Dr. Salk deserves recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 6, 1985, hereby is designated "Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleague, Senator MOYNIHAN, as a cosponsor of a resolution designating May 6, 1985, as "Dr. Jonas E. Salk Day."

Dr. Jonas Edward Salk, a native New Yorker, is both a brilliant physcian and scientist and a great American. His ability was recognized at a young age when he was described as a person who "read everything he could lay his hands on, tried to be a perfectionist in school work, and earned high grades"—New York Times, October 11, 1953. He earned his BS degree from the College of the City of New York and then studied medicine at New York University College of Medicine.

Dr. Salk's most notable achievement has been the development of a killed-virus vaccine that proved to be effective in preventing polio. His efforts are responsible for virtually eliminating polio as a public health threat. In 1952 he tested a group of children with polio and found that after innoculation their antibody levels rose significantly. The vaccine was then administered to persons who had never had polio. By the end of 1954, the results indicated that the vaccine was safe and effective in reducing the incidence of polio. Dr. Salk, confident of his vaccine, tested it on himself, as well as his wife and children. He also pledged that he would be personally responsible and accountable for its use.

Dr. Salk's honors include the Congressional Gold Medal, a Presidential Citation, and the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

Dr. Salk's polio vaccine is responsible for reducing polio from epidemic proportions in 1952 to a rare virus today. He has saved many lives and assisted many others who may have been affected by polio. It is fitting that we honor Dr. Salk as a great American hero.

Mr. President, I urge adoption of this resolution.●

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 83

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the name of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 83, a joint resolution designating the week beginning on May 5, 1985, as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 92

At the request of Mr. DENTON, the names of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], and the Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 92, a joint resolution to designate October 1985 as "National Foster Grandparents Month".

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 101

At the request of Mr. LEVIN, the names of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 101, a joint resolution to designate April 24, 1985, as "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 107

At the request of Mrs. HAWKINS, the names of the Senator from Utah [Mr HATCH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 107, a joint resolution to designate the month of May 1985 as "Older Americans Month."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 116

At the request of Mr. PELL, his name was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 116, a joint resolution to assure the cost of living adjustments for Social Security recipients.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 118

At the request of Mrs. HAWKINS, the name of the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 118, a joint resolution to designate May 25, 1985 as "Missing Children Day."

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 14

At the request of Mr. MOYNIHAN, the name of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 14, a concurrent resolution to express the sense of the Congress that Josef Mengele should be brought to justice.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 20

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the names of the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] were added as cosponsors of Senate Concurrent Resolution 20, a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that payments by the Veterans' Administration to veterans as compensation for service-connected disabilities should remain exempt from Federal income taxation.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 22

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the name of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 22, a concurrent resolution to express the sense of the Congress that sufficient appropriations should be made available for the Job Corps Program in order to maintain it as a viable Federal effort to assist economically-disadvantaged youths in obtaining and holding employment and contributing to society.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 24

At the request of Mr. MATTINGLY, the name of the Senator from Alaska [Mr. MURKOWSKI] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 24, a concurrent resolution to direct the Commissioner of Social Security and the Secretary of Health and Human Services to develop a plan outlining the steps which might be taken to correct the Social Security benefit disparity known as the notch problem.

SENATE RESOLUTION 50

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the name of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 50, a resolution reaffirming the Senate's commitment to the Job Corps Program.

SENATE RESOLUTION 81

At the request of Mr. ARMSTRONG, the names of the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. HEINZ] were added as cosponsors of Senate Resolution 81, a resolution to establish regulations to implement television and radio coverage of proceedings of the Senate.

SENATE RESOLUTION 112

At the request of Mr. COHEN, the name of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON] was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 112, a resolution relating to bilateral discussions between the United States and the Soviet Union to ban chemical weapons.

SENATE RESOLUTION 134

At the request of Mr. PELL, his name was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 134, a resolution to assure the cost of living adjustments for Social Security recipients.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 44—REGARDING A PERMANENT SITE FOR THE OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. BRADLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

S. CON. RES. 44

Whereas the Olympic games, which were begun more than 2,000 years ago in Greece to foster peace and goodwill among the city states, have more and more frequently become an arena not for sport but for nations to further their own political goals;

Whereas it is the athletes who suffer when nations use the Olympic games for propaganda purposes;

Whereas when nations boycott the Olympics it deprives the participating athletes from pitting their strength, skill, and endurance against all of their competitors to determine the best in the world;

Whereas the participants in the Olympic games form friendships that cross political and geographic borders and lead to better world understanding;

Whereas many millions of people cross this nation believe that the Olympic games should be insulated as much as possible from politics: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the International Olympic Committee should establish a permanent facility for the Olympic games on a site that is suitable for insulating the games from the unwarranted and disruptive international politics that have plagued the games in recent years.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, last year's withdrawal by the Soviet Union from the 1984 summer Olympic games provides an important opportunity. We have the chance to remove the games from the political arena and return them to their original purpose—to be an international gathering of the world's youth for the purpose of promoting mutual understanding.

Today, I will seize that opportunity and resubmit a concurrent resolution in the Senate calling for the establishment of a permanent facility for the Olympic games.

Since the Olympic games first began, they have been buffeted by politics. There were the Nazi Olympics of 1936; the withdrawal of the Swiss and Dutch in 1956 in condemnation of the Soviet invasion of Hungary; the events of 1968 and the assassinations of 1972, followed by the withdrawal of 28 Third World countries from the Montreal Olympics of 1976.

I remember when I participated in the games in Tokyo in 1964 waking up in the middle of the night to a commotion in the next dormitory. It was the North Koreans pulling out of the games.

It is time to remove the games from politics and give them a permanent home. One possible permanent site for the games is Greece, where they were held for nearly 12 centuries. Putting the summer Olympics permanently in Greece and the winter games in their own home would help the Olympics become a strong institution rather than short-lived competitions vulnerable to political or economic exploitation by temporary host countries and other nations.

If the games had had a permanent home in a neutral country, it is probable that neither the United States in 1980 nor the Soviet Union in 1984 would have withdrawn from the games. Given a stable, enduring setting, the games could take on a special identity of their own, much like the celebrations of old.

A permanent site for the Olympics should also be coupled with an extension of the games from 2 weeks to 2 months. One of the primary purposes of the games has always been to promote mutual understanding and brotherhood. The way to do this is by expanding the experience of the athlete who lives in the Olympic Village. That was the most enjoyable and memorable aspect of my experience.

I remember the athletes I shared those weeks with, and I remember the sense of pride and achievement. The Olympic games would be more participant oriented. Too often, the athlete is lost amid the multimillion-dollar construction projects. Too often the years of grueling training and individual discipline are overshadowed by extraneous events.

The Olympics should provide the basis for the beginnings of understanding. It requires bold planners to initiate a true permanent site with games that are true to the original goals. It requires the willingness to share the financial burden by hundreds of nations. It requires a revision of the rules, and personnel who govern the Olympic movement. It requires the belief on the part of all of us that peace can prevail. The time is now.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Nutrition of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry will hold a hearing on child nutrition programs, focusing on reauthorization and budget issues.

Senator RUDY BOSCHWITZ will chair the hearing which will be held on Thursday, May 2, 1985, at 9:30 a.m., in room 328-A, Russell Senate Office Building.

For further information call the committee staff at 224-2035.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, now that negotiations with the Soviet Union are certain, we have an excellent opportunity to once again draw attention to the plight of those in the Soviet Union who suffer daily under the tryanny of Soviet rule. Therefore, I am very pleased to take part in the Congressional Call to Conscience in which many of my colleagues are participating on behalf of Soviet Jews.

Time and again we hear the horror stories of abuses suffered by Jews and other religious and minority groups in the Soviet Union. However, many people are unaware that the number and severity of incidents are increasing at an alarming rate. The State Department document, "Country Reports on Human Rights Practices in 1984," states that 1984 was an exceptionally difficult year for the Jewish community. According to the report, 1984 "saw the beginning of a major, sustained crackdown on Hebrew teachers and other Jewish cultural activists." The methods used by Soviet authorities included threats, beatings, and harsh sentences to forced labor camps where conditions can only be described as subhuman. And for what reason? Simply because Jews are practicing and teaching their faith.

Under these conditions, it is becoming impossible for Soviet Jews to maintain their dignity and their heritage. In fact, it appears that a serious effort is being made by the Soviet leadership to exterminate all religious belief and believers as quickly as possible. This seems to be confirmed by the State Department report which indicates that more people are disappearing into the gulags and that only an incredibly small number of people are being allowed to emigrate.

In the past, when Soviet-United States relations have been good, the Soviet leadership has allowed increased numbers of Jews to emigrate. A pattern developed where emigration numbers began to increase prior to formal negotiations and while East and West experienced relatively higher levels of cooperation. During the period between 1968 and 1981, more than 250,000 Jews received permission to leave. However, as Soviet-United States relations declined over the course of the 1970's, Jewish emigration dropped. In fact, fewer than a thousand Jews escaped Soviet tyranny in the last year.

Certainly, Soviet-United States agreement or disagreement is not the only factor in the sharp decline in Jewish emigration. Once emigration policies were relaxed, applications for emigration flooded into Moscow, much to the chagrin of the Soviet leadership. Instead of dampening the desire to leave the Soviet Union, Jews started lining up to depart as quickly as possible, followed closely by the other religious and minority groups seeking freedom outside the Soviet state.

One of the questions that most disturbs me about Soviet-United States negotiations is this question of emigration. Instead of the normal Soviet action of increasing emigration prior to negotiations with the West, the Soviet Union is continuing to clamp down on the number of Jews receiving permission to leave. And at the same time, we hear rumors, as reported in the New York Times and the Washington Post last month, that a substantial increase in annual emigration might be possible if the Soviets get what they want from the talks.

As a matter of principle, it is appalling to me that the Soviet Union may be willing to barter with the lives of its own citizens for a more advantageous bargaining position.

Therefore, I hope instead that in the spirit of good will, the Soviets will begin to allow the free practice of religious and cultural beliefs within their country regardless of the progress of the talks. But just as importantly, I hope they will allow a policy of open emigration—based not just upon the upcoming negotiations, but as an ongoing humanitarian policy.

Until we see real progress in Soviet policy, we in the United States must remain vigilant. The Soviet Union has made promises—in the U.N. Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in the Helsinki Final Act, and elsewhere—that it will uphold basic human rights for its citizens. Therefore, it is both our duty and our right to actively work for the freedom of the individual regardless of boundary lines.

Many of my colleagues have joined in the Call to Conscience to make others aware of the plight of Soviet Jews. But we must not stop here. Let us continue to encourage the ideals of freedom that we in the United States claim as our right. Only by aiding others who suffer under the tyranny of regimes such as the Soviet Union will we guarantee our own freedom.●

STUDENT AID

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, going through some newspapers that accumulated prior to the election of last year, when I did not have a chance to do much reading and reflecting—something all of us are guilty of before an election, I am afraid—I came across an article from The Washington Post of October 1 of last year, about the difficulties people have getting their children through college; and, particularly, the tragedy that is facing our country in the ability of fewer and fewer blacks, minorities and poorer families to take advantage of a college education.

This, I hasten to add, was all written before this administration decided it would reduce student aid much more drastically.

There are those who seem to believe that the college aid program we have now is some massive doling out of money that is handed to students almost at whim.

The article by Jane Bryant Quinn shows that is not the case.

If we were to make a judgment on the basis of the national need, we should be increasing student aid, not cutting it back, as this administration wants us to do.

I am also submitting for the RECORD a letter to the editor, written by Bob Anderson, that appeared in the Washington Post last month.

It effectively refutes the statements some people have been making in this administration.

The Jane Quinn article and the Bob Anderson letter, together, form a powerful message I hope this Congress will not ignore.

I ask that the article and letter be printed following my remarks.

The material is as follows:

DWINDLING COLLEGE AID HAS NARROWED WORLD FOR NEEDIEST STUDENTS

(By Jane Bryant Quinn)

NEW YORK.—There's an untold story behind the stark figures that show fewer blacks and minority students in college today. The colleges and universities are no longer recruiting them seriously, if there incomes are low. Admissions directors are still going after the superblacks, with top grades or special athletic talent. But for the average inner-city student, the open door of a decade ago is swinging shut.

The reason is money. The federal government quit adding big bucks to the programs that help educate lower-income youngsters, and private sources can't fill the gap.

"The economically deprived need many thousands of dollars to meet college costs," says Charles Marshall of the National Association of College Admissions Counselors, "and the schools are no longer in a position to offer them a full package of aid. Rather than raising false hopes among these students, the college recruiters are staying away."

Low-income students may have other choices. Many are going to inexpensive two-year community colleges; financial-aid expert Robert Leider told my associate, Virginia Wilson, and they might make it into a four-year college later. But finding the money will still be hard.

Here's what is happening to college aid, and the extent to which its loss has narrowed the world for a generation of the neediest students:

Low-income students depend primarily on federal grants. But the size of the average Pell grant (now $1,089) has not kept up with tuition inflation, so it covers a much smaller portion of college costs than it did a decade ago. The purchasing power of the maximum Pell for the very poorest students ($1,900) is down even more.

The G.I. bill for Vietnam-era veterans started running out toward the end of the 1970s; education benefits through Social Security started phasing out in 1982. Both programs were disproportionately used by lower-income people. In theory, Pell grants and other federal programs should have taken up the slack for the truly needy, but they never did.

Since 1980, the amount of federal money allotted to National Direct Student Loans has been cut nearly in half. The colleges make these loans to the neediest students, at only 5 percent interest. The big loss of funds, along with other problems in the program, has led directly to a substantial decline in the number of blacks in graduate schools, reports Mary Carter-Williams of the Institute for the Study of Educational Policy at Howard University.

A handful of states have increased the total amount of aid they give to low-income students, but many others are giving less. A study done for the National Association of State Scholarship and Grant Programs shows that the average amount of state aid per needy student has declined.

According to the National Student Aid Coalition, the talented but poor are 20 to 25 percent less likely to go to college than their wealthier peers; the poor of average ability are 40 percent less likely to get a college education.

One important point should be made about the access of low-income people to college. A study done for the American Council on Education shows that from 1974 to 1981, before the Reagan administration's scholarship cuts, the percentage of low-income blacks in college declined while the percentage of low-income white students was going up.

Those were years when inflation was badly eroding the value of financial aid, but why did it have a more harmful effect on minority students? The answer, Marshall believes, lies in the better counseling often available to students in predominantly white high schools.

Linda Berkshire of the National Student Aid Coalition says that many minority students don't know much about student aid, don't get enough personal counseling in their schools and don't have ready access to up-to-opaque language of personal finance. Some parents simply refuse to cooperate.

The smart and aggressive among the high-school counselors in inner-city schools are struggling for ways to meet the problem. They offer seminars on finding financial aid. They help parents fill in the application forms. They try to get students thinking early about college, to allow more time for financial planning.

Although their efforts can squeeze out more dollars from present programs for eligible students, they cannot awaken those of careless social conscience to the waste and tragedy of the unnecessarily undereducated. Taking money out of higher-education programs for the poor is a decision this country will come to regret.

WHO DECIDES WHO "DOESN'T BELONG" IN COLLEGE?

(By Bob Anderson)

I get angry when I hear college-educated, upper income professionals mouth off about colleges being filled with those who "don't belong there." The latest in this cynical round of "college bashing" comes from Robert J. Samuelson, who arrogantly asserts that we should "Tighten Up College Aid" because "what you don't pay for isn't highly valued" [Business Feb. 27]. He adds gratuitously that "the cheapening of a college education is a well-intentioned crime in which we are all the ultimate victims." Well, enough is enough!

In the first place, going to college isn't cheap. Students and their families pay for college in hard work, sacrifice—and dollars. Next to a home mortgage, college costs are the largest single investment an American family makes, and coming over a short period of four or five years this financial obligation hits very hard. The current "student debt" stands at around $40 billion.

Nor has a college education been cheapened. By any measure we have the finest system of higher education the world has ever known. We educate more people to higher levels than any other nation ever dreamed possible. How good is it? Not good enough, but it is the best there is and getting better.

It doesn't take a college graduate to understand the message these malefactors are peddling: It says that a college education ought to be an exclusive privilege reserved to those within our society who already "have," and that those who "have not" should be denied this means to a better life. This retrograde view of access and equity in higher education is widely held in the Reagan administration, and to describe it as "elitist" obscures the truth of the matter.

I have five children. Two of them are college graduates, two more along with my ex-wife are in college now, and my youngest will start next fall. I doubt that any of us could give Samuelson or, say, Secretary of Education William Bennett, a satisfactory justification for his or her being in college, and I won't make the attempt. But college has been very good for everyone in my family.

I have watched each of us grow with the experience in so many different ways. We are all of blue-collar, working-class roots out of the suburbs of Milwaukee—not a college graduate among us less than 25 years ago—and today we can talk with each other about science, mathematics, philosophy, history, literature, music and art. Those of us who have finished college hold good jobs. More important, we have grown in our understanding of the democratic ideal and spirit, which make it possible for ordinary folks to participate more fully in the richness of American life.

Yes, my oldest son and I received "federal assistance" through the GI Bill; the others had hoped for some modest level of "student aid" next fall. We have all "scrimped," borrowed, and worked part-time jobs. All of us pay taxes, and we don't complain about it. We believe that everyone ought to go to college. We understand that some may not want to and others may be unable. What we don't understand is why a person of Bennett's education and experience should want to exclude anyone from a college education.

As for me, I would have great difficulty deciding which ones in my family "don't belong" in college. Perhaps Samuelson feels qualified to make that decision. I certainly do not.●

NATIONAL POLICIES AND GLOBAL PROSPERITY

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an important statement by Secretary of State George Shultz on the subject of "National Policies and Global Prosperity" given at the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs on April 11, 1985. This is a remarkable statement on the problems and opportunities inherent in our current economic situation. I commend it to all colleagues, and ask that it be inserted, in full, into the RECORD at this point.

The statement follows:

NATIONAL POLICIES AND GLOBAL PROSPERITY

(Following is an address by Secretary of State George Shultz before the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University, Princeton, New Jersey, April 11, 1985.)

My theme today is simple: the American economy is a success story—a dramatic success story. But success brings with it new challenges, which we must address with great energy in order to preserve and build on the success we have achieved.

We face a paradox. In the past 2 years, our economy had made the strongest recovery of any in the last three decades, and the expansion remains robust. Yet we also see, in our domestic and international economic relations, some unusually large and important imbalances:

A large net capital inflow;

An exceptionally strong dollar;

The largest trade deficit in our history; and Large and continuing deficits in the U.S. Federal budget.

What relationship is there, if any, between our clear economic success and these equally clear imbalances? How do these imbalances relate to each other? What are our prospects if the imbalances continue? And what conclusions follow for economic policy—in this country and in other countries? These are the issues I would like to discuss with you today.

The economic policies of this Administration—reducing the role of government, promoting private initiative, and encouraging free trade—have led the United States out of recession and toward prosperity. We can be proud of our economic performance. Our expansion has led to export-induced recoveries abroad—underscoring the interdependence among the world's economies.

In large part, the imbalances I mentioned have contributed to our economic success; some are partly the result of it. To a degree, they have been exacerbated by the economic policies of other nations. Whatever their source, my main conclusion can be stated up front: these imbalances are interrelated, and they must be corrected if we are to maintain the momentum of our economic success. We—and other countries—share a responsibility to make some hard political decisions.

Let me focus on these imbalances, first as they impact on the American economy and then as they are mirrored in other countries. Then I will lay out the policy responses I see as necessary—responses by all nations—to keep the world economy on the path of sustained, noninflationary growth.

CAPITAL FLOWS

First, the large net capital inflows into the United States.

An impressive investment boom has driven American economic expansion in the past 3 years. To a large extent, this boom reflects the new investment incentives the Administration provided in its first term—including incentives for vital research and development, which is the source of future investment. Gross saving by individuals, business, and state and local governments also recovered from its recession low of 18% of GNP [gross national product] in 1982 to 20% in 1984.

But with the Federal deficit, gross national saving alone could not finance this higher level of investment. In 1984, gross saving in the United States by individuals, businesses, and state and local governments ran about $730 billion. On a net basis of capital consumption, the figure was $325 billion. These are healthy amounts by recent standards. After taking account of the large Federal deficit, however, total national saving amounted to only about $150 billion on a net basis or $555 billion on a gross basis—considerably less than the $635 billion recorded in gross private domestic investment in 1984.

As measured by our current account deficit, net capital inflows into the United States were about $100 billion last year. This is almost one-fifth the size of our gross national saving—and two-thirds the size of our net national saving—and has been an important factor in financing the expansion of our investment and, therefore, of our economy.

These inflows have come about largely because of the health and vigor of our own economy, in contrast with the less attractive conditions for lending and investment in other countries. But they come, to some degree, at the expense of building up foreign claims on the United States. On the basis of current trends, the United States will soon become a large net debtor nation—our foreign liabilities could exceed our foreign assets by $100 billion by the end of the year.

And underlying conditions are bound to change in the future. As opportunities to invest improve in other countries, capital inflows into the United States will slow down and outflows will increase. In other words, even if we are prepared to finance investment in the United States through a continuing net inflow of funds, we cannot count on attracting adequate funds indefinitely. Without a compensating increase in domestic saving to support our own investment—and if our Federal deficit continues to preempt a large portion of domestic saving—lower capital inflows could force a decline in our investment and impair the long-term growth of the American economy.

THE STRONG DOLLAR

These large net capital inflows into the United States have produced an extraordinarily strong dollar. Although the dollar has receded somewhat in the last month, it is still, on a trade-weighted basis, about 80% above its 1980 average in nominal terms.

The exchange value of the dollar today is determined far more by capital movements than by trade balances. Many factors have contributed. The restoration of America's economic vitality and leadership on the world scene has had an important effect on investment decisions. Our economic success—and our bright prospects—cause investments in dollar assets to be judged more attractive and less risky than others despite the dollar's high value. The dollar market also offers the widest selection and greatest liquidity. And dollar assets are serving not only as a store of value but as a political safehaven as well. Exchange markets reflect all these considerations, particularly as they contrast with the poor growth performance in Europe, the financial problems of the developing world, and the large excess of saving over domestic investment in Japan.

The net inflows of foreign capital, and the resulting high dollar, have certain advantages. By reducing the cost of imports and forcing domestic suppliers to compete more effectively, the strong dollars has helped restrain inflation in the United States. The net capital inflows have helped moderate interest rates as well. Abroad, the growth of American imports and slower growth of American exports have stimulated export-related jobs and generated economies of scale for foreign producers. The high value of dollar also makes offshore procurement, tourism, and American foreign direct investment in other countries all less expensive.

But the extraordinarily high dollar also has important disadvantages.

It reduces the competitiveness of our exports and the potential for their growth. Even through our exports have increased and the United States is still the world's largest exporter, our share of the world market for exports of manufactured goods in volume terms is estimated to have declined by 25% since 1980.

Because of increased domestic demand, economic activity in the United States has not yet been appreciably restricted. But that may change.

The dollar's strength is causing painful structural adjustments in many of our export-related industries; it is altering the character of the American economy in a basic and, in my view, undesirable way. Lower costs in other countries—due to exchange rates—are leading many American firms to locate abroad production facilities that would otherwise be competitive in the United States. Such decisions to locate or expand abroad would be both difficult and costly to reverse if the dollar's exchange value came down.

The large decline in the value of other currencies against the dollar has also eroded the value of existing foreign investments, sales, and earnings denominated in foreign currencies.

In the meantime, the growth of our imports is spurring protectionist demands for tariffs, nontariff barriers, and export subsidies. Whatever short-term relief for specific industries such measures might provide, the overall long-term cost to the mettle of the American economy, to the American consumer, and to the world economy would be devastating. Let us never forget the catastrophic effects of protection in the 1930s and the exhilarating impact of more open trade in the decades following World War II.

THE TRADE ACCOUNT

This leads me to the most visible international consequence of the strong dollar: its role in our huge and growing trade deficit, which reached a record $123 billion in 1984.

Despite the strong dollar, our exports, in fact, grew last year by 9% to a total of $218 billion—demonstrating the underlying strength of the American economy and reflecting adjustments in efficiency occurring within the market place. Nevertheless, the growth of imports overwhelmed the growth of exports, increasing 24% in volume terms and 26% in value terms. Over half of the $85 billion deterioration in the U.S. trade account since 1980 has been attributed to the strong dollar.

I have already mentioned the growing demands for protectionism. The Administration is resisting these pressures, and I will have more to say about our approach to trade policy in a moment. But one point is crucial here: we should not delude ourselves into thinking that a lowering of foreign barriers will have a decisive or even substantial impact on the trade deficit.

We can break the back of the trade deficit only through a combination of, first, a strong worldwide recovery and, second, a strengthening of other currencies in relation to the dollar as the performance and prospects of other economies improve and as these prospects are recognized by the markets. Even with movement on these fronts, the effects on the trade deficit will be gradual.

With depreciation of the dollar, U.S. imports would become more expensive and there would be some increase in inflationary pressure, at least initially. The growth of imports should slow down but probably with a lag. Purchases of raw materials, energy products and petroleum, specialized capital goods, and many consumer goods do not respond quickly when their prices rise.

The growth of our export sales will depend on several factors: on our ability to remain competitive; on a faster pace of economic recovery in other nations, notably Europe; on the success of adjustment efforts in developing countries; and on long overdue action by Japan to open its markets. Exports to the developing countries, particularly to those in Latin America burdened by debt, will still depend upon their ability to expand their exports to pay for our goods. This means our markets and those of other industrialized countries must remain open to their products. And many American exporters have already lost major foreign markets, recoverable only with a major effort.

THE U.S. FEDERAL DEFICIT

I have discussed the large net capital inflows, the strong dollar, and the huge trade deficit. It is no coincidence that these imbalances are accompanied by huge Federal budget deficits.

As long as there are ample unused resources in our economy, the Federal budget deficit does not cause major immediate problems for the United States. But current deficits are simply not sustainable indefinitely. These deficits can become a habit and weaken an essential discipline over Federal spending and over the size of the Federal Government. They drain off national savings, leading to increased reliance on foreign capital or curtailment of needed investment. And, as our expansion begins to stretch our resources, continued large deficits pose an increasing danger to that very expansion.

We can all continue to debate what combination of policies is best designed to deal with all the imbalances I have discussed—budget deficits, large capital inflows, the dollar on a financial high, and trade deficits. But a consensus has emerged that action to reduce the Federal budget deficit is an essential part of our response. The President has shown the way with his proposals and in his negotiations with the Congress. Special interests must give way to the general interest.

Control of government spending, coupled with vigorous growth, must be the key to our effort. We must cut spending in a way that does the least harm to the economy's investment and growth potential and to basic national security. But significant cuts must be made now. Tax rate increases are not the answer. To the contrary, the recent Reagan tax cuts, like the Kennedy cuts two decades earlier, have stimulated investment, fueling the recovery and contributing to the future productive potential of the economy. In fact, further tax simplification and reform could be very helpful in reducing tax-induced distortions in economic activity and in stimulating additional growth.

OTHER INDUSTRIALIZED COUNTRIES

So far I have focused primarily on the American economy. But in our interdependent world, the impact of domestic policies and performance on the economies of other nations is a two-way street. Other countries face challenges in their own domestic policies. They, too, must meet their challenges if the world economy is to correct the imbalances that cloud our common future. The imbalances can do harm also to important political relationships. We all have a job to do.

The major industrialized countries are recovering from the 1980–82 world recession at different rates. Whereas the United States and, to a lesser degree, Japan and Canada have expanded vigorously, Western Europe still lags. Average real growth in the four major European economies (Germany, France, the United Kingdom, and Italy) accelerated in 1984, but only to a year-over-year annual rate of 2.4%. This rise represented less than half the average of the American, Japanese, and Canadian rates. The Japanese and Canadian expansions, however, have depended heavily on the stimulus of exports to the U.S. market. The increase in Canadian exports to the United States amounted to over half the increase in Canadian GNP in current prices between 1982 and 1984, while the increase in Japanese exports to the U.S. market was over 10% of the increase in current-price GNP over the same period.

The slowness of recovery in Europe results from conditions that stifle investment, particularly structural problems in labor markets and government disincentives to adjustment and growth. The rigidities in European labor rates and conditions also tend to bias investment toward capital-intensive technologies—further inhibiting the growth of employment. There has been essentially no net job creation in Europe since 1970, compared with the American record of over 26 million new jobs during the same period. Over 7.5 million net new jobs have been created in this country since the trough of the recession in 1982.

Expressed as a share of output, gross investment in Europe has declined steadily since the first oil shock in 1973 and is now well below its share in the 1960s. Since investment opportunities in Europe have been less attractive than elsewhere, capital has flowed elsewhere. Much of the capital has come to the United States, either as investment in U.S. assets by foreigners, disinvestment by American investors abroad, or a reduction in the previous rate of foreign lending by U.S. banks. At the same time, it is estimated that half of Western Europe's growth in 1984 came from export sales to the United States. These exports amounted to $75 billion or nearly 22% of total U.S. imports last year.

Capital outflows from Europe and a dependence on exports to the United States—like the other imbalances I have mentioned—cannot be expected to continue indefinitely. Other OECD [Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development] governments must find ways to stimulate growth-oriented investment, thereby making their investment opportunities attractive to domestic and international capital. At stake is an efficient allocation of global resources—a system which responds to economic potential. This will require sound economic policies and hard political decisions—but the result will be sustained growth, job creation, and a brighter economic future.

Japan is a special case. The $37 billion U.S. trade deficit with Japan, as we all know, is a source of intense friction in our bilateral relationship and the cause of much of the growing demand for protectionism in this country. But the more meaningful measure of Japan's external imbalance is not our bilateral imbalance but Japan's overall trade surplus, estimated at $44 billion in 1984.

The Japanese could reduce their trade surplus with the world by pursuing policies to offset the impact of their high savings rate. Gross private saving in Japan is over 30% of GNP, about 50% higher than the average of the other OECD countries. This high rate of saving means low consumption. The excess of production over private and public consumption is not being used in domestic investment. It, therefore, appears as net exports. Or, to put it another way, under current conditions, Japan relies on a large excess of exports over imports to maintain full employment.

Opening up investment opportunities within Japan would be one way to use such resources and reduce the pressure to export. The needed decisions are more difficult for Japan politically than economically. The structural rigidities in the Japanese economy restrict access by even Japanese firms and investors. If the Japanese Government would improve incentives and reduce restrictions that currently restrain domestic and foreign firms from investing in Japan, all nations, especially Japan, would benefit. Steps are already underway to liberalize the Japanese capital market so as to channel Japanese savings more efficiently to both foreign and domestic uses and to widen the financial opportunities facing Japanese firms. As this proceeds, and as the international role of the yen expands, we would expect the value of the yen more fully to reflect the strength of the Japanese economy.

On the trade side, the removal of barriers to the sale of foreign goods and services in Japan would expand market opportunities for foreign suppliers, increasing Japan's imports. Prime Minister Nakasone's recent speech and the Japanese Government's package of measures to lower trade barriers and encourage imports are a laudable and encouraging beginning. More specifics must come.

All these steps would help defuse protectionist pressures in other countries. But Japan must deal with its savings-investment imbalance if its chronic imbalance in trade is to be corrected.

THE DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

The external accounts of the developing countries, like those of the European countries, help make up the mirror image of ours. The United States takes nearly 60% of all manufactured exports of developing countries to the industrial world. At the same time, our capital inflows from the developing nations are, in part, the result of American investors bringing their money home or of American banks reducing their foreign lending as opportunities in those countries appear less attractive.

Despite the progress made since the 1982-84 debt crisis, many developing countries still face the need for fundamental changes in their economies and economic strategies.

Several high-debt countries have successfully tackled the job of stabilizing their economies. They have cut public sector spending to more nearly match their resources, priced currencies to reflect better their market value, and set interest rates to encourage saving. They now face the need to get away from massive price subsidies or public sector dominance of investment resources and economic activity.

The emphasis should be on the positive. Austerity is not an end in itself. For difficult adjustments to be undertaken and sustained, a country's citizens must be able to see real prospects for future growth. Economic expansion, fueled by increased investment and exports, is the only way these countries can raise living standards for their people.

This is a theme that applies to many of the issues I have discussed today. Adjustments such as these are more difficult politically than economically—requiring new ways of thinking even more than they require resources. The cuts we must make in our own Federal spending are painful, but they are justified because they safeguard the continued growth of the productive private sector of our economy. The structural reforms in Europe that will ensure an attractive investment climate for domestic savings and international capital are necessary to restore Europe's own growth and technological advance. For the Third World, structural adjustment is the key to economic development.

The developing countries will clearly need financing as they go through this process. But where will this financing come from? No one can realistically expect that official development assistance, bilateral and multilateral, is likely to expand; the net flows are already very large—around $34 billion from official donors. And it is a fact of life that commercial bank lending will not return to the high levels of the past decade. Even increases from current levels are unlikely until developing countries improve their creditworthiness and offer productive investment opportunities. In any case, most developing countries already have more debt than they can readily handle.

There is no escaping this hard conclusion: domestic saving and private foreign equity investment will be the main sources of funds available to finance development and stimulate growth. Development and growth will come only to countries with sound domestic policies that stimulate domestic savings, promote trade, and attract external resources.

India is a striking example of a country that finances 92% of its investment needs from domestic savings. India's recent growth has been impressive and its prospects are bright.

Protectionism in the developing world can be a further drag on growth. The barriers to trade among developing countries are a hindrance to Third World expansion, and the barriers to outside trade and investment also retard development.

The value of foreign equity investment cannot be measured by the volume of funds alone. Foreign investors often bring technological and management skills that cannot be easily obtained in other ways. The enterprises of such investors tend to grow more rapidly and export more of their output than the economy as a whole. Moreover, there is no conflict between what needs to be done to stimulate foreign and domestic investment; both respond to a stable and predictable regulatory environment and to an expectation that they will be treated fairly.

Many developing countries seem reluctant to encourage foreign investment. It is their decision to make. But a number of countries have shed once fashionable mythology and recognized the opportunity. Now, after consistent application of sound policies, they are reaping the benefits.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

For developed and developing countries alike, economic growth clearly depends also on the continued openness of the world trading system and, indeed, on a further liberalization of world trade. This is a collective international responsibility.

Protectionism is not the remedy to an illness. It is itself an illness. It is a hidden tax on the consumer, often an extremely regressive tax. Hold onto your pocketbooks when politicians start trying to "protect" you against buying what you want to buy. Even in the relatively open U.S. market, one estimate is that U.S. protectionist policies cost American consumers directly almost $60 billion in 1980. That was over $250 for every man, women, and child in the country. Protectionism keeps prices up, reduces living standards, and stifles growth.

Trade promotes the flow not only of goods and services but also of ideas. All countries benefit from the further division of labor that permits a broadening of the international marketplace. Those developing countries will grow the fastest that reduce impediments to trade and exploit their comparative advantage. Nor can developed countries repeal the laws of economics and defy the principle of comparative advantages; they must be prepared, over time, to phase out industries in which they are no longer competitive.

The ninefold growth in the volume of international trade since World War II reflects the success of the world trading system. During this period, world trade increased considerably more than world production. In the prewar period, by contrast, protectionism and a decline in world trade thrust the world into depression. A new initiative is needed to sustain what has been achieved.

The United States has proposed—and strongly urges—a new round of multilateral negotiations early next year to liberalize trade, particularly to eliminate nontariff barriers such as quotas, voluntary export restraints, and subsidies. We want the GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] to extend its coverage to trade in services, agriculture, and high technology and to strengthen its system of safeguards and dispute settlement. Progress in these areas will provide new opportunities and new markets, bringing tangible benefits to both developed and developing nations. It will also contribute to the fight against protectionism. In the absence of progress on the multilateral front, pressures for protection and a retreat to reciprocal bilateral arrangements will mount.

From a global perspective, a splintering of the multilateral trading system into a multilateral of bilateral arrangements would be a backward step. Bilateral free trade agreements, however, such as we have negotiated with Israel and have offered to discuss with other countries, need not have this result; they can stimulate trade and strengthen the multilateral system. Free trade agreements are sanctioned by the international rules and involve a tighter trade discipline; they can promote freer trade than the multilateral system is currently prepared to accommodate. Our hope, nonetheless, is that the example of greater liberalization—and the recognition that the United States can pursue another course—will help motivate a larger group of nations to tackle the job of expanding trade on a global basis.

But we cannot forget our responsibility here at home. We in the United States are today more affected by the health of the global economic system than we have ever been before. And as the world's largest economy, we cannot escape the reality that any protectionist action here can do enormous harm to the global economic system. So in our own long-term self-interest, we must remain loyal to our long-standing tradition—our proud commitment to free and open trade.

A PROGRAM FOR SUSTAINED GLOBAL GROWTH

Let me conclude with a message and a program that emerge from my analysis. The message is twofold: first, the main objective, and the key to success, is to accelerate growth in the world economy. That's what this is all about. And second, growth in the world economy is the result of interaction among sound national policies. That is the most important common ingredient in the policy steps that nations must take to correct the imbalances I have discussed.

Together, these steps are a program of international action to protect the current recovery and move us decisively onto the path of sustained, noninflationary growth.

First, for our own part, and even for purely domestic reasons, the United States must—and will—substantially reduce its Federal spending and deficit.

Second, the West Europeans should adopt policies that reduce the obstacles to change and innovation, that attract capital, and that stimulate domestic investment.

Third, in addition to opening its markets to foreign products, Japan should reduce the impact of its high rate of domestic saving on its trade surplus. This could be done by a combination of steps, including liberalized capital markets that internationalize the yen and measures to stimulate investment in Japan by Japanese and foreigners alike.

Fourth, the developing nations, especially those heavily indebted, should continue to make the structural adjustments needed to stabilize their economies, reduce the economic burden of government, expand their trade, and stimulate growth. They should encourage domestic savings and foreign equity investment.

Fifth, all nations should support freer international trade and prepare for early commencement of a new international trade round. We must reject a surtax on imports; other countries must contain political pressures that threaten trade.

Finally, our approach to the strength of the dollar should concentrate on the fundamental market forces at work. Intervention in exchange markets addresses only the symptoms of the dollar's strength—and not at all successfully. An easy monetary policy, undertaken in an illusory effort to reduce interest rates, would only reignite fears of inflation, raise interest rates, and weaken economic prospects. Instead, we should maintain consistent, noninflationary growth in monetary aggregates to accommodate economic growth while continuing the trend to lower inflation.

This program of action calls for many hard decisions. But they are the right decisions. We stand at the threshold of what can be, if all governments meet their responsibilities, a long period of global economic expansion and a new era of unprecedented prosperity.

The benefits that economic growth can bring to all the world's people transcend the purely material—though for the world's poor and hungry, this alone would be a monumental blessing. A strong and growing global economy will help advance all of America's most fundamental goals: a world of cooperation, peace, stability, and progress, a world where human rights are respected and freedom flourishes. We have great opportunities to help build such a world, but we will succeed only if we have the will and the wisdom to recognize the dangers and confront them. We know what must be done. But we must act on that knowledge if our hopes for a better world are to become a reality.●

CARL PERKINS' SUPPORT OF EDUCATION

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, our House colleague, Representative WILLIAM D. FORD, chairs the Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, which I formerly had the honor of chairing. Recently, he wrote a letter that appeared in the Chronicle of Higher Education, which is right on target.

I can understand why an observer of the political scene did not sense that the late Carl Perkins was a strong advocate of education and an effective chairman. He had a slow, deceptively casual method of conducting hearings and proceedings; but there was a backbone there and a tiger at work, I can assure my colleagues.

Representative BILL FORD modestly did not include himself among those who were continuing to provide vigorous leadership in the field of education, and he should have done that. He has been a strong leader for this good cause.

I ask that Representative FORD's letter be printed in full after my statement.

The letter follows:

THIRTY-SIX YEARS IN CONGRESS IN SUPPORT OF EDUCATION

TO THE EDITOR: I must take strong exception to a statement by Norman J. Ornstein quoted in your article "Lawmaker Happy with Seat on Unpopular Education Panel" (February 20). Mr. Ornstein states, "He [former Education and Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins] had many positive qualities but he was not as strong a chairman as he could have been," particularly with respect to education.

Chairman Perkins was the most determined and effective champion that education programs have ever had. The $18-billion in education programs focused primarily on providing educational opportunities to the disadvantaged of our nation are a monument to his 36 years' work in Congress in support of education. The fact that education programs sustained $12.8-billion less in cuts than were proposed in President Reagan's first five budgets is further testimony to Chairman Perkins' success in recent years in sustaining our national commitment to education.

Congressman "Gus" Hawkins, who has chaired the Education and Labor Committee since the untimely death of Carl Perkins last fall, is continuing the tradition of vigorous leadership in support of education.

WILLIAM D. FORD,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, Committee on Education and Labor, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington.●

RULES AND MEMBERSHIP—COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am pleased to report to the Senate that the Committee on Foreign Relations has adopted its rules and subcommittee structure for the 99th Congress. For the benefit of all colleagues, I submit for the RECORD the committee rules and the membership of the six subcommittees of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The material follows:

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

(Adopted February 21, 1985)

RULE 1—JURISDICTION

(a) Substantive.—In accordance with Senate Rule XXV.1(j), the jurisdiction of the Committee shall extend to all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to the following subjects:

1. Acquisition of land and buildings for embassies and legations in foreign countries.
2. Boundaries of the United States.
3. Diplomatic service.
4. Foreign economic, military, technical, and humanitarian assistance.
5. Foreign loans.
6. International activities of the American National Red Cross and the International Committee of the Red Cross.
7. International aspects of nuclear energy, including nuclear transfer policy.
8. International conferences and congresses.
9. International law as it relates to foreign policy.
10. International Monetary Fund and other international organizations established primarily for international monetary purposes (except that, at the request of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, any proposed legislation relating to such subjects reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be referred to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs).
11. Intervention abroad and declarations of war.
12. Measures to foster commercial intercourse with foreign nations and to safeguard American business interests abroad.
13. National security and international aspects of trusteeships of the United States.
14. Ocean and international environmental and scientific affairs as they relate to foreign policy.
15. Protection of United States citizens abroad and expatriation.
16. Relations of the United States with foreign nations generally.
17. Treaties and executive agreements, except reciprocal trade agreements.
18. United Nations and its affiliated organizations.
19. World Bank group, the regional development banks, and other international organizations established primarily for development assistance purposes.

The Committee is also mandated by Senate Rule XXV.1(j) to study and review, on a comprehensive basis, matters relating to the national security policy, foreign policy, and international economic policy as it relates to foreign policy of the United States, and matters relating to food, hunger, and nutrition in foreign countries, and report thereon from time to time.

(b) Oversight.—The Committee also has a responsibility under Senate Rule XXVI.8, which provides that ". . . each standing Committee . . . shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the application, administration, and execution of those laws or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of the committee."

(c) "Advice and Consent" Clauses.—The Committee has a special responsibility to assist the Senate in its constitutional function of providing "advice and consent" to all treaties entered into by the United States and all nominations to the principal executive branch positions in the field of foreign policy and diplomacy.

RULE 2—SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) Creation.—Unless otherwise authorized by law or Senate resolution, subcommittees shall be created by majority vote of the Committee and shall deal with such legislation and oversight of programs and policies as the Committee directs. Legislative measures or other matters may be referred to a subcommittee for consideration in the discretion of the Chairman or by vote of a majority of the Committee. If the Principal subject matter of a measure or matter to be referred falls within the jurisdiction of more than one subcommittee, the Chairman or the Committee may refer the matter to two or more subcommittees for joint consideration.

(b) Assignments.—Assignments of members to subcommittees shall be made in an equitable fashion. No member of the Committee may receive assignment to a second subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members of the Committee have chosen assignments to one subcommittee, and no member shall receive assignments to a third subcommittee until, in order of seniority, all members have chosen assignments to two subcommittees.

No member of the Committee may serve on more than three subcommittees at any one time.

The Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Committee shall be ex officio members, without vote, of each subcommittee.

(c) Meetings.—Except when funds have been specifically made available by the Senate for a subcommittee purpose, no subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations shall hold hearings involving reporting expenses without prior approval of the Chairman of the full Committee or by decision of the full Committee. Meetings of subcommittees shall be scheduled after consultation with the Chairman of the Committee with a view toward avoiding conflicts with meetings of other subcommittees insofar as possible. Meetings of subcommittees shall not be scheduled to conflict with meetings of the full Committee.

The proceedings of each subcommittee shall be governed by the rules of the full Committee, subject to such authorizations or limitations as the Committee may from time to time prescribe.

RULE 3—MEETINGS

(a) Regular Meeting Day.—The regular meeting day of the Committee on Foreign Relations for the transaction of Committee business shall be on Tuesday of each week, unless otherwise directed by the Chairman.

(b) Additional Meetings.—Additional meetings and hearings of the Committee may be called by the Chairman as he may deem necessary. If at least three members of the Committee desire that a special meeting of the Committee be called by the Chairman, those members may file in the offices of the Committee their written request to the Chairman for that special meeting. Immediately upon filing of the request, the Chief Clerk of the Committee shall notify the Chairman of the filing of the request. If, within three calendar days after the filing of the request, the Chairman does not call the requested special meeting, to be held within seven calendar days after the filing of the request, a majority of the members of the Committee may file in the offices of the Committee their written notice that a special meeting of the Committee will be held, specifying the date and hour of that special meeting. The Committee shall meet on that date and hour. Immediately upon the filing of the notice, the Clerk shall notify all members of the Committee that such special meeting will be held and inform them of its date and hour.

(c) Minority Request.—Whenever any hearing is conducted by the Committee or a subcommittee upon any measures or matter, the minority on the Committee shall be entitled, upon request made by a majority of the minority members to the Chairman before the completion of such hearing, to call witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to the measure or matter during at least one day of hearing thereon.

(d) Public Announcement.—The Committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall make public announcement of the date, place, time and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least one week in advance of such hearings, unless the Chairman of the Committee, or subcommittee, determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date.

(e) Procedure.—Insofar as possible, proceedings of the Committee will be conducted without resort to the formalities of parliamentary procedure and with due regard for the views of all members. Issues of procedure which may arise from time to time shall be resolved by decision of the Chairman, in consultation with the Ranking Minority Member and with the advice of the Chief Clerk. The Chairman, in consultation with the Ranking Minority Member, may also propose special procedures to govern the consideration of particular matters by the Committee.

(f) Closed Sessions.—Each meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof, including meetings to conduct hearings, shall be open to the public, except that a meeting or series of meetings by the Committee or a subcommittee on the same subject for a period of no more than fourteen calendar days may be closed to the public on a motion made and seconded to go into closed session to discuss only whether the matters enumerated in paragraphs (1) through (6) would require the meeting to be closed followed immediately by a record vote in open session by a majority of the members of the Committee or subcommittee when it is determined that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such meeting or meetings—

(1) will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States;

(2) will relate solely to matters of Committees staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure;

(3) will tend to charge an individual with crime or misconduct; to disgrace or injure the professional standing of an individual, or otherwise to expose an individual to public contempt or obloquy, or will represent a clearly unwarranted invasion of the privacy of an individual;

(4) will disclose the identity of any informer or law enforcement agent or will disclose any information relating to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offense that is required to be kept secret in the interests of effective law enforcement;

(5) will disclose information relating to the trade secrets of financial or commercial information pertaining specifically to a given person if—

(A) an Act of Congress requires the information to be kept confidential by Government officers and employees; or

(B) the information has been obtained by the Government on a confidential basis, other than through an application by such person for a specific Government financial or other benefit, and is required to be kept secret in order to prevent undue injury to the competitive position of such person; or

(6) may divulge matters required to be kept confidential under other provisions of law or Government regulations.

A closed meeting may be opened by a majority vote of the Committee.

(g) Staff Attendance.—A member of the Committee may have one member of his or her personal staff, for whom that member assumes personal responsibility, accompany and be seated nearby at Committee meetings.

Each member of the Committee may designate members of his or her staff, who hold a Top Secret security clearance, for the purpose of their eligibility to attend closed sessions of the Committee, subject to the same conditions set forth for Committee staff under Rules 12, 13, and 14.

In addition, the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader of the Senate, if they are not otherwise members of the Committee, may designate one member of their staff with a Top Secret security clearance to attend closed sessions of the Committee, subject to the same conditions set forth for Committee staff under Rules 12, 13, and 14. Staff of other Senators who are not members of the Committee may not attend closed sessions of the Committee.

Attendance of Committee staff at meetings shall be limited to those designated by the Staff Director or the Minority Staff Director.

The Committee, by majority vote, or the Chairman, with the concurrence of the Ranking Minority member, may limit staff attendance at specified meetings.

RULE 4—QUORUMS

(a) Testimony.—For the purpose of taking sworn or unsworn testimony at any duly scheduled meeting a quorum of the Committee and each subcommittee thereof shall consist of one member.

(b) Business.—A quorum for the transaction of Committee or subcommittee business, other than for reporting a measure or recommendation to the Senate or the taking of testimony, shall consist of one-third of the members of the Committee or subcommittee, including at least one member from each party.

(c) Reporting.—A majority of the membership of the Committee shall constitute a quorum for reporting any measure or recommendation to the Senate. No measure or recommendation shall be ordered reported from the Committee unless a majority of the Committee members are physically present. The vote of the Committee to report a measure or matter shall require the concurrence of a majority of those members who are physically present at the time the vote is taken.

RULE 5—PROXIES

Proxies must be in writing with the signature of the absent member. Subject to the requirements of Rule 4 for the physical presence of a quorum to report a matter, proxy voting shall be allowed on all measures and matters before the Commitee. However, proxies shall not be voted on a measure or matter except when the absent member has been informed of the matter on which he is being recorded and has affirmatively requested that he be so recorded.

RULE 6—WITNESSES

(a) General.—The Committee on Foreign Relations will consider requests to testify on any matter or measure pending before the Committee.

(b) Presentation.—If the Chairman so determines, the oral presentation of witnesses shall be limited to ten minutes. However, written statements of reasonable length may be submitted by witnesses and other interested persons who are unable to testify in person.

(c) Filing of Statements.—A witness appearing before the Committee, or any subcommittee therof, shall file a written statement of his proposed testimony at least 48 hours prior to his appearance, unless this requirement is waived by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member following their determination that there is good cause for failure to file such a statement.

(d) Expenses.—Only the Chairman may authorize expenditures of funds for the expenses of witnesses appearing before the Committee or its subcommittees.

(e) Requests.—Any witness called for a hearing may submit a written request to the Chairman no later than twenty-four hours in advance for his testimony to be in closed or open session, or for any other unusual procedure. The Chairman shall determine whether to grant any such request and shall notify the Committee members of the request and of his decision.

RULE 7—SUBPOENAS

(a) Authorization.—The Chairman or any other member of the Committee, when authorized by a majority vote of the Committee at a meeting or by proxies, shall have authority to subpoena the attendance of witnesses or the production of memoranda, documents, records, or any other materials. When the Committee authorizes a subpoena, it may be issued upon the signature of the Chairman or any other member designated by the Committee.

(b) Return.—A subpoena, or a request to an agency, for documents may be issued whose return shall occur at a time and place other than that of a scheduled Committee meeting. A return on such a subpoena or request which is incomplete or accompanied by an objection constitutes good cause for a hearing on shortened notice. Upon such a return, the Chairman or any other member designated by him may convene a hearing by giving two hours notice by telephone to all other members. One member shall constitute a quorum for such a hearing. The sole purpose of such a hearing shall be to elucidate further information about the return and to rule on the objection.

RULE 8—REPORTS

(a) Filing.—When the Committee has ordered a measure or recommendation reported, the report thereon shall be filed in the Senate at the earliest practicable time.

(b) Supplemental, Minority and Additional Views.—A member of the Committee who gives notice of his intentions to file supplemental, minority, or additional views at the time of final Committee approval of a measure or matter, shall be entitled to not less than 3 calendar days in which to file such views, in writing, with the Chief Clerk of the Committee. Such views shall then be included in the Committee report and printed in the same volume, as a part thereof, and their inclusion shall be noted on the cover of the report. In the absence of timely notice, the Committee report may be filed and printed immediately without such views.

(c) Rollcall Votes.—The results of all rollcall votes taken in any meeting of the Committee on any measure, or amendment thereto, shall be announced in the Committee report. The announcement shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor and votes cast in opposition to each such measure and amendment by each member of the Committee.

RULE 9—TREATIES

(a) The Committee is the only committee of the Senate with jurisdiction to review and report to the Senate on treaties submitted by the President for Senate advice and consent. Because the House of Representatives has no role in the approval of treaties, the Committee is therefore the only congressional committee with responsibility for treaties.

(b) Once submitted by the President for advice and consent, each treaty is referred to the Committee and remains on its calendar from Congress to Congress until the Committee takes action to report it to the Senate or recommend its return to the President, or until the Committee is discharged of the treaty by the Senate.

(c) In accordance with Senate Rule XXX.2, treaties which have been reported to the Senate but not acted on before the end of a Congress "shall be resumed at the commencement of the next Congress as if no proceedings had previously been had thereon."

(d) Insofar as possible, the Committee should conduct a public hearing on each treaty as soon as possible after its submission by the President. Except in extraordinary circumstances, treaties reported to the Senate shall be accompanied by a written report.

RULE 10—NOMINATIONS

(a) Waiting Requirement.—Unless otherwise directed by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member, the Committee on Foreign Relations shall not consider any nomination until 6 calendar days after it has been formally submitted to the Senate.

(b) Public Consideration.—Nominees for any post who are invited to appear before the Committee shall be heard in public session, unless a majority of the Committee decrees otherwise.

(c) Required Data.—No nomination shall be reported to the Senate unless (1) the nominee has been accorded a security clearance on the basis of a thorough investigation by executive branch agencies; (2) in appropriate cases, the nominee has filed a confidential statement and financial disclosure report with the Committee; (3) the Committee has been assured that the nominee does not have any interests which could conflict with the interests of the government in the exercise of the nominee's proposed responsibilities; (4) for persons nominated to be chief of mission, ambassador-at-large, or minister, the Committee has received a complete list of any contributions made by the nominee or members of his immediate family to any Federal election campaign during the year of his or her nomination and for the four preceding years; and (5) for persons nominated to be chiefs of mission, a report on the demonstrated competence of that nominee to perform the duties of the position to which he or she has been nominated.

RULE 11—TRAVEL

(a) Foreign Travel.—No member of the Committee on Foreign Relations or its staff shall travel abroad on Committee business unless specifically authorized by the Chairman, who is required by law to approve vouchers and report expenditures of foreign currencies, and the Ranking Minority Member. Requests for authorization of such travel shall state the purpose and, when completed, a full substantive and financial report shall be filed with the Committee within 30 days. This report shall be furnished to all members of the Committee and shall not be otherwise disseminated without the express authorization of the Committee. Except in extraordinary circumstances, staff travel shall not be approved unless the reporting requirements have been fulfilled for all prior trips. Except for travel that is strictly personal, travel funded by non-U.S. Government sources is subject to the same approval and substantive reporting requirements as U.S. Government-funded travel. In addition, members and staff are reminded of Senate Rule XXXV.4 requiring a determination by the Senate Ethics Committee in the case of foreign-sponsored travel.

Any proposed travel by Committee staff for a subcommittee purpose must be approved by the subcommittee chairman and ranking minority member prior to submission of the request to the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the full Committee.

When the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member approve the foreign travel of a member of the staff of the Committee not accompanying a member of the Committee, all members of the Committee shall be advised, prior to the commencement of such travel, of its extent, nature, and purpose.

(b) Domestic Travel.—All official travel in the United States by the Committee staff shall be approved in advance by the Staff Director, or in the case of minority staff, by the Minority Staff Director.

(c) Personal Staff.—One member of the personal staff of a member of the Committee may travel with that member with the approval of the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member of the Committee. During such travel, the personal staff member shall be considered to be an employee of the Committee.

RULE 12—TRANSCRIPTS

(a) General.—The Committee on Foreign Relations shall keep verbatim transcripts of all Committee and subcommittee meetings and such transcripts shall remain in the custody of the Committee, unless a majority of the Committee decides otherwise. Transcripts of public hearings by the Committee shall be published unless the Chairman, with the concurrence of the Ranking Minority Member, determines otherwise.

(b) Classified or Restricted Transcripts.—

(1) The Chief Clerk of the Committee shall have responsibility for the maintenance and security of classified or restricted transcripts.

(2) A record shall be maintained of each use of classified or restricted transcripts.

(3) Classified or restricted transcripts shall be kept in locked combination safes in the Committee offices except when in active use by authorized persons. They must never be left unattended and shall be returned to the Chief Clerk promptly when no longer needed.

(4) Except as provided in paragraph 7 below, transcripts classified secret or higher may not leave the Committee offices except for the purpose of declassification.

(5) Classified transcripts other than those classified secret or higher may leave the Committee offices in the possession of authorized persons with the approval of the Chairman. Delivery and return shall be made only by authorized persons. Such transcripts may not leave Washington, D.C., unless adequate assurances for their security are made to the Chairman.

(6) Extreme care shall be exercised to avoid taking notes or quotes from classified transcripts. Their contents may not be divulged to any unauthorized person.

(7) Subject to any additional restrictions imposed by the Chairman with the concurrence of the Ranking Minority Member, only the following persons are authorized to have access to classified or restricted transcripts:

(i) Members and staff of the Committee in the Committee rooms;

(ii) Designated personal representatives of members of the Committee, and of the Majority and Minority Leaders, with appropriate security clearances, in the Committee's Capitol office;

(iii) Senators not members of the Committee, by permission of the Chairman;

(iv) Members of the executive departments involved in the meeting, in the Committee's Capitol office, or, with the permission of the Chairman, in the offices of the officials who took part in the meeting, but in either case, only for a specified and limited period of time, and only after reliable assurances against further reproduction or dissemination have been given.

(8) Any restrictions imposed upon access to a meeting of the Committee shall also apply to the transcript of such meeting, except by special permission of the Chairman and notice to the others members of the Committee. Each transcript of a closed session of the Committee shall include on its cover a description of the restrictions imposed upon access, as well as any applicable restrictions upon photocopying, note-taking or other dissemination.

(9) In addition to restrictions resulting from the inclusion of any classified information in the transcript of a Committee meeting, members and staff shall not discuss with anyone the proceedings of the Committee in closed session or reveal information conveyed or discussed in such a session unless that person would have been permitted to attend the session itself, or unless such communication is specifically authorized by the Chairman, the Ranking Minority Member, or in the case of staff, by the Staff Director or Minority Staff Director. A record shall be kept of all such authorizations.

(c) Declassification.—

(1) All restricted transcripts and classified Committee reports shall be declassified on a date twelve years after their origination unless the Committee by majority vote decides against such declassification, and provided that the executive departments involved and all former Committee members who participated directly in the sessions or reports concerned have been consulted in advance and given a reasonable opportunity to raise objections to such declassification.

(2) Any transcript or classified Committee report, or any portion thereof, may be declassified fewer than twelve years after their origination if:

(i) the Chairman originates such action or receives a written request for such action, and notifies the other members of the Committee; and

(ii) the Chairman, Ranking Minority Member, and each member or former member who participated directly in such meeting or report give their approval, except that the Committee by majority vote may overrule any objections thereby raised to early declassification; and

(iii) the executive departments and all former Committee members are consulted in advance and have a reasonable opportunity to object to early declassification.

RULE 13—CLASSIFIED MATERIAL

(a) All classified material received or originated by the Committee shall be logged in at the Committee's offices in the Dirksen Senate Office Building, and except for material classified as "Top Secret" shall be filed in the Dirksen Senate Building offices for Committee use and safekeeping.

(b) Each such piece of classified material received or originated shall be card indexed and serially numbered, and where requiring onward distribution shall be distributed by means of an attached indexed form approved by the Chairman. If such material is to be distributed outside the Committee offices, it shall, in addition to the attached form, be accompanied also by an approved signature sheet to show onward receipt.

(c) Distribution of classified material among offices shall be by Committee members of authorized staff only. All classified material sent to members' offices, and that distributed within the working offices of the Committee, shall be returned to the office designated by the Chief Clerk. No classified material is to be removed from the offices of the members or of the Committee without permission of the Chairman. Such classified material will be afforded safe handling and safe storage at all times.

(d) Material classified "Top Secret," after being indexed and numbered, shall be sent to the Committee's Capitol office for use by the members and authorized staff in that office only or in such other secure committee offices as may be authorized by the Chairman or Staff Director.

(e) In general, members and staff shall undertake to confine their access to classified information on the basis of a "need to know" such information related to their Committee responsibilities.

(f) The Staff Director is authorized to make such administrative regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of these regulations.

RULE 14—STAFF

(a) Responsibilities.—

(1) The staff works for the Committee as a whole, under the general supervision of the Chairman of the Committee, and the immediate direction of the Staff Director; provided, however, that such part of the staff as is designated Minority Staff, shall be under the general supervision of the Ranking Minority Member and under the immediate direction of the Minority Staff Director.

(2) Any member of the Committee should feel free to call upon the staff at any time for assistance in connection with Committee business. Members of the Senate not members of the Committee who call upon the staff for assistance from time to time should be given assistance subject to the overriding responsibility of the staff to the Committee.

(3) The staff's primary responsibility is with respect to bills, resolutions, treaties, and nominations.

In addition to carrying out assignments from the Committee and its individual members, the staff has a responsibility to originate suggestions for Committee or subcommittee consideration. The staff also has a responsibility to make suggestions to individual members regarding matters of special interest to such members.

(4) It is part of the staff's duty to keep itself as well informed as possible in regard to developments affecting foreign relations and in regard to the administration of foreign programs of the United States. Significant trends or developments which might otherwise escape notice should be called to the attention of the Committee, or of individual Senators with particular interests.

(5) The staff shall pay due regard to the constitutional separation of powers between the Senate and the executive branch. It therefore has a responsibility to help the Committee bring to bear an independent, objective judgment of proposals by the executive branch and when appropriate to originate sound proposals of its own. At the same time, the staff shall avoid impinging upon the day-to-day conduct of foreign affairs.

(6) In those instances when Committee action requires the expression of minority views, the staff shall assist the minority as fully as the majority to the end that all points of view may be fully considered by members of the Committee and of the Senate. The staff shall bear in mind that under our constitutional system it is the responsibility of the elected Members of the Senate to determine legislative issues in the light of as full and fair a presentation of the facts as the staff may be able to obtain.

(b) Restrictions.

(1) The staff shall regard its relationship to the Committee as a privileged one, in the nature of the relationship of a lawyer to a client. In order to protect this relationship and the mutual confidence which must prevail if the Committee-staff relationship is to be a satisfactory and fruitful one, the following criteria shall apply:

(i) Members of the staff shall not be identified with any special interest group in the field of foreign relations or allow their names to be used by any such group.

(ii) Members of the staff shall not accept public speaking engagements or write for publication in the field of foreign relations without specific advance permission from the Staff Director, or, in the case of minority staff, from the Minority Staff Director. In the case of the Staff Director and the Minority Staff Director, such advance permission shall be obtained from the Chairman or the Ranking Minority Member, as appropriate. In any event, such public statements should avoid the expression of personal views and should not contain predictions of future, or interpretations of past, Committee action.

(iii) Staff shall not discuss their private conversations with members of the Committee without specific advance permission from the Senator or Senators concerned.

(2) The staff shall not discuss with anyone the proceedings of the Committee in closed session or reveal information conveyed or discussed in such a session unless that person would have been permitted to attend the session itself, or unless such communication is specifically authorized by the Staff Director or Minority Staff Director. Unauthorized disclosure of information from a closed session or of classified information shall be cause for immediate dismissal and may, in the case of some kinds of information, be grounds for criminal prosecution.

51-059 O-86-21 (Pt. 7)

RULE 15—STATUS AND AMENDMENT OF RULES

(a) Status.—In addition to the foregoing, the Committee on Foreign Relations is governed by the Standing Rules of the Senate which shall take precedence in the event of a clear inconsistency. In addition, the jurisdiction and responsibilities of the Committee with respect to certain matters, as well as the timing and procedure for their consideration in Committee, may be governed by statute.

(b) Amendment.—These Rules may be modified, amended, or repealed by a majority of the Committee, provided that a notice in writing of the proposed change has been given to each member at least 48 hours prior to the meeting at which action thereon is to be taken. However, rules of the Committee which are based upon Senate rules may not be superseded by Committee vote alone.

THE COMPUTER AND THE SMOKESTACK INDUSTRY

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I recently received a copy of the speech made by William D. Swanson, vice president of the National Steel Corp., and the general manager of their Granite City Steel plant. I recently had the opportunity to visit the Granite City Steel plant to meet some of the officers there to discuss their needs and their potential.

In 1983 the steel companies that accounted for 80 percent of domestic production reported a combined loss of $3.6 billion, and yet National Steel, the sixth largest corporation steel company in the United States has, for seven quarters, posted a profit. It is the only domestic integrated steel company to have such a record.

Part of the key to their success is undoubtedly getting capable people like Bill Swanson to be part of the leadership.

Part of the key, also, is the marriage of the latest technology with production.

I get an uncomfortable feeling when I hear people say that we have moved to becoming an informational society or that high tech, and not smokestack industries, is the wave of the future.

The reality is that I cannot eat information. I cannot sit in information. I cannot drive in information. I need concrete things to improve the quality of my life and to sustain existence.

The United States cannot move away from the production of those concrete thngs.

What is the answer? I think National Steel is helping to provide the answer.

One other aspect of National Steel that may or may not be part of the future is that 50 percent of it is now owned by Nippon Kokan. Undoubtedly the Japanese involvement has been part of the National Steel ability to move on the latest developments.

Whether that is the pattern for the future and whether that ought to be encouraged, I am not sure.

But I do know that the merging of the latest technology with the production of concrete goods has to become the wave of the future for the United States if we are to remain competitive, and if we are to improve the standard of living for our people.

I am taking the liberty of inserting William Swanson's speech in the RECORD. I would add to my colleagues that some of it is technical. I, frankly, do not understand all of the references to various pieces of equipment, for example, but any of my colleagues who read the speech will come away with a better understanding of where we as a nation have to go.

I ask that the speech be printed the RECORD.

The speech follows:

THE COMPUTER AND THE SMOKESTACK INDUSTRY—PARTNERS IN PROGRESS

Thank you, John, for that gracious introduction, and thanks to the AISE for asking me here tonight.

This evening I'd like to present for your consideration a proposal that I believe is being overlooked by a majority of the people of this country.

I submit that much of the high technology revolution in this country is not limited to the Silicon Valley of California, nor is it limited to the IBM's, Honeywell's and the aerospace industry. Instead, the real high technology revolution in the United States is taking place and growing on a daily basis in the so-called basic—or smokestack—industries.

Put another way—while it is the role of the IBM's of the world to create computer technology—and, I should point out that it is a role in which they excel—an equally important function is being fulfilled by basic industry—such as steel—in providing the fertile ground for the application of that technology into process control, business systems, and information retrieval systems.

It is this relationship between the creation of computer technology and its application in basic industry which led me to the title of my remarks tonight—"the computer and smokestack industry—partners in progress."

I will use some very specific examples of the application of high technology at Granite City Steel. These will illustrate practical examples of the computer/smoke stack industry relationship which have resulted in helping us return to profitability, and which have even greater potential for long-term benefits.

I should point out that I don't believe we're unique in this situation. We have seen many other examples—such as in the auto industry—where applications of high technology can help improve quality, reduce costs and improve margins. I believe this is a high tech revolution second to none. Furthermore, it's time for a renewed public appreciation of the contribution basic industry makes to our economy.

It is time for Americans to reject the idiotic concept that America can be kept great by silicon chips and fast food chains—that most people can be employed in high technology so as to support the rest of the economy which will be involved in services. That is a theory which neglects the fact that the production of real goods provides the most jobs.

Now, let's turn to Granite City Steel division and its parent company, National Steel Corporation, as an example of what can be done. I will give you a brief background on the steel industry in recent years, some of the actions we took at National Steel to respond to the challenges we faced, and how the applications of computer technology have figured in those actions.

First, let's look at the steel industry as a whole.

BACKGROUND OF DOMESTIC STEEL INDUSTRY

Almost everyone knows that the domestic steel industry has undergone some traumatic times in recent years with a loss of markets, reduction in employment, the suffering of large financial losses and a trimming of capacity as older, outmoded facilities have been closed.

According to Dr. Authur T. Denzau in his recent report on the domestic steel industry for Washington University's Center for the study of American Business, "The American steel industry has been sick for a long time."

In only one year since 1959 has the domestic steel industry earned a rate of return on equity equal to the average for all manufacturing. In 1983 steel companies accounting for 80 percent of domestic production reported a combined loss of $3.5 billion. The previous year's combined loss was $3.2 billion. The 1984 projections are for a loss of one-half a billion.

How did what was once a proud American industry ever get into such terrible shape? Surprisingly, the fault didn't lie in lack of investment. As a matter of fact, the industry invested more than $24 billion between 1969 and 1978. That was three times as much as they paid in dividends. Yet, productivity growth averaged only three percent a year in that time. This says that the investment was not effective. Only two completely new integrated steel mills were built in the U.S. since World War II.

At the same time, 80 percent of the steel capacity in Japan was built since 1945, most of it using advanced steel making technology. And, the Japanese made advances in the continuous casting of steel, and extensive process control development, and very aggressive customer-oriented marketing concepts.

Yet, the domestic steel industry acted as though there was no immediate danger, and in the 1970s was putting out news releases claiming that—and I am quoting—"the domestic steel industry employs the most advanced steelmaking technology in the world. . .", or try this one. . . "new technology has not been and is not likely to be the answer to the immediate profit problem. . ." and, finally, "there is no new steelmaking technology in sight."

In retrospect, such statements seem ridiculous at best and stupid at worst.

At the same time that this was going on, we were seeing not only a flood of imports from modern steel mills in Japan and other nations, but a shrinking of markets as alternative materials such as plastics began to replace steel, and automobiles started getting smaller.

Management wasn't alone in its malaise. Labor demanded—and continued to get exorbitant wages, costly benefits, and protection of outmoded work rules.

Instead of looking to technology, improved quality and more flexibility in work rules as an answer to the dilemma, the industry sought relief from imports.

I am not going to argue the case for or against import quotas tonight except to say that while we will take all the help we can get, quotas are not the answer to the long-term needs of the industry.

As a result of the malaise I have described, losses soared; the markets were lost to superior quality and more competitively priced foreign steel, and jobs in the steel industry diminished by nearly 140,000 in the past three years alone.

Where did Granite City Steel fit in this picture? We, too, suffered from the adverse conditions the industry faced, and our losses were staggering.

But, I am pleased to report that National Steel has proven to be a leader in many instances for the industry. While we certainly are not the largest—being sixth in the nation—we have already taken many of the steps which knowledgable industry observers have cited as being essential if the domestic steel industry is to survive these troubled times.

As result, we at National Steel have recorded an operating profit for seven consecutive quarters—the only domestic integrated steel company to enjoy such a record. Although a large part of National's strength relates to their balance from raw materials to shipped product, they are technologically advanced in many areas.

Let's look at some of the steps National has taken at Granite City Steel. These will include a review of the technology in our steelmaking process including the basic oxygen furnace, our continuous caster, and a new multi-million dollar computer in our hot strip mill. I'll also discuss the application of some new technology that is part of a $60 million capital expenditure program at Granite City Steel for 1985, including a new iron desulfurization process, caster improvements, ladle metallurgy and the establishment of a new operations technology department.

Time will not permit me to cover all of the computerization at Granite City Steel. However, I would like to give you a sense of the magnitude of this effort. Let me touch briefly on the three areas of computerization; process control, commercial system applications, and the information center environment.

Process control is the application of computer technology to physically control a process to achieve the consistent production of a high quality product. To support these process control applications, commercial systems must be integrated into the scheme. Functions such as production reporting, inventory accounting, unit scheduling and cost forecasting provide management with the tools needed to deliver a low cost, high quality product to the customer when he wants it.

The final integration of computerization is the information center. Through an extensive network of over 300 terminals, granite city staff and operations people are able to monitor and analyze statistical, financial and metallurgical data without going through the data processing department. Data of all types can be retrieved from central data banks and analyzed or reported as desired. In addition, over 30 word processors and personal computers have been installed at Granite City Steel.

However, tonight I would like to look more closely at some major examples of process control technology, since this is the area which must grow rapidly to keep us competitive in the market place.

HOT STRIP MILL COMPUTER

Actually, Granite Steel has had a long history in the application of technology. It started at our 80" hot strip mill nearly twenty years ago when we were one of the first steel mills in the world to introduce extensive computer controls.

Now, in 1985, the 80" hot strip mill is entering a new phase of technological advancement at Granite City Steel as we complete the successful startup of a new $5 million hot strip mill computer. It's a DEC VAX 11-780 that is interfaced to our existing IBM and G.E. systems.

This new system is significant for another reason. The programming was done entirely in-house, making it the largest in-house programming effort of its type ever attempted (according to our sources). We had five programmers dedicated to this task for more than two years. I believe this type of expertise is yet a further indication of the "high tech" revolution that is occurring in our industry. Only a few years ago, I doubt that such capabilities would have existed in any steel mill in this country.

The role of the hot strip mill computer in ensuring a quality product cannot be overestimated. It controls production functions from the time slabs are put into the furnace until they move down the conveyor as hot rolled bands. As the bar makes its track through the mill, the computer monitors its width and thickness by controlling horizontal and vertical rolls.

Also, the computer system controls cooling of the strip by varying its speed through the mill and on the runout table and by applying the laminar water needed in the process. At times, a thin strip may reach speeds of 50 miles an hour, so you can see that highly accurate and instantaneous monitoring is essential.

Computer models have been utilized in setting up roughing mills, the crop shear, finish mill speeds, finish mill screw positions and looper tensions.

The final coiling temperature is controlled by the computer, based upon another in-house developed model. Additionally, there are two x-ray gauges at the end of the finish mills which are connected to the computer for thickness control. The finished coil weights are recorded by a computer. We are quite proud of this new system as you might expect, and we believe it to be the equal of any in the world.

BOF COMPUTERS

We have also incorporated extensive computer technology at our basic oxygen furnace shop.

There we have a supervisory computer. It is a DEC PDP 11-44 which interfaces with our IBM computers and to a digital 11-73 that acts as a control computer. The supervisory computer is linked to CRT's, eight of which are analytical devices for our laboratories at the BOF.

The control computer monitors all signals and passes data to the supervisory computer once every five seconds to provide a history which is used if problems occur.

As of March 27, the control computer will be in control of the new LBE refining process recently installed on our #1 vessel. It will adjust the lance height, our top oxygen flow rates and our bottom gas flow rates. All of this is aimed at greater efficiency and predictability in the process.

I mentioned earlier that the supervisory computer is also linked to the laboratory analytical devices. These include two optical emission spectrometers, three carbon-sulfur analyzers, a nitrogen-oxygen analyzer, two liquid steel oxygen analyzers and two steel temperature measuring probes.

All the analyses made on these devices are stored in the supervisory computer.

This provides a more accurate monitoring of the process—and, we hope, improved yield and quality.

CONTINUOUS CASTER

Next, I'd like to take a brief look at a real success story for Granite City Steel—that's our continuous caster. Currently, we are continuously casting about 65 percent of our steel at Granite City Steel. National steel as a whole is somewhat higher than that.

We're not satisfied, though. Our goal is to reach the 100 percent figure that is achieved by some Japanese mills and many of the newer steel mills around the world.

Our continuous caster is controlled by a digital PDP 11-34 which we are in the process of upgrading to an 11-44 model. This computer is linked to 16 CRT's and performs a host of functions including:

Monitoring mold cooling parameters and sounding the alarm if conditions outside a given critical value arise.

Secondary spray cooling. The computer sets water flow rates for each zone of the caster as the slab is being cast, so that a specified volume of water per square foot of steel is applied to the slab from the time it exists the spray chamber.

The computer also provides a report for heats cast which is being expanded to assign automatic internal and external quality points for each slab cast.

The assignment of such quality points will allow the upgrading or downgrading of a slab before it is cut. This will improve our ability to match the characteristics of steel to the customer's needs as it is produced and therefore increase our performance in critical applications.

A LOOK AT THE FUTURE

As I said earlier, time doesn't allow me to take an in-depth look at all of the applications of technology on a daily basis throughout the mill, but I hope these few examples will illustrate my point. However, we must not be satisfied with what we have achieved. We must be looking ahead.

In the next year, we have planned further computerization of the mill, all of which will, I believe, improve our competitive position.

In the ironmaking area, we will use a micro-computer to control the scale cars which supply raw materials to the blast furnace. The blast furnace control parameters will be monitored by a distributed process control system.

Also, each blast furnace will have a supervisory computer which will be linked to the process control system, the scale car system and to an "area level computer."

This area level computer will be placed in the ironmaking area and will provide the communications to all levels of our growing computer hierarchy.

On the steelmaking side, a new ladle metallurgy station will contain a supervisory level computer and will pass control information into a programmable logic controller. Again, this computer will be integrated into our growing network.

All analytical devices now connected to the BOF computer will be connected with the area level computer, as will most of the CRT's and the caster computers.

In the finishing area, a computer will be used for cold mill shape control. This computer will control roll bending, screw positioning, interstand tension, and cooling water to provide a flat product.

However, I don't want to leave you with the impression that computer technology alone will provide the solution to the profit crisis facing the industry.

At Granite City Steel, we will continue to rely greatly upon the expertise of our people. As I mentioned earlier, our programming for the hot strip mill computer was done entirely in-house, making it, as nearly as we can tell, the largest job of its kind.

Another example of how we rely on people is our newly created operations technology department.

This group will have three major duties:

Development of SOP's for each unit.

Installation of statistical process and quality control methods.

Development of process improvement through technical problem solving.

Here is the way the three functions should interact:

The SOP identifies the key process elements that must be controlled and identifies the procedures that must be used to control them in order to produce a consistent product at our present state of the art.

Statistical process control methods are identified for each of the control elements and written into the SOP. This provides means to control these elements and allows us to monitor if they are in control. This may include graphs, X bar charts, or pre-control charts. The objective is to determine when the key control variables are going out of control and to take corrective action in order to prevent loss of control.

The technology teams are involved with improving the process. They will be highly qualified engineers (mechanical, electrical, chemical and metallurgical). They study deficiencies and formulate solutions. The SOP's are then modified to include these improvements.

If it all works as it should, we develop an upward spiral in quality and consistency.

1. Develop SOP's;
2. Monitor SOP's;
3. Develop improvements;
4. Modify and formulate improved SOP's; and
5. Continue the improvement spiral.

The program has just gotten underway. We expect to finish SOP's on four major units this year and complete SOP's on all major units in three years. During 1985, we expect to have twenty people working in operations technology.

The implications for process control resulting from this group are tremendous. Measuring the key control variables and charting them in the statistical process procedure may initially be manual. In the long run, however, we must develop automatic devices to measure the key variables, tie them to computers, and computerize the monitoring of these key variables. Furthermore, computerization of the SOP's will be essential in order to visually present them to the operators as they are performing the processes. This is a huge challenge.

At this point, let's discuss the impact of Nippon Kokan which is a 50 percent owner of National Steel Corporation.

Kokan is regarded by most industry observers as being a leader in the use of technology, and while we are only now beginning to explore some of the areas of potential cooperation with our new Japanese partner, I am confident that we will benefit tremendously from their knowledge.

It will be a major responsibility of the operations technology department to work hand in hand with Kokan and transfer what is learned throughout our operations.

So you can see that we are committed to the application of technology. We believe that this will be the key to helping National Steel, our parent corporation, become this country's first world-class steel producer.

SUMMARY

In closing, I'd like to briefly review my main points. We've talked about the morass that the domestic steel industry has found in. Much of this was undoubtedly due to our head in the sand—or elsewhere—approach of a decade ago.

I've talked about some of the examples of applied technology at our mill. And, we're not unique within National Steel, because a similar case could be made for our other divisions. We at National are already one of this Nation's most modern steel producers, and we're committed to accelerating the pace of our technological advancements.

Because of this, I have urged that policymakers, the public, and this audience to consider what I believe to be a natural relationship between so-called high-tech industries and the smokestack industries. Perhaps, the definition of a high-tech industry is ready for some broadening.

Technology alone, of course, cannot be the answer. But it must be a major contributor to an attack on the problems of quality and costs which have besieged the steel industry in recent years.

For this to happen, the steel industry itself must be willing to use the tools of technology rather than rely solely on relief from competition through artificial restrictions in the marketplace.

There are too many Americans who will not be sympathetic to the industry's pleas, unless they see a self-help program in progress.

Because of that, I hope that steel—of which I am proud to be a part—can capitalize on the technological opportunities which await it. For most steel firms, survival will depend upon the degree to which they become a customer-oriented producer of consistently high-quality, competitively-priced steel. This is our goal at Granite City Steel and at National Steel Corporation.

Speaking for Granite City Steel and National Steel, I believe that technology must play a vital role in helping us get there. And our success can be a part of the historical reshaping of one of the great industries of this country—an industry without which America cannot be great.

Thank you.●

BILL ORDWAY

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, Bill Ordway has served the State of Arizona as State transportation director since the establishment of the Arizona Department of Transportation [ADOT] in July 1974. His public service career spans 35 years, 27 of which have been spent with ADOT and its predecessor, the State highway department. Arizona is losing one of its finest and most cherished servants; Bill Ordway has announced his intention to retire.

As ADOT director, Bill has presided over a tripling of Arizona's transportation construction program which will exceed $400 million this year. His agency has produced this increase in product with a manpower reduction of more than 1,200 since the peak interstate construction year through an aggressive program of operational cost reductions, use of new technology and systems, and calling on private sector services rather than increasing ADPT's full-time work force.

Bill is the only Arizonan to ever become president of the prestigious American Association of State Highway and Transportation Officials [AASHTO], service which he completed in December 1984. He has also headed the Western Association and has served in various leadership capacities in the national and regional transportation groups over the past 10 years.

Bill has served in the cabinets of four Arizona Governors. His expertise and experience will be sorely missed in Arizona. We are eternally grateful to Bill for his work on behalf of the State of Arizona.●

PETITION OPPOSING ELIMINATION OF TVA LAND BETWEEN THE LAKES PROGRAM

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am pleased to present to the Senate a petition from residents of Stewart County, TN. The petition, signed by 513 citizens, underscores the strong opposition many in my State have expressed about administration proposals to drastically reduce the Federal budget for TVA activities in our region.

The Office of Management and Budget has targeted TVA for a 70-percent reduction in its nonpower programs, including local economic development, natural resources activities, fertilizer research and development and other fertilizer programs, agricultural resources development, and other activities.

One of the extremely worthwhile programs conducted by TVA in recent years is the management of the Land Between the Lakes, an area within the banks of the Tennessee River which is now providing not only recreation, conservation, and research opportunities, but hundreds of new jobs in an area hard hit by the recent recession—an area which has, like much of Tennessee, not enjoyed the fruits of the economic recovery in other parts of the country.

TVA's orderly management of resources at Land Between the Lakes would end under the OMB proposal. I have expressed my strong opposition to such a proposal, and will continue to do so if such an ill-conceived reduction is part of the President's final budget soon to be presented to Congress.

Mr. President, too often budget numbers are only abstract reflections of Government activity. This petition from more than 500 Tennesseans provides a moving testimony that a Federal program, in this case the Land Between the Lakes activity by TVA, is of widespread benefit to many.●

GENOCIDE CONVENTION

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I would like to recommend that my colleagues read the editorial by Senator HATCH which appeared in the New York Times of April 3, 1985. The Senator's article vividly describes the potential consequences of American ratification of the Genocide Convention. As is apparent from Senator HATCH's article, it is not the countries which commit genocide that need to fear punishment under the treaty—for they are only engaged in "political solutions"—but those such as Israel and the United States who support democracy and oppose communism which would be persecuted under this fatally flawed document.

I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 23, 1985]

REJECT THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

(By Orrin G. Hatch)

WASHINGTON.—The Senate should proceed with the utmost caution next week when the Genocide Convention comes up for ratification for the sixth time since it was proposed in 1949. Today, as before, there is every reason to reject the treaty in its current form, which could so easily play into the hands of those hostile nations that wish to make trouble for America and its allies.

Consider the following scenario. The year is 1990. Israeli Defense Minister Yaakov Levin, in New York City to make a speech before B'nai B'rith, has been arrested in the lobby of his hotel on a Federal warrant charging him with genocide against the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank. The warrant was issued by the United States Attorney's Office upon a complaint filed by the United Nations Secretary General. After arraignment, he is to be turned over to the International Genocide Penal Tribunal, at the United Nations. (The United States had participated in the creation of the tribunal the year before through an executive agreement.)

The Defense Minister will be held incommunicado, for under the Genocide Convention there is no right to bail, no probable-cause hearing and no due-process protections afforded to defendants. He personally is charged with genocide, since according to the convention only individuals can commit such acts. Governments are exempt from liability and cannot even be accused of complicity.

The particular crimes in question are: causing serious bodily and mental harm (undefined), deliberately inflicting conditions of life calculated to bring about the destruction of the Palestinian people in whole or in part and forcibly transferring Palestinian children from the West Bank. There are additional counts of conspiracy, incitement, attempt and complicity.

The Defense Minister is accorded no presumption of innocence. He has no immunity as a government official. He will be given the right to an attorney, not necessarily of his own choosing, but does not have to testify on his own behalf. He does not have a right to confront his accusers, cannot prevent heresay evidence from being introduced, has no fundamental fairness protections in court procedure and does not have to be proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

He has no right to a jury trial and, if convicted, will not be able to make use of any appellate review process. He cannot be released, even temporarily, by means of habeas corpus, since that doctrine does not apply under the Tribunal Statute. He cannot prevent extradition to the United Nations custodial authorities, for the executive agreement binding the United States to Genocide Tribunal discarded traditional American extradition protections and bound us to deliver any accused person to the United Nations authorities for trial.

After a three week media extravaganza, the Defense Minister is convicted on all counts by a 13-2 vote—unanimity is not required—with only the American and Zairian judges finding in his favor. He is sentenced to life imprisonment at hard labor and transferred to Syria to begin his sentence.

Israel, in the meantime, dramatically withdraws from the United Nations, angrily accusing the United States of betrayal. When Syria does not meet Israeli demands for return of the imprisoned minister, Israel mobilizes its army, and within days another Arab-Israeli conflict has begun. The Soviet Union immediately threatens the United States with retaliation. Israel is then declared an outlaw state in an overwhelming vote by the General Assembly, which calls upon all members to assist Syria.

Israel is a favorite target of Arab states and United Nations organizations. But under the provisions of the Genocide Convention as submitted to the Senate and the international court statute that would theoretically guide the establishment of the Penal Tribunal, this could happen to any foreign government official visiting the United States.

United States approval of the convention, as endorsed and interpreted by the Reagan Administration, could lead to this sort of fantasy becoming harsh reality. This must not be permitted, for the sake of our own national interests and world stability. We are all opposed to genocide, in any form, but the Genocide Convention, as proposed, is unacceptable.●

JOHN R. McINTIRE

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to commend John McIntire for his exemplary leadership as president of the Samaritan Health Center, of Detroit. Through his efforts, Samaritan Health Center has developed into a hospital facility that is responsive to the health, social, and economic needs of the community.

John McIntire came to Detroit in October 1977 to serve as director of the transition team responsible for planning the merger, in April 1978, of St. Joseph Mercy Hospital with Evangelical Deaconess Hospital. The merger of the two hospitals formed one entity, Samaritan Health Center, with John McIntire as president and chief executive officer.

At the time of the merger, two pressing issues were decreasing the cost of health care and reducing the number of acute care beds on Detroit's east side. The population was declining, while its characteristics were changing: The neighborhood was becoming older, poorer, and largely made up of minorities. These characteristics of the community increased health care needs at a time when primary care physicians were leaving. Under John McIntire's leadership, the new Samaritan Health Center responded to the growing health care needs of the east side community.

Later, a network of family health centers were built. Located in federally designated "Medically Underserved Areas" and "Health Manpower Shortage Areas" on Detroit's east and northwest sides, these modern, convenient health centers make basic health care available for many Detroiters. At these centers no one is denied service because he or she cannot pay.

The construction of General Motors' industrial park project near Hamtramck forced Samaritan Health Center to relocated its St. Joseph Mercy Hospital Unit. The planning and construction of Samaritan's inpatient replacement facility on Connor, by October 1984, represents an outstanding accomplisment in the construction of health facilities.

Furthermore, Samaritan's new Conner Campus has served as a nucleus for needed community and economic development on Detroit's east side. Through John McIntire's vision and leadership, a coalition of representatives from area businesses, institutions, and residents, joined resources to improve the quality of life for those living and working in the Warren/Conner area of Detroit's east side.

John McIntire has made an outstanding contribution to the Michigan hospital community in the field of facilities planning and construction. In addition, his leadership has benefited the larger community through community planning and revitalization efforts which are responsive to the social and economic needs of all citizens.

The Detroit community as well as the Samaritan Health Center will miss John McIntire. I join them in wishing John the best in his new position as chief executive officer responsible for merging two health facilities in the Minneapolis/St. Paul area for the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet. I am sure that through his leadership health care facilities will continue to grow more responsive to the needs of the communities they serve.●

THE RETIREMENT OF FATHER JOHN NACCA

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, on May 15, 1915, a great man, a fine friend, and a leader was born, Father John J. Nacca. I rise today in honor of the full life he has led and the enormous contributions he has made in creating a better, more caring world for all of us. His outstanding contributions warrant our appreciation and honor on the occasion of his retirement.

Father Nacca was ordained into the priesthood on June 7, 1941. In hopes of offering his life to the service of others, his church, and God, John became assistant pastor at St. Francis d'Assisi Church and then assistant pastor of St. Francis Xavier in Rochester, NY. Fate brought Father Nacca to St. Mary's of the Assumption in Fairport, to later become pastor of St. Francis d'Assisi in 1949. At age 34, he became the youngest pastor in the diocese of Rochester and now has the longest tenure as pastor in the diocese.

As a result of the caring efforts of Father Nacca, his parishioners were led to provide the generosity necessary to help build a new school, a shrine dedicated to Our Lady of Lourdes, and a new church building. But John Nacca was not interested in providing these benefits for just his surrounding community, he also wanted to reach out to other lands so that these people could appreciate some of the many opportunities that we so often take for granted in the United States. For example, he guided his parishioners and friends to fund the establishment of six mission churches including one in Africa, two in South Vietnam, and three in India.

John has been committed to helping people not only through the nourishing of their souls, but through the nourishing and clothing of their bodies as well. When an earthquake ripped through Italy in 1980, Father Nacca, along with his parishioners, labored to raise $10,000 in aid and tons of clothing. As a man who constantly sought out suffering individuals in need, not just in crisis times, he annually encouraged those around him to donate tons of clothing as a part of the Thanksgiving Day appeal.

The father even extended his efforts to educating the minds of the youth around him: Believing in the complete individual he strove to nurture the soul, the mind, and the body. He offered this last part of assistance directly by teaching religion to 1st through 12th graders. So great have been his efforts that he was "Man of the Year" as honored by the Christopher Columbus Commemorative Committee. Above all these things, if a man's life can truly be valued by how much he is loved by others, then Father John Nacca has truly led a great life. We honor him and all that he stands for, and may he continue to share his joy with us, as it truly illuminates our lives.●

APPALACHIAN REGIONAL COMMISSION

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this is not the first time the Reagan administration has asked Congress to terminate the Appalachian Regional Commission. For 5 years the administration has sought to end it, and for 5 years Congress has wisely rebuffed the administration's request. In the 20 years of its existence, the ARC's objective has been economic development throughout the region, and its accomplishments are noteworthy: introduction of dozens of carefully developed projects, expansion of employment opportunities, strenghtening of education and job training and retraining programs, and improvement in health care. The demonstrable success of its work is reflected in the dramatic decline in poverty levels and the concomitant rise in levels of personal income, education and health. In light of the achievements of the Commission, the administration's attempts to put it out of existence are shortsighted and self-defeating.

Mr. President, in a recent editorial, the Baltimore Sun made a persuasive case for extending the life of the Appalachian Regional Commission. I ask to have the editorial printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

KEEP APPALACHIA GROWING

The Appalachian Regional Commission, one of the most popular weapons in Lyndon Johnson's War on Proverty, is being phased out by the Reagan administration. It is dying of competition for tighter federal bucks and the fact that Jennings Randolph and Howard Baker, two influential regional champions, are no longer in the Senate. The panel is also a victim of its own success.

Created in 1965, the commission has since spent $5 billion, $3 billion on the vast Appalachian Development Highway System. The network of roads was built to free inhabitans from their regional isolation. According to federal figures, the system is working. Health, education and personal income levels have risen sharply since the highways were built.

Continued cutbacks in federal aid, however, are being felt in Appalachian states from New York to Alabama and Mississippi. In Western Maryland, both Allegany and Garrett county governments rely heavily on commission money, which in some cases is supplemented by the state. Governor Hughes has committed state funds to complete Western Maryland's National Freeway, now that the Reagan administration has set a 1990 deadline for receiving Appalachian highway money.

Any society committed to protecting citizens against sickness, proverty and ignorance should be happy with the commission's achievements. The dollars spent on training the young and retraining the jobless are two good reasons poverty has dropped from 31 percent of the region's residents in 1960 to 11 percent today. They are also two good reasons why the administration should think twice before turning out the light of opportunity to Appalachia prematurely.

The popular program still has plenty of support in the House of Representatives, including Western Maryland's Beverly Byron. But without Messrs. Baker and Randolph in the Senate, there is not enough muscle to stop the presidential phase-out. This is particularly unfortunate for the many villages lying in Appalachian hollows without water and sewer systems, or proper roads to carry them to jobs in neighboring towns already on their way to recovery. Admittedly, the president had serious choices to make, considering the budget-deficit situation. But when Congress finally approves a budget for this year, Appalachia should not be forgotten.●

HARVESTING THE TAX CODE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, the current tax structure in our country provides for agricultural tax shelters that permit high-income investors to shelter nonfarm income in agricultural investments. This not only adds to our agricultural surpluses, but also costs our Government billions of dollars every year in lost tax revenues.

To remedy this situation, my esteemed colleague from South Dakota, Senator JAMES ABDNOR, has introduced legislation to limit to the national median family income at $23,000, the amount of off-farm income that can be used to offset a farm loss. This will help to make farming the Tax Code substantially less attractive to those in search of tax shelters. I commend Senator ABDNOR on having taken the leadership here in the Senate in addressing this problem in our tax structure and have added my name as cosponsor of Senate bill 244.

Recently, Newsweek magazine published an article on Senator ABDNOR's involvement with this issue. I ask that this article, "Harvesting the Tax Code," from the March 18 edition of Newsweek be inserted into the RECORD.

The article follows:

HARVESTING THE TAX CODE

The need for shelter is almost as basic as the need for food, and some enterprising humans have figured out a way to satisfy both. The past 20 years have produced a bumper crop of agricultural tax shelters, generally designed to shelter nonfarm income with farming losses. But in the midst of the deep agricultural depression, there is a growing belief that farming the tax code is making matters worse. Republican Sen. James Abdnor of South Dakota argues that the phenomenon "adds to our surplus-production problems," drives up land prices—and may even be accelerating soil erosion by encouraging the planting of marginal lands.

As a result, Abdnor is one of several farm-belt legislators leading a drive to make agricultural shelters less attractive. In terms of deals marketed to investors, such shelters amounted to less than .5 percent of the $18.6 billion in limited partnerships sold in 1984, according to tax-shelter consultants Robert A. Stanger & Co. But the various types of agricultural shelters cut a wide swath through farming. In 1981 farm net income reported to the Internal Revenue Service totaled $8.5 billion; farm tax and operating losses equaled $16.3 billion.

Most of those losses were incurred by full-time farmers aiming to make a profit, but a large portion were reported by several kinds of tax-code farmers. An estimated 60 percent of farm operators also earn income off the farm—and they may incur tax losses in farming that they apply against their nonfarm income, sometimes leaving them with little or no tax liability. But there are also high-income earners—many of them professionals or celebrities—who live on or own farms that may produce as little as $1,000 in sales each year. These "gentlemen farmers" often use tax benefits from farming—such as investment tax credits or depreciation of farm equipment and live stock—to shelter nonfarm income, if they live on a farm, they may be able to deduct almost all their living expenses and generate huge tax losses. Finally, there are also passive tax-shelter investors who simply buy into an agricultural Partnership, drawing many of the same tax benefits they would get from other forms of shelters.

Tax-code farming may produce a number of distortions in the economics of agriculture. Take, for example, the development of the "supercow"—a superior milk producer that is artificially induced to produce dozens of calf embryos a year. Because cows are eligible for investment tax credits, rapid depreciation and other tax benefits, these are bought and sold frequently, bidding up prices to statospheric levels. And because they and their offspring are so good at producing milk, some dairy farmers complain that they are exacerbating the nation's huge dairy surplus. "Is it fair? Hell, no," says George Morgan, a Walton, N.Y., dairy farmer who manages cows for investors. "But [I don't believe] the current tax system [is] fair at all."

Some economists think critics of tax-code farming overstate its ills. The current overproduction of cow embryos should be self-correcting; if the embryos "aren't very marketable," says Allen Bock, a professor of agricultural law at the University of Illinois, the business should shrink. Moreover, government dairy price supports are far more responsible for the dairy surplus than any number of supercows. Nonetheless, Abdnor has introduced a bill to limit to $23,600 the amount of off-farm income that any individual can offset with farm losses. The bill is considered a long shot, but if it passes, it could send many absentee farmers looking for shelter somewhere else.●

FCC POLICYMAKING

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, over the past few years we have seen this country's telecommunications policies thrown into disarray by the divestiture of AT&T, the proliferation of new products and services, and the extraordinarily competitive environment that has ensued. The Congress has been continually involved, in an effort to gauge the impact on universal telephone service in particular. As a member of the House Telecommunications Subcommittee, I was active in this debate, and now, as a member of the Senate Communications Committee, I have continued that involvement.

These have always been extremely difficult, complicated issues to reduce to policy terms. In fact, it has often been alleged that new technology has always been one step ahead of the Congress' efforts to produce policies that are in the public interest.

Adding to this condition of confusion and complexity has been the new reluctance of the Federal Communications Commission to aggressively represent the public interest through commonsense regulation. Instead, the Commission has taken an ideological position, that the private marketplace will take care of any problems which face consumers in this new telecommunications environment.

I believe the Senate should actively consider whether the FCC has abandoned its traditional role. I recently came across an article in Legal Times by Harry M. Shooshan III and Erwin Krasnow, who make a strong case that the Commission has lost its bearings. I do not necessarily agree with all of their assumptions or conclusions, but the article is one of the most comprehensive recent examinations of the relationship between the FCC and Congress. I have worked with Mr. Shooshan when he was counsel to the House Telecommunications Subcommittee, and I commend this article to you.

The article follows:

[From the Legal Times, Apr. 8, 1985]

NEW CHECKS, BALANCES AFFECT FCC POLICYMAKING

(By Harry M. Shooshan III and Erwin G. Krasnow)

Throughout its 50-year history, the Federal Communications Commission has been a target of more criticism and prolonged investigation by Congress than any other federal agency. While the FCC technically may be an "independent" agency, its independence is circumscribed by its role as an "arm of the Congress," and its expertise is tempered by political concerns.

To Congress, the independence of the FCC means independence from White House domination, not independence from its congressional parent. Thus, the commission is free to make decisions, but must keep its eye on the House and Senate to protect its operating budget and political capital.

Congressional influence on FCC policymaking has assumed many forms, including statutory directives, budgetary limitations, and oversight by various congressional committees. However, during the last four years, the commission has been subject to more rigorous congressional control than at any time in its history. Congress has intervened to block or reverse an unusually large number of major FCC decisions, using legislative moratoriums, periodic authorizations, and 11th-hour riders to appropriations bills.

What has emerged is a new system of checks and balances on the FCC's decision-making power in matters of policy. Traditionally, if parties lost at the commission, they filed appeals with the courts. If that route proved unsuccessful, those parties could seek remedial legislation from Congress. Parties now are taking their cases directly to Capitol Hill, often before the commission has even completed its formal proceedings.

Do these new checks and balances constitute more effective oversight or unwarranted interference? The answer may depend on which side of the substantive issues one embraces. As one wag observed, "Where one stands in Washington depends on where one sits." But the rules of the game clearly have changed, and lawyers as well as clients must deal with the consequences of those changes.

LEGISLATIVE VETOES AND MORATORIUMS

Over the last decade, Congress has frequently passed legislation to override specific agency initiatives. The Federal Trade Commission, the Food and Drug Administration, and the Department of Transportation are among those agencies that have been affected. Until recently, the FCC has escaped such action, even though it has made a number of very controversial decisions.

For example, the FCC's decisions to open up the domestic telecommunications market to competition were carefully reviewed by Congress in the 1970's after criticisms from interested parties but were never vetoed. Similarly, the FCC's decisions to deregulate cable television, radio, and television were controversial, yet they did not precipitate congressional intervention.

In 1983, however, Congress twice used the threat of legislation to reverse FCC decisions before they had been finally adopted. On Nov. 10, 1983, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 4102, which reversed the FCC's telephone access charge proposal and prohibited the commission from imposing a monthly $2 "customer access line charge" on residential customers and a $6 charge on business users. On Nov. 10, 1983, the House passed H.R. 2250, which imposed a six-month moratorium on the FCC's efforts to revise its restrictions on television networks operating in the syndication market—the so-called financial interest/syndication rules.

Neither bill was enacted because the FCC retreated in the face of letters from key senators urging the commission to back off from its proposed actions. As a result of this pressure, the commission delayed imposing any end user charges on residential and small business customers for 18 months and ultimately scaled back its proposed access charge to $1 in December 1984. In addition, the commission abandoned its efforts to reform the financial interest/syndication rules and put this controversial topic "on the back burner" despite its careful deliberations on a voluminous record.

In both instances, the losers at the FCC built successful political coalitions on Capitol Hill to thwart the commission's initiative. In each case, Congress threatened to enact legislation that amounted to a "veto" of the commission's decision.

A moratorium is an attractive legislative tool. It offers relative political safety because supporters can argue that they are not taking sides on the merits, but are seeking only a fuller consideration of the issue. Since a moratorium has the effect of preserving the status quo, it places a heavy burden on those parties supporting change to demonstrate that the prevailing rules are "broke" and need fixing.

Such legislation—or even the threat of it—has substantive consequences for the FCC. While this form of legislative duress is not new, the 98th Congress marked the first time it was used to block FCC rulemakings.

PERIODIC AUTHORIZATIONS

The commission also faces more rigorous oversight because of its loss of status as a permanently authorized agency. Historically, most federal programs were permanently authorized; at the end of World War II, nearly 95 percent of the federal budget was under permanent authorization. A permanent authorization usually has no fixed term and does not refer to any specific fiscal year.

Moreover, it usually contains no dollar limitations, authorizing "such sums as may be necessary." Annual control over a permanently authorized agency's budget—and often over its substantive decisions—rests with the Appropriations Committees.

Beginning in the 1970s, Congress shifted an increasing number of agencies from permanent to annual or multiyear (i.e., two-to-five-year) authorizations. Only about half the federal budget now remains subject to permanent authorization. This change in the nature of authorizations reflected the proliferation of subcommittees and the growth of congressional staff. As Congress developed more expertise, the legislative committees and their subcommittees wanted to exercise tighter control over the agencies and programs within their jurisdictions.

Furthermore, since the use of annual authorizations reduces the time available for consideration by the Appropriations Committees, it virtually ensures that the legislative committees retain primary oversight and policy responsibility. While constraints on the appropriations process are less severe with multiyear authorizations, the need for Congress to authorize an agency on a periodic basis strengthens the legislative committees.

Elimination of the FCC's permanent authorization initially received attention with the introduction in 1978 of the first proposed "rewrite" of the Communications Act. Rep. James T. Broyhill (R-N.C.), the ranking Republican member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, subsequently proposed a three-year authorization for the FCC. His approach was endorsed in 1981 by a coalition of key Republican leaders in the Senate. One of the Senate cosponsors, Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), made it clear that he was proposing the change in order to enable the Commerce Committee, which he chaired, to monitor the commission's activities more closely.

Spurred by their Republican colleague's interest in reform, House Democrats introduced legislation to require the annual authorization of the FCC. Both Republican and Democratic members of Congress clearly wanted to keep the commission on a tighter rein, and their concerns related to substantive policy rather than simply budgetary matters.

Neither the Senate nor the House bill passed. But a rider to the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981 eliminated the FCC's permanent authorization and replaced it with a periodic authorization that was set initially at $76.9 million for fiscal years 1982 and 1983. The conference committee report accompanying the fiscal year 1983 federal budget confirmed that the congressional objective was to "increase Commission accountability for the implementation of Congressional policy."

The shift to periodic authorizations not only strengthened the oversight roles of the House and Senate Commerce Committees, but also created an important legislative vehicle for changing the Communications Act every two years. Because an authorization statute is necessary to keep the FCC functioning, this legislation can carry the weight of amendments to the Communications Act that otherwise would be much more difficult to approve on their own.

The FCC Authorization Act of 1983 demonstrated that Congress would not be reluctant to use this power. The legislation contained 12 substantive provisions, including prohibitions on the Corporation for Public Broadcasting's funding of National Public Radio, relaxation of the regional concentration of ownership rules for certain broadcast stations that made changes to technical facilities to improve service, and bans on obscene messages made available over "Dial-It" telephone services.

The most significant amendment to the Communications Act was the adoption of a national policy "to encourage the provision of new technological and services to the public". Congress created a statutory presumption that any new technology or service is in the public interest and required the FCC to make a public interest determination as to any new technology or service within one year after a petition of application is filed.

Four of the provisions were added after the authorization bill had been reported by the House Energy and Commerce Committee, demonstrating Congress' creation of a biennial "communications Christmas tree" for any manner of amendment.

APPROPRIATIONS: RIDERS AND REPORTS

Through its hold on the FCC's purse strings—a power shared to a limited extent with the Office of Management and Budget—Congress can control not only the total amount of money allocated to the commission but also the purposes for which funds may be used. Perhaps more vividly than any other form of influence, the appropriations process underscores the myth of the FCC's "independent" status. The impact of the 97th and 98th Congresses on FCC policymaking was even more significant because of changes in the traditional use of the appropriations process as an FCC oversight tool.

A common form of congressional control over regulatory agencies is for the Appropriations Committees to incorporate policy directives and restrictions in the reports accompanying appropriations bills. This practice became especially prevalent after Congress shifted from a line item to a "lump-sum" agency budget approach.

Although their committee reports are not law, the Appropriations Committees expect that they will be regarded almost as seriously as if they were—an expectation that the FCC usally fulfills. The FCC's ill-fated involvement in the "family viewing hour" plan came in response to an informal directive in a 1974 House Appropriations Committee report to deal with the effects of televised violence and sexually explicit material on children.

In 1983, a congressional appropriations bill report urged the commission to expedite the processing of applications for low-power television stations. Low-power television was a new service for which the FCC had begun to accept applications in 1980. At the time the FCC authorized this service, it had given little or no thought to how the thousands of applications would actually be processed. As the backlog increased, congressional pressure began to build, especially from Senate Democrats who charged that the Republican-controlled commission might be "soft" on fostering competition while taking a hard-line in support of deregulation.

HISTORICAL RELUCTANCE

Historically, the Appropriations Committees have been reluctant to use reports to make broad policy statements. In the 98th Congress, however, a Senate Appropriations Committee report reiterated congressional support for the FCC's political broadcasting rules and warned the commission not to weaken or eliminate the rules in any way. The committee's intent was to head off FCC rulemakings aimed at removing the personal attack and political editorial rules and modifying the general Fairness Doctrine. The FCC sagely retreated in the face of this congressional pressure, even though as a matter of law a committee report does not have the same force and effect as a statutory restriction.

Congress can also attach "provisos" to appropriations bills that limit expenditures, prohibit expenditures for certain purposes, or require expenditures for particular activities. Such provisos legally require the FCC to follow the congressional directive.

However, provisios and other statutory limitations can create problems under House rules that prohibit the inclusion of legislation in appropriations bills. There is often a fine line between telling a federal agency how it should spend its funds and establishing new law or policy. Consequently, these rules have generated a substantial body of interpretation and precedent.

The rules were intended to protect and preserve the oversight jurisdiction of legislative or "substantive" committees. Therefore, any appropriations bill with a legislative provision is subject to a point of order on the Senate of House floor. Congress nevertheless has used riders to make policy on issues ranging from prayer to gay rights.

In the 98th Congress, Congress used an appropriations bill rider to block the commission's liberalization of its television group ownership rules. The FCC originally decided to increase the maximum number of stations from seven to 12 and to "sunset" its group ownership rules altogether in 1990.

Even before the commission had the opportunity to act on reconsideration, opponents took their case to Congress. The primary party was the Motion Picture Association of America, which was concerned that the new rule would increase the power of the three commercial television networks.

Immediate criticism of the FCC's action came from Sen. Pete Wilson (R-Calif.), a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and Rep. Tim Wirth (D-Colo.), chairman of the House telecommunications, consumer protection, and finance subcommittee. Wilson attached a rider to the supplemental Appropriation bill (H.R. 6040) that prohibited the FCC from changing its ownership rules until April 1, 1985.

Despite the fact that FCC Chairman Mark Fowler agreed to withhold action—as he had done with access charges and the financial interest/syndication rules—the House adopted the Senate-passed measure in the closing days of the 98th Congress. The FCC's proposed decision had, in effect, been "remanded" by Congress before its final adoption by the agency.

In December 1984, the FCC modified its original decision by eliminating the sunset provision, granting special treatment for minority ownership, and adding a limitation on the audience reach of a group's stations. Wilson, who helped negotiate the amended rule with FCC commissioners, hailed the FCC's action as an enlightened compromise, while Commissioner James Quello said the agency had been hit by an "absolute steamroller."

Clearly, excessive use of these forms of legislative duress undermines the independence of the agency. This is especially true when the threat of veto is in the hands of legislators who have influence over the FCC but who do not represent majority views in the Congress. Former FCC Chairman Newton Minow pointed out that "it is easy—very easy—to confuse the voice of one congressman, or one congressional committee, with the voice of Congress."

More recently, in a farewell address to the Federal Communications Bar Association, Commissioner Robert E. Lee observed:

"Every Commissioner is tested in his or her early days by requests for special attention. Many times these requests are legitimate; they seek redress for unreasonable delay or bureaucratic red tape. Of course, one must respond. But if special favors are granted, the requests never stop and one finds 535 bosses calling the tune."

Individual members of Congress may be subverting the intent of the Administrative Procedure Act. Wilson's private discussions with Fowler on rewriting the FCC's original television group ownership decision apparently had much greater impact than the pleadings filed by interested parties and the commission's staff. Wilson has apparently also been quitely active in opposing FCC efforts to liberalize its restrictions on network ownership of cable systems. Such behind-the-scenes "lobbying" by individual senators and congressmen tends to subvert the role of public participation in rulemaking proceedings mandated by Congress in the Administrative Procedure Act.

When more individual congressmen and interest groups recognize and capitalize on the changing relationship between the FCC and Congress, the commission may find itself threatened with legislative retaliation at every turn. Ironically, a political standoff in Congress on a given issue may neutralize the political pressures on the commission and allow the FCC to reclaim some of the independence it has lost over the last four years.

And while the commission's independence may have been challenged, its importance in establishing communications policy actually may be increasing. On many controversial issues, Congress has found that it is easier to defer to the FCC than to pass new legislation. While Congress stands ready to take legislative action to keep the FCC from moving too quickly, too soon, or too far in a "wrong" direction, Congress may have abdicated much of its legislative function to the FCC by merely reacting to commission initiatives rather than advancing its own proposals.●

ON THE DEATH OF PATRICIA ROBERTS HARRIS

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, an unswerving champion of civil rights and of a decent home and basic human services for those of limited means has passed from our midst.

Patricia Roberts Harris, who died March 23, had a long and distinguished career as a dedicated public servant.

Among the public posts to which Pat Harris brought grace, dignity, and a conviction of purpose were delegate to the United Nations; Ambassador to Luxembourg; Secretary of Housing and Urban Development; and Secretary of Health and Human Services. She carried out her duties in each of these positions with versatility and a quick command of the situation.

At no time, however, did she allow the power or prestige of these high public offices to go to her head. Pat Harris was well aware of and never forgot her roots as the daughter of a Chicago pullman car porter. Her experiences as a black woman and her sensitivity to the needs of black and other minority Americans during, not only times of segregation, but also times of more subtle and sophisticated discrimination, were always with her and never forgotten. She translated that sensitivity into a sense of purpose to right the wrongs of our society. She constantly challenged us to do better.

I had the good fortune to work closely with Pat Harris when she served as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development from 1977 to 1979. As the ranking member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on HUD and Independent Agencies, I was impressed by her command of the facts and her single-mindedness of purpose to provide housing for those of low and moderate income.

In 1977, Secretary Harris came to me and asked me to introduce amendments to the Fair Housing Act to strengthen HUD's enforcement role in conciliating between the parties in individual housing discrimination complaints. I was proud to introduce the legislation which, after numerous hearings and markups, was passed by more than a two-thirds bipartisan majority in the House but failed by filibuster to pass the Senate.

Pat Harris did not mince words. When she saw a wrong to be corrected she went at it relentlessly, bringing her acumen in the law to bear.

For example, in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution, in response to a Senator skeptical of the fair housing bill, who feared it represented Federal Government oppression of property owners, Secretary Harris had this to say:

I think that objectively, as one examines the history of this country and especially the history of housing discrimination, efforts to bring equality to the one area that I know about that is consistently refused, the offer of money by persons who are black, is not oppressive.

It is an effort to bring equality to the marketplace of housing and I cannot agree that an effort, a genuine, concerned effort to bring equality to an area which is clearly fraught within equality today, is an example of Federal oppression.

It is an example of the implementation of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments.

And before the counterpart House Judiciary Subcommittee, she got right to the heart of the matter:

Our present authority is limited to a purely voluntary process of "conference, conciliation, and persuasion." I will not dwell on the ironies associated with a law that mandates HUD to investigate and to establish the existence of violations of law, and then limits the Secretary to asking the discovered lawbreaker whether he wants to discuss the matter.

And again, in 1979, before the same House Subcommittee, Secretary Harris challenged the Congress to act on a fair housing bill with these words:

Let me say that there are so many consequences of our failing to solve our housing problem in this country, that failure to make a major effort now, with sufficient enforcement powers, may lead us to racial problems in the generation of the grandchildren of, certainly, not mine but of my relatives. We must have the ability in our lifetimes or in the foreseeable future to bring this commodity of shelter within the purview of people who are able to purchase it. It is the only market in which the color of the money is less important that the color of the purchaser or the race or national origin of the purchaser.

Mr. President, it would indeed be a fitting testimonial to Patricia Roberts Harris if a bipartisan majority in both Houses would again take up her challenge to us and move a fair housing bill to enactment. We will miss her continuing challenge to our consciences.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if Senators would take their seats, we could send out for the absentees. It will only take about 5 minutes or so. There will be eight pictures taken, but we want to make certain that every Senator who can be here is present.

Mr. President, I believe we have identified the Senators we need to check on, so for about a couple of minutes, I suggest the absence of a quorum. But do not leave your seats.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OFFICIAL SENATE PHOTOGRAPH

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am advised that all the Members who can be here are here and that we can proceed. If all Members will take their seats, it will be about a 5-minute process. There will be eight flashes. We will try to keep taking one until everyone looks good.

[Laughter.]

In any event, we will get on with the picture.

(At this point, the official photograph of the Senate was taken.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. PRESSLER]. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

(During the quorum call the chair was occupied by Mr. COCHRAN and Mr. ABDNOR.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BOSCHWITZ). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there may be some who wonder what we have been doing this afternoon. Some of us have been wondering ourselves.

But let me indicate that we had hoped to call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 and get some agreement that we could have discussed it for 3 or 4 hours today and that the resolution would be limited to debate only, no amendment. Because, very frankly, the President will make a stirring address this evening at 8 p.m., a nationwide address on television. There will be great interest in what the President has to say. We believe it will be helpful to the process and not in just strictly partisan sense, but I believe Americans—Democrats, Republicans, Independents, whatever—will listen carefully to the President and also listen carefully to the distinguished minority leader who will respond to the President. I assume they will be saying pretty much the same thing.

But, in any event, it seemed to us that it might be less than strategic to call up the resolution and perhaps get into some amendment process before we had had the benefit of the President's statement and the distinguished minority leader's statement which follows the President's address.

It is also fair to say that we have been trying to put together a way that we could have an early vote on the so-called leadership package. Again I would hope that we would have a unanimous vote, both sides, bipartisan, nonpartisan, but I doubt that may happen as early as tomorrow.

So we have been working with the distinguished minority leader—and I must say he has been very helpful, very willing to take up the bill this afternoon without amendment, but there were objections from other parts of the Chamber and they have just been lifted. And I doubt at this hour it would serve any purpose to call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 32.

But I did want to ask the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee if he was prepared to indicate how he has been making progress this afternoon. We have been together, so I could report that he is on the verge of progress. It is our hope that we can devise a process whereby the first vote will be on the so-called leadership package. Now, if that succeeds, it is still open to amendment, and motions to strike and amendments of all kinds can still be offered. But you do need, as I understand it, what they call mathematical consistency, is that correct?

Mr. DOMENICI. That is correct.

Mr. DOLE. I never understood that, but the chairman of the Budget Committee does. So I think at this point I would yield the floor in the hope that the chairman of the Budget Committee might give us an up-to-date report on the status of everything.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, let me first say to our distinguished leader that I think we have been making headway. I am sure there are, as he indicated, some who wonder what we have been doing and I from time to time feel like echoing his sentiment. I too have wondered what we were doing. But anytime I begin to wonder too much my mind is filled with $200 billion and $250 billion deficits. So I do not wonder very long before I come to the conclusion that clearly the reason we are having some difficulties is because this is a very difficult problem.

As a matter of fact, while I am not a historian, I clearly do not believe that, regarding economic matters, the Senate of the United States has ever had a more serious problem than this. Yet, out in America, many people still think things are OK.

I believe we have succeeded, however. I do not want to belittle anyone in this institution when I say I think we have succeeded in convincing Senators on both sides of the aisle that this country cannot long endure $200 and $250 billion deficits as far out as you can see. And that leads me to believe that the time we have spent in the Budget Committee, the time we have spent since then working with representatives of the President of the United States, the time we have spent in the last few days finishing up the leadership-administration package is time well spent.

From time to time, I feel that I am somewhat of a nuisance to our many committee chairmen. They have a lot of responsibilities. This is a magnificent institution. I think I have grown to understand it better. I did not feel that way a few years ago I wondered what I was doing here. But it is a magnificent institution.

We do not have any real clean, easy way, considering everybody's jurisdiction around here, to address issues of this magnitude. It is tough however you try to do it. Clearly it has been heartening for this Senator, and I hope for our distinguished leader, to see the willingness on the part of Senators to cooperate, to see the willingness on the part of chairmen who have some tremendous areas of responsibility and who want to get on with their work cooperate day after day in an effort to put together something that has a chance of working, something that we can vote on eventually that will significantly reduce this deficit.

Part of my thoughts here tonight are filled with the hope that these chairmen with high, high priorities and very broad responsibilities will read this RECORD, if they have not heard me before, and believe that I understand their situations. I also understand that the budget process is not perfect. But while I say that, I am quick to ask where in the world would we be today with this kind of deficit without something like a budget process to focus in on this kind of a problem?

And that brings me to just a brief discussion for my colleagues about the budget resolution reported by Senate Budget Committee and the leadership-administration proposal, which is ready but for a few items that we have to alter. I would like to take a look at that and just ponder a minute what it really tries to do. Both the Budget Committee resolution and the leadership-administration amendment propose to dramatically reduce deficits by altering entitlement programs and by asking authorizing committees of the Congress to change laws so that Federal programs which we feel we no longer need or need reforming will be changed so we can count on some substantial savings.

I understand that this process that I have just described is an adjunct to the goal-setting of a budget resolution named reconciliation. I do not know why it was named that. I think I understand how those who first drew this law came up with the name.

But basically what we are going to try to do is to ask not the Budget Committee but the U.S. Senate and ultimately the U.S. Congress to set goals for spending that will cut the deficit in half. At the same time we will ask—I repeat not the Budget Committee but this institution—to direct its committees to reduce spending that is authorized within their jurisdiction in each of the next 3 years.

Whether that is what reconciliation was 8 years ago or not, it is reconciliation as we have practiced it here for a while. It is clearly reconciliation as we did it in 1981, 1982, and 1 year before that. We are going to hear a lot of debate and discussion about whether that budget resolution with those kinds of dollars requires cuts in programs by specific mandate. I have tried my very best to explain to everyone that there is no reconciliation of that type. People might assume that in the reconciliation instruction to the Agriculture Committee we are going to require changes in REA or in three or four of the foreign aid programs. But clearly this is intended to send, if it ultimately is the will of the Congress, a direction to the Agriculture Committee to draw an authorizing bill as part of reconciliation that achieves the savings mandated in the resolution. And we want to achieve these savings in a way that brings the authorizing committees into this cycle of budget reduction by saying that they have to be part of it, that we cannot leave it solely to the appropriators or to the entitlement and direct spending committees.

I hope those who are wondering whether there are mandated program changes will just read the Budget Committee resolution. I hope when we introduce the Republican leadership-administration proposal that they will just read it because we are going to hear a lot of debate about REA. We are going to hear debate about the farm loan programs, and several other programs.

Frankly, you are not going to find those in the reconciliation instructions. You are going to find dollar savings. If you then read on in the report, you will find that the Budget Committee made certain assumptions as to how you get to those numbers. Some people say you ought not make the assumptions. Well, if we did not make the assumptions, somebody would stand up and say, "you just pulled a number out of the sky. How are you going to get there?"

So historically, whether it was reconciliation in the last year of Jimmy Carter, or the last time we did it in any major way in the first year of Ronald Reagan, if you look in the report there are assumptions. But then if you look to the authorizing committees who did the work, it is their laws we are paying for, and the bills they have passed. They have not always done it the way that the report assumed. That is up to them. The Governmental Affairs Committee is a pretty good example. They will get an instruction—if what we hope to do lives through the next 5, 6, 10 days—telling them to save money within their jurisdiction, and clearly they have a lot of latitude. But we had to come up with some assumptions so that the goals that they are charged with meeting make some sense. But I repeat, the only binding part of these instructions is the total savings figure. For those that would prefer that we make no assumptions, clearly they can disregard the report. They can do their own thinking and they can analyze the committees that they are concerned about and the programs. They can talk to their staff and the experts on the committee, and see how they would get there. Maybe they would get there differently than the assumptions we made.

I have done my very best to explain this to everyone. I think there is a growing understanding about it. That is not to say there is not some chagrin. There might even be some serious concern about it. I hope that anyone who has concern about it from the standpoint of whether we should do it or not will give some serious thought to what might happen if we do not.

I do not like to say anything that I cannot follow up on 6, 8, or 9 days from now if this process goes on that long and we are on the issue of reconciliation. Frankly, I do not believe you are going to find any way—any way—to get savings of the type needed to bring this deficit under control unless you use the reconciliation procedure. And I clearly hope that everyone that is worried about that will give me and others who are terribly concerned an opportunity to explain why this does not take away anyone's jurisdiction. I hope they will give us a chance to explain why it indeed calls upon everyone's jurisdiction, every committee sharing this work. Frankly, I cannot imagine how during the rest of this year and all of next year we could get changes in the substantive law of this land of sufficient magnitude with sufficient certainty and in a timely manner to reduce the deficit by this amount if we did not have this process. Frankly, that is not something that I say because I am chairman of the Budget Committee. I serve on a lot of committees. I have a lot of concerns in other areas.

I probably have participated but for the revenue side of this Government in as many laws in the last 5 or 6 years as anyone else here. I work with the Environment and Public Works Committee, even in the Agriculture Committee from time to time I get my two bits in. The Superfund, the environmental laws, most of the energy laws, and in the last couple of years even on the Appropriations Committee. Frankly, I hope everyone will just think about that, unless you really do not want to do a package of any real magnitude, in which event you must be willing to expect some miracle so that deficit reduction is not necessary.

I ask everybody to really think carefully about how we do it any other way. This is not an argument about my package or about BILL ARMSTRONG's suggestion. It is not an argument about the Republican leadership-Presidential package, and it is not an argument for the Budget Committee package. It is merely a statement, as I see it, of the facts. We have a wonderful institution. We could not operate without these committees of jurisdiction, be they authorizing, appropriations, committees with direct spending jurisdiction, or committees that have an awful lot of entitlement jurisdiction. That is a very orderly way for parliamentary societies to govern. I have no desire to change it, at least not be way of the process that I am involved in chairing.

But I merely ask that everybody involved in all of those to take a real serious look not at their particular jurisdiction but at this deficit and how we have to make some material changes in the substantive law of our land in order to get this thing under control.

So we will discuss that. In the meantime, I am very proud of the work that we did in the committee, and I am very proud of the work we have done in the last few weeks. I make no apologies for the couple of days of delay. Frankly, I make no apologies for having worked with the President's people to get the President to come along with a budget that is substantially different from the one he sent us. Indeed, it is that. It is substantially different. Rather than criticize, I compliment. I think it is good that the President has dramatically changed his defense requirements.

I think it is excellent he has helped with the entitlement programs, including the pensions. I think it is also absolutely essential that we work with him.

So, clearly, we have done some things in this package we are going to propose that he wanted that we did not put into ours. Frankly, I hope everybody thinks that even if they cannot support it, there is nothing wrong with that. After all, he is the President. He did win an election by a landslide. He does have some understanding of what we ought to be doing. So I am not the least bit apologetic about having put something together with him. I am hopeful we will pass something very close to it.

I do not want to stand here and say there cannot be any changes. We do need to get the issue before the Senate, before the American people, in some way that everybody can understand. We are not just talking about amendments. We are talking about something everybody can understand. That is what our leader has been trying to put together by way of a procedure. It is not to pull the wool over everyone's eyes, not to deny amendments, but to put it up there where everybody understands.

Here is one package and it is clear. If you do not like the President, that is anybody's prerogative. But to the leadership on this side and to many others, that is it.

It does things. It cuts the deficit in half, assuming reasonably good economics.

If we can get it up there and everybody has a chance to vote for it so it is the pending business, it is there and not only is it the pending business but it is a resolution that you start amending.

I do not think that is asking too much. If somebody wants less for defense, they can propose it. We will put up a little chalkboard and say, "OK, we will save more in defense if they win and the deficit is lower."

We can look up there and if somebody says, "I do not like small business funding the way it is in that. I would like to add some more money to that function." We will put it up there so everybody understands we add about $600 or $700 million a year.

They can put taxes in to take its place, that is an option, or they find the money in some other program of Government. But I think it would be clearly understandable and everybody would abide by that kind of basic, simple rule. I think it would put everybody in a position where their rights and opportunities to offer amendments are all there and nobody would be saying when we did that it is all finished, that we have a package. But, clearly, we have something to measure against which is pretty concrete, pretty understandable, and has a certain kind of support. It is not 51 Senators, not 80 Senators, not 10 million Americans. We do not know how many. But we know at that point that the President and the leadership on this side and maybe 35 Senators do, for starters. I think that is a pretty good point to start.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator alluded to the assumption in the package. I think it cannot be too strongly emphasized that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and his committee, with those of us who worked on it, did not just reach into thin air for these assumptions. They are the result of countless hours of consultation, debate, discussion and research.

I must say this for the Senator from New Mexico, Mr. President: I have never seen anybody in this body more diligently apply himself to fairness and accuracy than he has in the preparation of this package.

That does not mean that all Senators are going to agree with the assumptions.

Mr. DOMENICI. That is right.

Mr. HELMS. But it is a fair balance between the spectrum of opinion about various items. That is the case, as the Senator knows, relative to farm matters.

Mr. DOMENICI. To agriculture, yes.

Mr. HELMS. I commend the Senator for the diligence he has devoted to coming up with realistic assumptions which will be debatable, which will be amendable. The Senator is on the right track and I did want him to know I am proud of him.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Senator.

I just want to make one more comment and then I will yield the floor. I see my good friend from Colorado has been waiting too long to speak. I should not have taken so much time. Frankly, I am speaking much more calmly than I normally do. That makes me speak much more slowly. When I am a little more worked up, I speak faster. So the Senator has had to wait a little longer than normal.

Basically, and I say this for all Senators on both sides of the aisle, we are going to participate in what I believe will be an historic week or historic 7, 8, or 9 days. We really believe it is important that we get a major deficit reduction package through. We really believe there is no more important work that we could be doing. Se we are not worried about how much time it has taken us and how much wear and tear has been involved. The only thing I hope, as one Senator, is that there is nobody who thinks we have done this in any way that was unfair, in any way to take advantage of anyone, or in any way trying to impose on this institution or its processes or its committees.

On the other hand, I would be remiss and probably not stating things as they are if I did not say you really cannot get anywhere with a problem as difficult as this unless you push. So I do not deny that we have pushed a little, and I do not deny that there are some who will not like what they are being asked to do. Frankly, with a problem of this type, when you have deficits under less than good economic times that could be as high as $250 billion in deficits—in another recession, if we had one, that could be $400 billion—and yet a budget that defense, Medicare, Social Security and interest total 80 percent of the budget, there is no question that to get that down you are talking about some big issues affecting a lot of people and affecting a lot of ideas, a lot of concepts.

But I have been governed by a very simple rule. When it comes to programs of our Government, I am one who genuinely tries to let them work. I tried many of them when I was mayor. Frankly, I have applied a very simple rule, and where people have doubts and are not sure they want to do something, I have asked them to apply just a little different test this year. Let me take one program as an example.

The Job Corps. Sure, the Job Corps does a lot of good. I have two programs in my State, a small State. I visited them. I have seen the teachers. I have seen the improvements we have made. I have seen the young people we have helped.

But I asked myself this: If I have taken the defense number down as far as I can and feel safe about our future, if I have done all I dare do to change the pension programs and Medicare programs that have brought our senior citizens from poverty 15 years ago so that very few are in poverty today, if I have done as much as I can, with a $200 billion deficit, would I today vote to start the Job Corps program? If it was not in here, if we had not dreamed it up yet? With those kinds of facts, would I have voted to start it up? Wherever I could say no, I said no, and I have recommended dramatic cuts and maybe even termination.

I have done the same thing on small business. I understand the Small Business Administration. But I ask myself, with the $200 billion-plus deficits, maybe $250 billion in deficits, would we start that program today or would we find some other way to help those few small business people that we are helping?

My answer on those was I could not see my way clear to vote aye to start that kind of program. I would have to first get that deficit under control.

Conversely, I have said if we are trying to set a pattern for the next 5 or 6 years, would I cut the programs of those that are poor in our country, and my answer is no, I have not recommended in any of these nor have I voted yes either in this package with the President or in my committee to cut programs like WIC, to cut programs like food stamps, to cut programs that help those who truly need it. Because I believe that those have to be a permanent part of what we are going to pay for. I do not think we ought to kid anyone. If there is a deficit with those programs, then we have to find some other way to take care of that deficit—not the programs.

So, those are the basic premises and ideas that I have used as I went through this not pleasant job.

I do not dislike any of these programs, and I do not dislike any of the people we are trying to help or any of the people who get subsidies, whether it is the people who get subsidies from Eximbank or those who get it from small business or those who get some exceptional-type loans under the farm program. I do not dislike anyone.

I think we are only talking tough when we are saying we cannot afford them. I think those are programs we need for the general economic good of the American future. Therefore, when I have come down on the side of reform, change, or termination, it is with the exception of the programs I discussed a few moments ago, that I believe take some kind of precedence in our particular national policy.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DENTON). The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, my only regret about the debate beginning tomorrow is that there will not be any TV cameras in the Chamber, because if the debate over the next couple of weeks were televised—and I must say it is tempting for me to ask unanimous consent that that be permitted, but I believe I shall withhold on that for a later time—if television viewers could watch the process that is going to unfold here over the next few weeks, I think it would make them proud of their country and make them proud of the U.S. Senate.

In any case, in the process of watching what is going to occur in the next 2 weeks in the Senate, I think the average American voter would learn probably more about the real priorities of this country's Government than they could learn in any other way, because we are beginning tomorrow a truly remarkable debate. I am not going to say much just now about the substance of the legislation which we shall consider tomorrow. I hope to have a chance to say something about that when we begin the actual debate. But I do want to make one observation about the process by which we have come to this point.

Particularly, I want to compliment the chairman of the Budget Committee, our colleague and friend from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] for an extraordinary accomplishment in bringing us this far.

When the Budget Committee sat down to hold its hearings and then mark up the bill a few weeks ago, most of the cynics said we would not be able to produce any kind of meaningful resolution. In fact, a lot of people said we would not be able to produce a resolution of any kind. That stated it would not be possible to get a majority of the committee to agree on even a basic resolution without specific figures.

But with great pleasure, great vision, and a tremendous, remarkable mastery of the detail of the budget process, the chairman [Mr. DOMENICI], over a period of a couple of weeks, not only succeeded in bringing a resolution out with a favorable recommendation, but, in fact, produced a budget which was, in many ways, better then that which had been submitted by the President of the United States—better, at least, in the sense that it resulted in a greater reduction of deficits and a more positive approach to actually reforming some of the programs. The cynics said that could not happen.

Then, when we got it out of committee, they said, "You will never begin to get enough votes to put anything together on the floor." And again, our colleague from New Mexico, with the help of the majority leader, began to patiently, one by one, go around and see what kind of support he could muster from Members of this body. The result of that process and the negotiations with the President of the United States is the leadership package which we shall present here tomorrow.

I am proud of that package, Mr. President. I think it represents probably the most fundamental reform, particularly in the domestic entitlement program area, that has ever been seriously considered by the U.S. Congress. I do not know whether it is going to pass tomorrow. My sense is that we are very close to having the votes to actually adopt as the basis for further action the proposal which will be laid down by the majority leader and by PETE DOMENICI, and of which 15 or 20 of us are proud to be cosponsors.

The fact of the matter is that we have already accomplished a lot more than seemed possible only a few weeks ago, so I feel good about what we are undertaking. I hope, as my colleagues reflect on how they want to vote tomorrow, they will keep in mind a couple of fundamental facts: First, that this so-called leadership plan, while it is not perfect, is probably the only game in town. It is easy to be the Monday morning quarterback and say, this is a lousy plan, it has things in it I do not approve of, it cuts too far here, it does not cut far enough in another area, they sure could have done a lot better on that.

And it is not hard to hold press conferences and issue statements about what is wrong with the plan, and I could do that because there are some things I do not approve of. There are some programs funded at higher levels than I approve of and some funded at lower levels. But the fact is that this is the only plan before the Senate which has even a reasonable prospect of passage. Somebody can say, we have a better idea, we are going to have more in taxes, we are going to cut defense, we are going to increase social security, we are going to make all kinds of adjustments. But I am not aware that anybody has a plan which even approaches having enough votes to actually pass. And I do not claim at this moment that we have the votes to pass the so-called leadership plan. I think we are close.

But, as Senators reflect overnight about how they are going to vote on the first fateful vote of this process, they might well remember that there are really only about three possibilities. One is that we are going to pass the leadership plan. Second is that we are going to pass something else, and I do not think there is really a viable alternative on the radar scope at the moment.

Or third, we are going to have chaos. That is just a fact. If we just do nothing, we prove the cynics are right, that we do not actually have the capacity to pass a budget resolution that makes meaningful reductions in the deficits over the next few years and this country is going to go through a wringer.

I cannot predict what the future is, Mr. President, but instinctively, we all know that is the case. If there is one thing on which there is agreement, not only in this Chamber but throughout the country, it is that if Congress does not do something to get these deficits corralled and do it now, interest rates are going to rise, the economy is going to stall out, unemployment is going to go back up, and there is going to be an unraveling of the public confidence which has fueled the recovery in the last 35 or 38 months. I think that is just inevitable. I believe the vast majority of Senators share that perception.

Certainly, I have talked to a lot of people around the country who know far more about how the economy works than I will ever know who agree on one thing, and that is that we have to do something on the deficits, and chaos and much hardship is the inevitable result if we fail to address that in a meaningful way.

If Senators want to know what we are going to do, I just hope they will keep in mind that there are a lot of packages that have even a prospect of success. Maybe something else will be presented, but after months of thinking about it, I am not aware that any Senator or any House Member or any outside person has proposed a comprehensive package that shows even the slightest sign of getting the 50 or 51 votes. The majority leader has not told us exactly how many votes he has for this plan. My own suspicion is that with a little good luck, a little statesmanship, and a little help on both sides of the aisle, we may pass this thing.

Mr. President, that brings me to something I want to mention which the viewers of the television screen would see in the next couple of weeks. I think they will see a few instances in the next couple of weeks when the cynics will be proven wrong.

There is a rumor running around that the minority party is going to be nothing but obstructionists, that they are going to let us stew in our own juice, that they are going to lock up and not give us votes. Maybe that is going to happen. I think not. Maybe in the final analysis, while both parties have the reason to jockey for political position, when push comes to shove, there is going to be a better degree of statesmanship on both sides of the aisle than some people are freely predicting.

I do not think we can pass our plan without some help from the Democratic side of the aisle, and at the crucial moment I believe we will get that help. I cannot tell you those names, and if I knew, I would not reveal them tonight. I am confident that we are not going to deadlock for four or five votes on the other side of the aisle to help us get over some tough points.

I do not want to go into detail on our plan. I will save it for tomorrow. But I should like to focus on why we think it is important to pass this leadership plan. It is not just to stave off the economic disaster that many people is inevitable if we do not pass this, but because it will have an extraordinarily positive effect on the economic future if we put it in place.

We did a telephone survey recently of Wall Street economists, and they say that just the passage of this plan will result in a 1-percent or 2-percent decline in interest rates in a very short time. That means a stronger economy. It means lower prices for potential home buyers. It means a tremendous advantage for the farmers and ranchers of this Nation.

Do you have any idea what a 1-percent change in the interest rate would mean for somebody buying a home? For the average home buyer today, it means $600 less per year on your house payment—just a 1-percent change in interest rates.

Many economists think we could expect in a reasonably short time a 2-percent or 3-percent change in interest rates. Do you have any idea what that would mean for farmers? In Colorado and a lot of other places, farmers, and ranchers, and other people in rural America are having a tough time, and there will be a great deal of debate about how to best help farmers and ranchers. The best thing is to bring interest rates down.

Net farm income this year will be around $20 billion. Just a 1-percent change in interest rates would add 10 percent to net farm income; 1 percent on marginal interest rates is $2 billion profit for the farmers of this country. A 2-percent change would be twice that, and so on.

Mr. President, I send to the desk at this time a few key points that should be in tonight's RECORD, so that Senators can look at them in the morning as a point of reference of what it will mean if we pass the leadership budget. I ask unanimous consent that these statistics be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EFFECT ON THE ECONOMY

A telephone survey of Wall Street economists indicates that passage of this package would mean a drop of at least 1 percentage point in interest rates over the short term and 2 to 3 percentage points drop over the longer term.

This would mean a stronger economy. The economic assumptions of the budget package are based upon enactment of this package and show the economy growing in real terms at 4 percent a year, with unemployment dropping to 6.4 percent. (CBO economic assumptions do not assume enactment; however Dr. Rudy Penner, Director of CBO, said enactment would mean lower interest rates and that the economic assumptions are "not unreasonable".)

This budget plan is a plan for prosperity:

Almost 7 million new jobs by 1988.

Housing starts back at the 2 million unit level.

Low inflation, remaining at around 4 percent.

National personal income increasing $800 billion by 1988.

THE AVERAGE AMERICAN FAMILY

Protecting the gains of the past

This is a low inflation, no tax increase, pro-economic growth plan. Without it the average American family could find themselves returned to the high tax, high inflation, no growth period of the Seventies.

Look how far we've come in the last four years:

Almost 8 million new jobs.

Inflation down from over 13 percent to just 4 percent.

Interest rate drop from 21 to 11 percent.

The strongest economic recovery in almost 30 years.

A median income house that now costs $73,000 would cost $100,000 had the late Seventies inflation continued; similarly, the monthly food bill is about $100 less than it would have been.

Tax cuts of $2,016 over the 1981-84 period for the median income family.

This budget package is the best insurance that average Americans can find to make the Eighties the Decade of Prosperity.

Guaranteeing the future

What does strong recovery throughout the rest of the decade mean for the average American family?

An increase in purchasing power (after inflation income) of $1,430 by 1988, and a total of $2,690 over the next four years for the median income family (presently earning $25,540).

With a 2 percentage point drop in interest rates, a reduction of nearly $100 a month in monthly mortgage payments on the median priced home ($80,000).

More job opportunities—7 million new jobs by 1988, and 13 million jobs over the 1985 through 1988 period.

No tax increases. In fact the faster we get our deficits under control, the faster the country can move to reform the tax system.

SMALL BUSINESS

With the increased economic growth made possible by the reduction of the deficits, there will be 7 million new jobs and an increase of personal income of nearly $800 billion by 1988. This means more sales and profits for small business.

Separate from the effect of a growing economy, the drop in interest rates from deficit reduction will improve the bottom line for business.

	Annual sales	Net income	Dollar benefit of— 1 percentage point drop	2 percentage point drop
Number of employees:
1 to 19	$505,000	$16,600	$1,485	$2,970
20 to 99	2,527,800	63,475	8,110	16,230

Source: Dun & Bradstreet, SBA.

Without a deficit reduction plan that only cuts spending, anything can happen in the years to come—higher interest rates, pressure for tax increases. Can small business afford either?

The benefits from a decline in interest rates means a hefty increase in net income: For a 2-percentage-point decline in interest rates, net income increases 18% for a firm with 19 or less employees; 26% for a firm with 20-99 employees.

FARMERS—GENERAL EFFECT OF INTEREST RATE DROP

Net farm income is estimated to be between $19 to $24 billion in 1985 and 1986. A 1 percent drop in rates means a $2.15 billion (10%) increase in net farm income; a 2 percentage point drop means $4.30 billion (20%) increase in income.

What does an interest rate drop mean to the average farmer?

	Dollar benefit of—
	1 percentage point drop	2 percentage point drop
$40,000 to $100,000 annual sales ($7,300 income from farm operations):
Average debt/equity ratio (19.8 percent)	$1,260	$2,520
As percent of farm operation income	18	35
Financially troubled (D/E 55 percent)	$3,618	$7,236
As percent of farm operation income	50	99
$100,000 to $200,000 annual sales ($22,500 income from farm operations):
Average debt/equity ratio (21.8 percent)	$2,441	$4,882
As percent of farm operation income	11	22
Financially troubled (D/E 55 percent)	$6,168	$12,335
As percent of farm operation income	27	55

SENIOR CITIZENS

SSI recipients—the aged, blind, and disabled receive a full COLA.

Social Security benefits are INCREASED under this plan.

Recipient	Annual benefits				Total increase
	1985	1986	1987	1988	1985–88
Widow(er), 2 children	$11,832	$12,576	$13,284	$13,992	$2,820
Retired couple	9,360	9,624	9,912	10,188	1,644
Retired worker, alone	5,400	5,532	5,700	5,844	876

The 2% COLA is guaranteed. Present law says that if inflation falls below 3 percent there is no COLA.

There is insurance protection if inflation starts to get out of hand: for every increase in inflation above 4 percent there is an exactly equal increase in the COLA: no cuts, no minuses, etc. So if inflation runs at 5 percent, you get the guaranteed 2 percent plus an additional 1 percent COLA to make up for the additional inflation.

But this is a low inflation budget. This means a lot to low income senior citizens who spend most of their money on necessities. Back in the late seventies even a full COLA didn't help you; necessities inflation was running at 17%, 4 percentage points above the COLA. With low inflation, the necessities inflation rate has been running at or below the COLA.

HOME BUYERS

At present the mortgage interest rate on a 30 year, fixed rate mortgage is 13.5 percent.

Here's what a drop in interest rates could mean to a home buyer purchasing an $80,000 home with a 25 percent downpayment.

	Annual mortgage payments	Annual savings from present level
Mortgage rate:
13.5 percent	$8,796 ($733 per month).
12.5 percent	$8,196 ($683 per month).	$600 ($50 per month).
11.5 percent	$7,608 ($634 per month).	$1,188 ($99 per month).
11 percent	$7,308 ($609 per month).	$1,488 ($124 per month).

The National Association of Realtors estimates that a 1 percentage point drop would mean 300,000 more existing home sales; a 2 point drop would mean a 600,000 increase. With present sales for these homes at about 3 million, the increase in sales ranges from 10 to 20 percent.

FARMERS—INTEREST SAVINGS FOR SPECIFIC OPERATIONS

The dollar benefit from interest rate declines is listed below for various farm operations which have an average debt to equity ratio of 21.8 percent.

Product	Size of operation	Interest cost	Dollar benefit of— 1 percentage point drop	Dollar benefit of— 2 percentage point drop
Wheat	1,000 acre	$20,230	$2,023	$4,046
Corn	600 acre	30,744	3,074	6,149
Soybeans	500 acre	14,805	1,481	2,961
Dairy	80 cows	15,264	1,526	3,053
Feeder cattle	1,000 head per year	42,200	4,220	8,440

The financially troubled farmer has a much higher debt to equity ratio. At a ratio of 55 percent, for the same size operation, the benefits are much higher.

	Dollar benefit of—
	1 percentage point drop	2 percentage drop
Wheat	$5,104	$10,208
Corn	7,755	15,514
Soybeans	3,737	7,474
Dairy	3,850	7,700
Feeder cattle	10,647	21,294

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I will make one final prediction and go home to get some rest, because I suppose we will have a pretty busy couple of weeks or 10 days. My final prediction is that after all the complaining about the hardship of this package and about how the draconian cuts, so-called, are too tough for us to follow, we are going to put together a package. I believe it will look very much like what the leader intends to lay down tomorrow. It is a fair package, one which calls upon every segment of the budget for some restraint. It is a package that rejects the notion that there are sacred cows and that you can solve the budget dilemma without touching national defense or Social Security or that an interest group here or there is too powerful to be included in the general need for restraint. In fact, the very strength of it is that it is fair and across the board.

I have probably talked to every interest group and people in communities in my State and elsewhere who are affected by the decisions we reach. I have talked to a lot of Social Security recipients, and they tell me this: "Please don't do anything to our cost-of-living adjustment." I have said to them, "No, I'm not going to, unless I have to, in order to put together a budget that means prosperity for the economic future of this country; and even then, I am not going to do it unless it is everybody, unless absolutely everybody is in the package."

They say in response, "If everybody is in the boat, then we will be in the boat, too."

I have spoken to farmers, some of whom are on the brink of losing their places, being foreclosed on farms which have been in their families for 80 or 100 years. They say, "What can you do to help?"

I say: "I can't vote to continue the present farm program. The best we can do is balance the budget and bring down the interest rates."

They say, "OK, we'll participate even if it hurts us. We're willing to bear our share of the burden if it's fair and everybody is covered."

In fact, there is some interesting polling data which shows that in a recent nationwide survey, a sizable minority of people in this country think that the enactment of a budget such as the one we are going to take up tomorrow would actually adversely affect their personal economic well-being. In other words, people think they will be personally disadvantaged by the enactment of a budget such as this. When you ask them, "What should we do?" They say, "Go ahead and do it anyway, because it's for the good of the country."

I believe it was a New York Times poll. I will dig that out and have it available for Senators tomorrow. While I do not have the numbers before me, that is the conclusion a huge number of people in this country reached because they see it as important for the future of this country.

Last, but not least, is that this package that the majority leader has hammered out with a remarkable display of patience and legislative skill is not chiseled in stone. I do not think it is. I think it can be changed. Maybe it will have to be changed. Maybe, as some predict, we will have a turkey shoot or a demolition derby.

As Senators decide whether they want to vote for this package and whether they want to change it, I hope they will be cautious. It can be changed. It just takes a majority of those in the Chamber to change it. Twenty-six could change it. Fifty-one could change it at any time. The question is, after we change it, can we pass it?

After looking at hundreds and maybe thousands of specific possible amendments to this budget package and talking to virtually every Member of the Senate and to everybody interested in it downtown, at the White House, OMB, and interest groups, I do not know how you can change this package in a way that makes it more likely to be passed.

If you feel, as I do, that passage of some sort of budget package of this kind is absolutely essential and that the alternative is chaos and dislocation for the farmers, ranchers, businessmen, and working men and women and everybody else, I hope my colleagues will be very cautious when it comes to entertaining amendments, even amendments we might otherwise think are very desirable.

Mr. President, I want to close as I began, by congratulating Chairman DOMENICI and the majority leader for getting us to this stage. We have come a long way. The proposal which the leader will lay down tomorrow is a very fine, well-balanced, fairly conceived proposal which has been discussed more widely, I believe, than any budget which has ever been considered in the modern history of this country, certainly in the years I have been in Congress. There has been more real participation by Senators and other interested persons than anything I have seen before. That is one reason why it deserves to pass and why I believe it will pass.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Colorado, Senator ARMSTRONG, a member of the Budget Committee, and also a member of the Republican leadership and the very able chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator DOMENICI, who was speaking prior to Senator ARMSTRONG.

They have actually had more to do with putting this budget package together than probably anyone in this Chamber right now.

Obviously the chairman has spent a great deal of time. Senator ARMSTRONG is the ranking member on the Budget Committee, if I am correct. So they have had a lot of responsibility.

And let me repeat what both Senators have indicated: We would like very much to have a vote some time tomorrow or tomorrow night on the so-called leadership package, one that the President signed off on and the Republican leadership agreed upon. Again it is no effort to isolate Democrats. We welcome Democrats to join us in this exercise. We have made some overtures. Thus far there has been less than enthusiasm. But in any event, it would seem to me that this would sort of set the stage for a discussion and if in fact we can secure 50 votes for that procedural move then it would indicate to the American people that we are serious about a $300 billion package, and as the Senator from Colorado just pointed out some of that may be dropped out and other things may be added.

But if we sort of set the parameters at, say, $300 billion deficit reduction over a 3-year period, I think it would send the appropriate signal all across the country.

That does not mean we are going to shut off anyone. We are not going to preclude amendments. Senators may still offer amendments. Amendments could be voted upon. Senators may still offer a substitute. It can be voted on.

As I understand, there is a Hollings package and a Chiles package and maybe other packages on this side.

But in my view it has the advantage of moving right up front the focus on what we are about to do in this Chamber the next 7 to 10 days.

The other option—in fact, there are many options—the other option would be to call up the Senate Budget Committee resolution and send a substitute to the desk and then just permit everyone to start hacking away at it, striking this, and striking that, and before we ever have a chance to vote on a total figure we have it down to, say, $200 billion instead of $300 billion.

So the advantage of this is it gives Senators a chance to go on record right up front that they want substantial deficit reduction.

It also adds a bit of discipline, because having checked with the Parliamentarian, if in fact we could adopt the so-called leadership package, there are some few more constraints and a bit more discipline because then, for a Member who offers amendments, it has to be mathematically consistent, so you either have to confess you are going to make it up some way by cutting some other program, or you are going to get into revenues.

Again some Senators feel so strongly about their amendment that the deficit is not a big problem, and that is fine. We are not going to preclude that amendment.

And I am hopeful, and I have discussed this with the distinguished minority leader, that we can work out some agreement whereby we can offer that leadership package by unanimous consent after some discussion. Otherwise, it is my understanding that you have to sort of build this tortuous process that could take 5 to 7 hours before we had a vote. There could be a total of five amendments offered to sort of build the tree, and then we would finally vote. That could be some time. Maybe during all those 7 hours no one would say anything, which is not too exciting, but sometimes it beats what happens on the Senate floor.

So we hope to win that effort. Not many people think we can. We do not have the votes yet.

We have been meeting with our colleagues throughout the afternoon. We met with about 40 of our colleagues between 11 a.m. and 12:30 p.m. today, and throughout the afternoon we have met one on one, one on two, whatever, trying to make certain that everyone had an opportunity to express themselves.

So that is precisely where we are.

I am not trying to surprise anyone. I am not trying to cut off anyone's rights.

But in my view, a view I think shared by the Senator from Colorado, the American people have waited long enough for us to do something.

I happened to visit my State over the weekend, and I keep being asked by taxpayers, "Why haven't you done something," not "What are you going to do," "Why haven't you done something," and done something substantial enough that would have the impact on interest rates recited by the Senator from Colorado, Senator ARMSTRONG, and some economists even think that we could have a total of a 3-percent drop in the long term if the package is substantial.

So I certainly want to invite my colleagues on the other side of the aisle. This might be a good—maybe we should have television for this proceeding, because then in every living room in America that happened to be tuned in they could keep a scorecard, "Is my Senator voting to reduce spending or to raise my taxes or to add spending?"

It might be quite a revelation to a lot of people because sometimes, not often, but there are some precedents for some Members of Congress who make one statement in the home and vote another way either in the House of Representatives or the Senate. Now that is certainly an exception, but now and then it happens. But this way the viewer could not only watch his Senator vote but we could remind the viewers throughout the day what the score was and who the players were and how they were voting.

That will not happen because we have not authorized TV in the Senate.

So I just suggest this is very serious business. We had hoped to dispose of at least 4 hours of time this afternoon, but my colleague from Ohio, Senator METZENBAUM, felt constrained to object or would have objected to an effort to get unanimous consent to proceed without amendment this afternoon unless we would agree to take up the so-called Bitburg resolution which would have asked the President to reconsider his decision to visit the Bitburg cemetery and to find a more appropriate way to demonstrate the reconciliation.

It seemed to me that at least we should have had a chance to look at that. Senator METZENBAUM has been kind enough to furnish me a draft. But in any event, we will be on it tomorrow. Hopefully, we will have a vote some time tomorrow to be followed by a number of votes tomorrow and Friday.

We will not be in session on Saturday. Many of my colleagues have been asking that.

It seems to me that there will be absentees on each side, that it would not be a very productive day if we were in session.

Mr. President, having said that, I now would be prepared to propound routine unanimous-consent requests. I understand the distinguished minority leader has cleared the unanimous-consent requests which are routine in nature.

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11:30 a.m. on Thursday, April 25, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 15 minutes each: Senators PROXMIRE, WALLOP, and MURKOWSKI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that, following the special orders just identified, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, following morning business, the Senate will turn to the consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the budget resolution, under a statutory time limitation of 50 hours.

Rollcall votes can be expected throughout Thursday's session, and the Senate is expected to be in late Thursday night and all day Friday.

RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 11:30 a.m., Thursday, April 25, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at 6:28 p.m., recessed until Thursday, April 25, 1985, at 11:30 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 24, 1985:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

John Arthur Ferch, of Ohio, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Minister-Counselor, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Honduras.

IN THE NAVY

The following-named officer, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 5142, to be chief of chaplains, U.S. Navy:

Commodore John R. McNamara, Chaplain Corps, [redacted]/4100, U.S. Navy.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, April 24, 1985

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Archbishop Mesrob Ashjian, prelate, the Armenian Apostolic Church of America, New York, NY, offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Almighty God, giver of all that we possess, we especially thank Thee for Thy most precious gift, the spirit of liberty. We ask that Thy every blessing be showered upon this Nation where that freedom and human justice proceed triumphant. Reveal always Thy infinite and Holy Spirit to the Members of this House that they may be inspired to achieve for all mankind the goals of our Founding Fathers, life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

In particular, we beseech Thee, to be mindful of the Armenian people who this year commemorate the 70th anniversary of the martyrdom of 1½ million Armenians. Mindful of the teachings of Thy Son, our Lord, Jesus Christ, we ask not for retribution or revenge but for repentance and redemption. We pray, Almighty God, that never again on this Earth will the horror of genocide afflict any of Thy children.

Grant to all the nations of mankind, the compassion and love which Thy Son offered to us with His sacrifice, that we may all live freely with joy and happiness amidst all of the glories of Thy creation. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GINGRICH) there were—yeas 12, nays 12.

The SPEAKER. The Chair "aye."

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 236, nays 171, answered "present" 2, not voting 24, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

H.J. Res. 33. Joint resolution designating the week of April 29 through May 5, 1985, as "National Child Safety Week."

ARCHBISHOP MESROB ASHJIAN

(Mr. PASHAYAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, His Eminence has served the Armenian community in the Eastern United States and Canada as Prelate of the Armenian Apostolic Church of America since 1978.

Early in the 1970's, he was a graduate student at the Princeton Theological Seminary in New Jersey, when he traveled extensively in the United States and Canada visiting Armenian communities.

He was born in Beirut on January 3, 1941, to Nercess and Martha Ashjian.

He attended the St. Nishan Armenian School and was later accepted to Cilician Seminary in Antelias, Lebanon. On May 28, 1961, upon completion of his theological and armenological studies, he was ordained celibate monk by Catholicos Zareh I.

On September 1, 1963, he received the degree of Vartabed having met the required credentials.

His Eminence attended the Vossey Ecumenical Institute in Switzerland following which he came to the United States to continue his studies at Princeton Theological Seminary. In 1970, he received the master of theology degree.

Upon completion of his doctoral studies, in July 1973, he was elected to the Diocese of the Armenian Church in Iran and India as primate, and in October 1977 he was consecrated bishop by Catholicos-Coadjutor Karekin II at St. Gregory's Cathedral in Antelias, Lebanon.

In June 1983, during his pontifical visit to the United States and Canada His Holiness Catholicos Karekin II elevated the prelate to the rank of archbishop.

TRIBUTE TO JUDGE SARAH T. HUGHES OF DALLAS

(Mr. FROST asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I am saddened today to report to the House the death of U.S. District Judge Sarah T. Hughes of Dallas. I take this time today to comment on Judge Hughes' passing because of the extraordinary nature of her life.

Mr. Speaker, Judge Sarah Hughes was a leader in the area of women's rights, long before there was a women's rights movement.

Her life is an example to women and men everywhere. She will be best remembered for her role in swearing in President Lyndon B. Johnson that tragic day in Dallas 21 years ago. However, she accomplished much more during her many years of public service.

Elected to the Texas State Legislature in the 1930's, she served as a State district judge in Texas for 25 years before being appointed as a Federal district judge by President Kennedy in 1961 at age 65. She had a brilliant legal mind, and there is little question that she would have been the first woman appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court had she been born later.

Judge Hughes was a member of the three-judge Federal panel that decided the landmark Roe versus Wade abortion case, a decision which ultimately was upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court.

I had the privilege to serve as Judge Hughes' law clerk the year following my graduation from law school. That year was one of the highlights of my life.

Mr. Speaker, the city of Dallas, the State of Texas, and the Nation are poorer today, as a result of the death of Sarah T. Hughes.

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH THE PEROT COMMISSION ON AMERICANS MISSING IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

(Mr. HENDON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HENDON. Mr. Speaker, quite often from this well I have quoted Lt. Gen. Eugene Tighe, former head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, who says U.S. POW's are still being held in Southeast Asia. Today in the Wall Street Journal General Tighe says more. He says that analysts at DIA "show a mindset to debunk the intelligence they receive on our POW's" and that "they have been disclaiming good reports for so long it has become habit forming."

General Tighe suggests that a Presidential commission be appointed to examine the U.S. POW effort.

Well, good luck, General; I requested such a commission over 1 year ago and my request was denied by staff.

So today I am introducing legislation to create an independent Congressional Commission headed by Texas Industrialist H. Ross Perot, to determine once and for all how to get our men home.

As the Wall Street Journal said, today, "Getting these men back would demonstrate a moral commitment few nations possess." What better way to exhibit our commitment than to create this commission and what better man to head it than H. Ross Perot?

INTRODUCTION OF CHILI WITHOUT BEANS RESOLUTION

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Today I serve venison chili to all Members in the House and their guests in the dining room.

Mr. Speaker, today I join with my distinguished colleague from New Mexico, [Mr. LUJAN], in introducing a House joint resolution to designate chili in its true form, without beans, as the national food.

I do this, Mr. Speaker, because after sponsoring the annual Chili Day at the Capitol for 18 years I have come to realize this House's deep admiration and regard for the art of chili preparation and consumption. My colleagues have demonstrated, year after year, their love for the particular brand of chili that is made with venison, deer meat for you city slickers, and the special ingredients of WICK FOWLER'S chili recipe. Of course, there are no beans in this recipe, but, for the bean lover, chili can be served with pinto beans on the side.

I hope that my colleagues will sample the chili I have made available to them in the House Restaurant, the Cloak Rooms, the Members Only Alcove, and the restaurant proper for Members and their guests by request. Staff and press are also invited to partake of this delicious Texas Red in room H-137 of the Capitol Building.

After sampling this chili, I think you will agree with me and the gentleman from New Mexico, that chili is truly the essence of American eating pleasure and should be designated the national food.

Mr. Speaker, we ask that you eat all you want but beware because two-alarm chili has got "La Fuorza."

MASS IMMUNIZATION DAY IN SAN SALVADOR

(Mr. SMITH of New Jersey asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend, I had the privilege of joining President Napolean Duarte in San Salvador in kicking off the third mass immunization day. Our delegation included Dr. Albert Sabin—developer of the oral polio vaccine and officals for UNICEF and DAHO. Two earlier vaccination days were held on February 3 and March 3 and as you know, Mr. Speaker, a series of three shots or doses are necessary for certain vaccines to be effective.

It is estimated that up to 300,000 El Salvadorian children were vaccinated on Sunday against five horrible diseases—whopping cough, tetanus, diphtheria, measles, and polio. The need to protect Central American children—all children for that matter—from these chronic diseases couldn't be more compelling. Last year, 90,000 children in Central America died from preventable diseases and hundreds of thousands more suffered needlessly.

I rise this morning to offer my congratulations to President Duarte for his leadership, compassion, and vision in the bold health initiative.

Clearly President Duarte has demonstrated to the world that even a country torn by terrorist activity can, if its leaders care enough, protect its most vulnerable citizens—children—from the ravages of serious disease. Clearly the vaccination project is a success story, an inspiration, an example to be duplicated in the rest of the developing world.

DON'T GO, MR. PRESIDENT, DON'T GO

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine a President of the United States honoring even inadvertently the actions or service of the Wafen SS? The SS troopers killed 6 million Jews in World War II, shot defenseless American prisoners by the dozens at the Battle of the Bulge, executed an entire French village including more than 200 children because of the war death of a single SS officer, and killed 1 million Jewish children in the flames of Dachau and Auschwitz, and more.

As Elie Wiesel said Friday to our President's face, "a million children; if I were to recite each name, I would die before I finished. A million children," he said; "flames; I can see flames to the heavens."

Can you imagine a President of the United States honoring even inadvertently the actions or services of the SS? I can't; I just can't. I do not know if anybody at the White House listens or cares; but, assuming that they do; don't go, don't go, don't go.

THOU SHALT NOT STEAL

(Mr. SENSENBRENNER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, in my tenure in the Congress, I have seen a number of rules broken, but it was not until this week that I witnessed the breaking of one of mankind's most cherished rules, "Thou shalt not steal." That rule, Mr. Speaker, is being broken today.

The action by the House Administration Committee, and the action in which we are now engaged, is an act of political necessity by the Democratic majority. This action brings to mind the saying, "necessity is the plea for every infringement of human freedom."

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, we should not be debating the seating of Mr. McCloskey over Mr. McIntyre. Rather, we should discuss the actions on the part of the Democratic leadership that brought us to where we are today.

In order for the "recount" to have the required result for the Democrats, new rules had to be written; rules so the majority could "win" the seat back. This required unique talent and careful planning. Those rules needed to eliminate Indiana State election law as an obstacle. This was accomplished by rewriting the law, in effect, and stealing the election by changing the rules.

Mr. Speaker, this corrupt action will achieve the goal of the majority; Mr. McClosky will be seated but only by the sheer numbers on the majority's side. But a fraud has been committed on the voters of the Eighth Congressional District of Indiana and a fraud on the American people. The election was won by Mr. McIntyre. And if the House of Representatives now sanctions this corrupt action, Mr. Speaker, I can only remind the Members of the words of a great Democratic stateman, Adlai Stevenson, who said, "Those who corrupt the public mind are just as evil as those who steal from the public purse."

Mr. Speaker, we are stealing from the citizens of the Eighth Congressional District, their duly elected voice in Congress. It is a dark day for this body.

HISTORY TELLS US THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN MURDERERS AND THEIR VICTIMS

(Mr. ANDREWS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, many Americans who were not there can never know the unique horror and damnation of the Nazi death camps; we can only try to comprehend that terrible passage of world history.

The most moving experience of that time for me occurred in Jerusalem at the Holocaust Museum. There, I listened to a close friend, whose parents had been in the Warsaw Ghetto and at Dachau, tell me their story, and I saw vivid photographs that I will never forget of Hitler's SS troopers killing young children. It is a painful and emotional memory, but one I want to remember.

It is in part because of my personal experience that, like many other Americans, I am deeply troubled and dismayed by the decision of President Reagan to visit the German military cemetery at Bitburg.

In spite of the fact that the President and his staff are now aware that the cemetery contains the graves of SS troops, he rigidly persists in his mistaken decision to honor them.

His statement that the German soldiers "were victims just as surely as the victims in the concentration camps" is wrong. Surely history tells us the difference between murderers and their victims. We have come to learn that American GI's were murdered by units of the very SS troops buried at Bitburg and yet the President insists on honoring them in the name of reconciliation.

In this, the 40th year of peace in Europe, it is important to honor and praise the friendship that has developed between ourselves and our former adversaries. In fact, that reconciliation process began shortly after the end of World War II with the advent of the Marshall plan and the dramatic Berlin airlift. Those two events signified the beginning of our present-day alignment with the Republic of Germany. We have made tremendous strides with a democratic West Germany in 40 years and that is worth celebrating. However, to celebrate that history and be so insensitive to another history that should forever be remembered is unbefitting the leader of the free world.

It is for these reasons that I have joined in cosponsoring the Wyden resolution which implores President Reagan not to visit Bitburg. In the words of Elie Wiesel: "That place, Mr. President, is not your place. Your place is with the victims of the SS."

RIVERBOAT GAMBLERS

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like you and your Democratic colleagues to reflect on the high-roller's gamble you are playing with the McIntyre seat—the Indiana congressional seat you are trying to steal.

The odds you are playing, Mr. Speaker, are 70 to 1. You Democrats now have a 70-seat majority in the House. And you seem willing to put it all on the line—let it all ride—on the chance of scooping up one more.

Maybe you'll muscle your way to a 71-seat majority. Maybe the courts won't care. Maybe the American people won't notice. But maybe they will. Maybe this one event will awaken them to the abuses of majority power you Democrats have engaged in over the past three decades. Maybe they will learn about gerrymandering, seat stealing, committee packing, and all the rest.

You Democarats have been riding high in the House for a long, long time, Mr. Speaker. But perhaps the American people will decide that the proper title for your successor should be minority leader.

JOINT RESOLUTION COMMEMORATING THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

(Mr. COELHO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, today is the Armenian Martyrs' Day in honor of the 1.5 million Armenians who were killed by the Turks between 1915 and 1923.

And in recognition of this special day, I am proud once again to sponsor House Joint Resolution 192, along with 220 House cosponsors, to commemorate the Armenian genocide.

Our resolution would establish today as a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man, and I urge its speedy consideration and passage.

Unfortunately, the Reagan administration and the Turkish Government strongly oppose our bipartisan resolution. The White House says it is concerned about hurting relations with the Turkish Government.

But Mr. Speaker, I believe the U.S. Government and our people must always stand for the greater good, and we cannot continue to ignore the fact that this genocide took place—and the fact that it was wrong

As the President struggles in the next few days with the realities surrounding another equally deplorable genocide, I hope that he will reconsider his opposition to our resolution, as well as his visit to the Nazi cemetery.

THE FARMING GAME

(Mr. MORRISON of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MORRISON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, from this well in this 99th Congress, we have heard more about farming than perhaps any session of the Congress for many years.

Now all Members of the Congress can participate in the farming process right in their own offices. You will be able to play "The Farming Game."

Tomorrow, American Agri-Women, farm women from all across the Nation, will be distributing to all congressional offices a game, The Farming Game. It is exciting, it is challenging, it is entertaining, it is frustrating, but more than that, it is educational. You will learn about farming by playing this game.

This game is currently used in over 1,500 schools across the United States to illustrate the family farm economy: Vocational agriculture, economics and social studies classes, including some of America's most prestigious universities.

So I urge all congressional offices to welcome these farm leaders when they appear at your doors to try this game, to learn something about what we have been talking about for many years, to learn the plight of and develop an appreciation for America's family farmers in this new fun way.

BET ON THE OSTRICH

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, during the past 2 weeks, a Member of this body, whose ornithological knowledge is as sadly deficient as his courtesy, heaped undeserved insult on the ostrich, not to mention on his colleagues.

He described as "ostriches" his Republican and Democratic colleagues who opposed President Reagan's Nicaragua policies.

One would hope that the merits of U.S. policies in Central America could be discussed without insulting birds or colleagues.

Over the millenia, the ostrich developed defensive and offensive capabilities that enabled it to survive in lands where lions and other carnivorous predators abounded. It runs at high speeds—up to 40 miles an hour—and if riled or cornered, can deliver a vicious, lethal kick.

With large eyes and keen vision, the ostrich is ever alert. Contrary to myth, the ostrich does not stick its head in the sand. Nor does it spend much time booming at C-SPAN cameras in an empty Chamber. When necessary, it lies on the ground as a means of camouflage.

Finally, it has simple needs, grazing mainly on plants and capable of going without water for long periods of time.

So there you have it. The ostrich is a rugged, wiley, and frugal bird. Indeed, in a scrap between the Member of Congress and an ostrich, I would bet on the ostrich.

SOVIETS DO NOT TAKE THEIR WORD SERIOUSLY

(Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, what is the value of someone's word?

Apparently it is not much when it is the word of the Soviet Union. Last week, the Soviets gave us their word that they would not use force against military liaisons in Germany after the brutal murder of my constituent, Maj. Arthur Nicholson. The Soviets gave us their word that they would consider our very reasonable request to compensate his family.

Yesterday, we read in the papers just how seriously the Soviets have taken these spoken agreements. The Soviets arrogantly denied they ever agreed not to use force, and they have turned thumbs down on our request for compensation, or even recognition of any wrongdoing.

Mr. Speaker, I realize more and more that Congress did the right thing on Monday by voting to condemn the Soviet Union for the Major Nicholson murder, and as disgusted as I am at this sad affair, it is more important than ever that we continue with peace and arms reduction in Geneva, but we have relearned a very, very important lesson this week.

That is, any arms reduction agreement that we have with the Soviet Union better have every T crossed and every I dotted, or else we are going to see another song-and-dance routine after the fact.

MAKE NO RECONCILIATION WITH THE NAZI PAST, MR. PRESIDENT

(Mr. MAVROULES asked and was given permisson to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, today over 250,000 American service men and women in West Germany are the living symbol of the "reconciliation" between the American and German people.

These Americans, many living under difficult circumstances, and thousands of miles from home, have for more than three decades, helped preserve the security of the German people and all of Western Europe.

Yet, with one ill-scheduled "photo opportunity" at Bitburg, the administration has succeeded in reaching back into a world of terror, fear, and humiliation.

Reconcile with the German people? Yes, Mr. President, we have done that.

Reconcile with the horror of the Nazi past?

Mr. President, never!

SUPPORT FUNDING FOR NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY

(Mr. COURTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, of the warnings Alexander Solzhenitsyn has given us, one stands foremost in my mind: "You have the impression that democracies can last. But you know nothing about it. Democracies are lost islands in the immense river of history. The water is always rising."

Mr. Speaker, democratic government is one of those things which everyone praises and admires, but few know how to plan and implement. Americans ought to aid that process wherever we reasonably can. Our National Endowment for Democracy, privately directed but operating on Federal funds, is in an excellent position to render such assistance overtly and cleanly. It represents American public diplomacy of the best kind.

Today, we may consider the budget for the U.S. Information Agency, and, within it, the small authorization for the NED. I hope that my colleagues will do for it everything that they can.

MALPRACTICE INSURANCE PREMIUMS

(Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Albany, NY, some 5,000 physicians out of 40,000 physicians in that State gathered at the State capitol to focus attention on the malpractice insurance premium problem that we are experiencing in our country today.

To me, that is really impressionable that this many physicians would have taken time away from their practice to focus attention on such a severe problem that we now have.

Mr. Speaker, the practice of medicine is not an exact science. Any procedure that is undertaken has some element of risk; any treatment that is prescribed has some element of risk. Physicians are beginning to view each case, each illness that they have as a potential malpractice suit.

It is thought by many now that it may contribute as much as $15 to $40 billion to the increase in cost of medical care in our country, and in my State alone, it is estimated that it may add as much as $3 billion.

The quality of care is now being affected to some extent because there are many physicians who are practicing obstetrics that are beginning to drop out of that practice simply for the reason of the threat of malpractice.

How long are we going to continue to ignore this growing threat that is going to undermine the quality of medical care in our country?

ARMENIANS DAY

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, except for the occasions when I have engaged in colloquys, I have always started my remarks before this House for the last 4 months, with the words, "Let justice be done; seat Rick McIntyre." I will change that today for the first time, to an intense plea for the majority to call for another election in the State of Indiana's Eighth District. I never thought I would do this. There has already been an honest election. But so as not to destroy the feeling of good will among my colleagues for the next year and a half, I beg for a special election.

Change of subject: Mr. Speaker, the reason that Adolf Hitler thought he was able to slaughter millions and escape earthly condemnation is easily discovered in his own words. Hitler bragged, "My brownshirts, my Gestapo, my SS will kill millions of Jews," because look what happened to the Armenians. Nobody cared, nobody even remembers." He spoke. He acted. And then hell ruled part of the Earth for 12 bloody years.

We must in America recognize formally, with a day of remembrance, the agony of the Armenian people. They suffered the first massive genocide of this century.

To establish 1 day a year to honor the over 1½ million innocent Armenians who were slaughtered by the Ottoman Empire. This is not an insult to the nation of Turkey. The Ottoman Empire lasted for precisely 400 years, from 1517 to 1917. The worst of the massacres of Armenians in Turkey happened during the last 2 years of that decaying, rotting old empire. The modern Turkey, restructured by the great hero of that country, Ataturk, should have admitted and rejected the ghastly genocide of its Armenian citizens. It does not insult our Turkish friends to recognize this century's first horrible examples of man's inhumanity to man by the incomprehensible crime of genocide. Actually, President Ataturk, the George Washington of Turkey, acknowledged the 1915 genocide in August 1926 but it was tragically denied by subsequent governments. Truth is truth. Honor demands that our Nation do what is right.

THE LATE HONORABLE SAM B. ERVIN, JR.

(Mr. VALENTINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, today we mourn the death of a great North Carolinian and statesman, Senator Sam B. Ervin, Jr.

Sam Ervin was a World War I hero, Harvard Law School graduate, judge, and U.S. Senator. He served the 10th District of North Carolina in the U.S. House of Representatives, 1946-47, before he was appointed to the North Carolina Supreme Court. Yet he chose, Mr. Speaker, to refer to himself as "just a country lawyer from North Carolina." He considered the Constitution a sacred scripture and he spent his whole life defending it.

His passion for truth, for civil liberties, the many freedoms that we at times take for granted yet he so dearly believed in, transcended all races, religions, creeds or economic status as he fought for the protection of all human beings under the law.

He was a national symbol of dignity and integrity in politics. He embodied a wisdom and wealth of knowledge, from his down home country stories to his quotations from Shakespeare, that was unsurpassed in American politics. He was truly a national hero who bridged both the 19th and 20th centuries as he carried our Nation through the dark hours of the Watergate affair. Through his unyielding search for truth, he helped to diffuse one of the most devastating events in American politics.

As Senator Ervin said at the Watergate hearings some 12 years ago, in words which bear repeating today:

> And I think that those who participated in this effort to nullify the laws of man and the laws of God overlooked one of the laws of God, which is set forth in the 7th verse of the 6th chapter of Galatians:
> Be not deceived. God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.

Our Nation has been enriched and made stronger by all that Senator Sam was and believed in. He will be sorely missed.

TRADE STATISTICS HAVE NEGATIVE CONSUMER IMPACT

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, in October of last year, Crompton Inc., the oldest textile company in the United States—178 years—filed for a chapter 11 bankruptcy. It was the sole producer of velveteen in America and one of the few remaining producers of corduroy.

In less than 1 year, 1982-83, 2,000 Crompton workers were laid off in three States. Bankruptcy in 1984 laid off another 2,450 in two more States.

In that same month, October 1984, the price of velveteen coming from Japan jumped $1 per yard.

Velveteen fabric may not be vital to defense, but the profits of making velveteen and selling it, the taxes paid by this company and its workers, and the ultimate higher price which is being paid by consumers for products will prove to be very vital in our future.

It is happening in steel, in machine tools, and ball bearings, in shoes, and in velveteen. It has already come to pass in television sets, radios, watches, and fasteners.

When other countries make the product, they set the price. What happens to the American consumer then?

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS OF SUGAR IN HAWAII

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, the Midwest is concerned about Japanese auto imports and its declining industrial base. In the Southwest, the concern is over the recession in the copper industry and price dumping of cement by Mexico. The Northwest is concerned about the health of their timber industry and the Southeast wants protection for textiles.

In Hawaii, we fear the decline of our sugar industry. Sugar is the backbone of Hawaii's agricultural economy. Hawaii produces 1 million tons of sugar annually; nearly 1 of every 5 pounds of sugar produced in the United States comes from Hawaii's sugarcane fields. Three out of every four acres of Hawaii's cropland is in sugarcane. The cultivation, harvesting, processing, and refining of Hawaii's sugarcane is responsible for 26,000 jobs in Hawaii and on the west coast.

Mr. Speaker, the period since the mid-1970's has been one of great turmoil for the domestic sugar industry. Over the past 10 years, 24 cane and beet sugar refineries and processing plants have gone out of business. This is a distressing statistic. Sugar producers in Hawaii are determined to avoid the drastic unemployment and economic turmoil that would result from being added to this growing list of casualties among the domestic sugar industry.

The real threat to our domestic sugar industry is the excessive sugar price supports of the European Common Market. Common Market countries have high production costs and no economic advantage over the major sugar-producing regions of the world. At great expense, they have established a price support policy for sugar which is excessive by any form of measurement. Under this program, sugar which costs 25 to 30 cents per pound to produce is currently being dumped on the world market at less than a nickel a pound. This lucrative price support program has transformed the Common Market from an importer of sugar less than 10 years ago to an exporter of close to 6 million tons of sugar last year.

Mr. Speaker, no domestic industry can operate in such a climate and expect to survive. That is why domestic sugar farmers need a fair and equitable program in the 1985 farm bill.

Further evidence of the importance of sugar to the economy of Hawaii is contained in the latest issue of Economic Indicators prepared by First Hawaiian Bank, which I am including at this point in the RECORD.

[From Economic Indicators, March-April 1985]

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS OF SUGAR IN HAWAII

As we recognize the 150th sesquicentennial anniversary of the sugar industry in Hawaii, the industry is facing the greatest threat to its existence in its history. If the proposed modifications to the U.S. Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 (the Farm Act) are enacted by the U.S. Congress, the Hawaiian sugar industry could be devastated.

According to the Department of Planning and Economic Development, total sugar-related employment comes to around 19,200 jobs or 4 percent of all jobs in the state. However, on the Neighbor Islands, sugar-related employment accounts for 29 percent of jobs on Kauai, 17 percent on Hawaii, and 13 percent on Maui, compared to 1 percent on Oahu. Likewise, income from sugar in 1982 came to 21 percent of total income on Kauai, 13 percent on Hawaii, 12 percent on Maui, compared to 1 percent on Oahu. Sugar occupies 188,395 acres or 71 percent of all the agricultural land in Hawaii, accounting for 97 percent of all cultivated lands on Kauai, 75 percent on Hawaii, 65 percent on Oahu, and 57 percent on Maui. Sugar also contributes around 10 percent of total state tax revenues. Loss of the industry to Hawaii would be an economic disaster of unprecedented magnitude.

The Hawaii sugar industry is now protected by Title IX of the Farm Act. The provisions include a sugar loan fund where a producer unable to sell his crop is eligible for a loan using his crop as collateral. The loan rate is based on an estimated average cost of production, and was set at 17.75 cents per pound in 1984. Congress also specified that the government should avoid accumulating stocks of sugar by establishing a Market Stabilization Price (MSP). The MSP estimates the actual price that producers must receive to sell their crop, and is composed of the loan rate plus transportation costs, interest, and a producers incentive margin. The MSP is currently at 21.57 cents a pound, 3.82 cents a pound over the loan rate of 17.75 cents a pound. To assure that the actual market price of sugar reflects the MSP, and producers sell their crops, a system of country-by-country import quotas controls the supply and, ultimately, the price of sugar in the U.S. That is possible because about a third of the sugar consumed in the United States is imported.

The need for such a system reflects the realities of the world sugar market. At present, over 40 countries around the world produce around 100 million tons of sugar. Surplus sugar not domestically consumed or traded, roughly 20 million tons a year, is dumped on the so-called "world market." Prices in this market bear no relation to production costs, and fluctuate according to available supply. In 1980, the price was 40 cents a pound. In 1984 it fell to less than 4 cents a pound. Thus, the current price-support system protects our sugar industry from the volatile world surplus market, while maintaining stable prices to insure a steady supply of domestically produced sugar.

The proposed changes in the Farm Bill would cut the loan rate for sugar to 12 cents a pound. Sugar import quotas would be terminated, thereby allowing the domestic market price to fall to world levels. In expectation of industry losses as a result of falling prices, a contingency program of direct payments would subsidize producers based on the difference between the market price and a predetermined target price set to decline to 12 cents in 1990. The payments, however, would be meaningless to Hawaii's large corporate growers because of a limitation of $10,000 per operator set for 1988.

Proponents of the changes argue that easing import restrictions would reduce the domestic price of sugar, and cut back federal dollars needed to support the industry. However, under the proposed changes neither market prices, target prices, nor loan rates will bear any relation to the costs of production. Producers may not be able to either sell or borrow, and will ultimately be forced to accept government payments. Opening the American market, which is roughly 9 million tons annually, to foreign sugar would eliminate any surplus and erase any price advantage the world price seemed to offer. Erratic price fluctuations would eventually drive American producers out of business, creating a total dependency on an unreliable supply of imported foreign sugar. The result would be lost jobs, increasing welfare costs, and an increase in the balance-of-trade deficit by an estimated $2 billion a year.

The Farm Act has cost nothing because whatever support the program extends is in loans. Domestic producers borrowed $650 million on 1,312,500 tons of sugar in the 1983/84 sugar season. But, all loans were repaid at market interest rates, and the government did not accumulate any forfeited sugar.

True, federal deficits demand a serious examination of government expenditures. But, eliminating programs that have been costless for economic benefits which are illusory, while at the same time destroying a major portion of Hawaii's economy, is no solution to the problem.

Our responsibilities as a community are clear in supporting the work of our leadership to defeat the changes to the Farm Bill. Hawaii needs the existing support system. Recent developments in Congress appear encouraging. But, let it not be said in retrospect that 1985, the 150th anniversary of sugar's birth in Hawaii, was the year of sugar's demise as an industry.

SUGAR AND HAWAII

The first sugar plantation was started in 1835 at Koloa, Kauai, by New England merchants. After years of difficulties, the operation folded in 1845 and was sold. Fortunately for Hawaii, the problems of this early venture did not deter later sugar growers. In fact, the stumbling steps of the pioneering Ladd and Company mill in Koloa marked the beginning of an industry whose growth and dominance in Hawaii has profoundly shaped the evolution of the state, and molded the profile of its people.

It was in Hawaii's political and social history that the sugar industry's influence was most profound. After being elected King of Hawaii in 1873, David Kalakaua, aware of the economic importance of sugar and supported by foreign interests, began to forge stronger ties between Hawaii and the United States by securing a treaty of reciprocity between the two nations that would allow Hawaii's sugar to enter the U.S. duty free. This put Hawaii in a better position to compete against low-cost sugar from the Philippines and China. In return, the treaty provided the U.S. with a new source of sugar, for which demand was rising due to the California gold rush and the loss of southern sugar supplies during the Civil War. America was also granted exclusive use of what is now Pearl Harbor, thus establishing Hawaii as a strategic defense outpost.

The Reciprocity Treaty helped to firm relations between Hawaii and the U.S., which had feared that the growing influence and interest of Great Britain in the islands might lead to the colonization of Hawaii. The treaty was thus a significant stepping stone in the growing diplomatic relationship between Hawaii and America, which would lead to annexation, and ultimately statehood.

With passage of the Reciprocity Treaty, a huge jump was triggered in sugar production. Exercising the right of foreigners to buy land established by the Hawaii legislature in 1850, plantations expanded by 20,000 acres in just five years, reaching 55,000 acres in 1880. New mills were constructed and equipment modernized according to the latest available technology. More significantly, increased labor requirements spurred the importation of foreign workers.

The waves of immigrants brought in by the plantations are the most significant example of sugar's great influence on Hawaii. The growing and harvesting of sugarcane was hard work, requiring many hands and strong backs willing to meet the demands of the seasons and the vast acreage of the plantations. Moreover, after 1876, sugar production boomed, from 20,000 tons in 1879 to 50,000 tons in 1882 and 100,000 tons in 1890. To meet these needs, the plantations recruited labor from Asia and Europe, and thereby forever changed the cultural complexion of the islands.

Between 1876 and 1885, Hawaii recruited contract laborers from China (25,555), Portugal (10,216), the South Seas islands (2,221), and Northern Europe, mainly Germany (1,176).

However, even this massive importation effort did not satisfy sugar's need for workers. After their contracts expired, most of the Chinese left the plantations to settle in towns, and the cost of transportation made it prohibitive to bring more Portuguese to Hawaii. Finally, after years of negotiations with their government, the first Japanese contract laborers arrived in Honolulu on February 9, 1885, the first of 218,418 who would eventually enter the sugar industry's workforce.

Korean immigrants also came in large groups between 1903 and 1906, but the flow was halted by the federal Immigration Act of 1907. This Act was sponsored by the State of California, which saw the massive migration of Asian workers as a social threat. To make up for the loss of the Asian labor pool, sugar plantations turned to Portugal, Spain, the Philippines, and Puerto Rico for their continuing labor needs. In all, over 350,000 immigrants came to Hawaii.

LEGISLATION TO CORRECT CONTRADICTION IN U.S. POLICY REGARDING IMPORTATION OF PRODUCTS FROM NICARAGUA

(Mr. MARLENEE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, why is the United States subsidizing the Marxist Government of Nicaragua to the tune of $150 million in 1984 and continuing that support in 1985?

The United States imports many products from Nicaragua which provides the cash to buy Soviet and Cuban weapons to continue their war against the U.S.-backed freedom fighters. Americans have unknowingly helped to provide the means to wipe out the Meskito Indians, suppress religion, and turn thousands of Nicaraguans into refugees.

Last year alone, the United States imported $21 million in bananas, $7 million in fresh beef, $2 million in cane sugar and many other products from Nicaragua.

I have introduced H.R. 2158 to prohibit the importation of bananas, beef, and sugar products into the United States from Nicaragua. This sanction would continue until the President finds that the policies of Nicaragua regarding a free democratic form of government are consistent with its own revolution and the promises made to the Organization of American States.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in correcting this contradiction in U.S. policy by cosponsoring H.R. 2158.

NATIONAL MARK TWAIN DAY

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, November 30 of this year will mark the 150th anniversary of the birth of Mark Twain, one of American literature's greatest figures. In order to honor this truly great American, I am today introducing a House Joint Resolution to proclaim November 30, 1985, National Mark Twain Day.

We in Missouri are especially proud that Mark Twain is our native son. His experiences in Missouri became the basis for two of his most famous novels, "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer" and "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn." Mark Twain's works, however, are truly national in scope.

Mark Twain lived in Nevada, California, New York, and Connecticut, as well as Missouri; and traveled greatly during his lifetime. His combined experiences greatly enhanced his works and enabled him to capture the American spirit in a way which no other author has been able to duplicate. It is fitting that we honor such a truly great American personality as Mark Twain with a national day.

STE. GENEVIEVE DAY

(Mr. EMERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, today is a very proud day for one of the proudest communities of the great State of Missouri: Ste. Genevieve, the "Mother City of the West."

As my colleagues will remember from their history books, Ste. Genevieve was the first permanent settlement to be established in the upper Louisiana territory—and as such, represents the first real step in what would later become the great westward expansion of this Nation.

And this year, Mr. Speaker, this landmark community, located on the bank of the Mississippi River, is celebrating its 250th year of existence. Given the tremendous historical significance of the community, and of this milestone, the Governor of Missouri has proclaimed that today, April 24, be observed as "Ste. Genevieve Day" by all Missourians, and I am here to join in this observance and ask that this House recognize not only this community's place in history, but also the dedication of its residents in preserving that history.

Later today, I will be holding a special tribute to Ste. Genevieve, and I would urge my colleagues to join me in that tribute and appropriately commend what is undoubtedly one of the Nation's greatest historical treasures.

SENATE BUDGET COMPROMISE—COMPROMISES STUDENT AID

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, the budget compromise that is currently before the Senate promises to further erode educational opportunity for students who depend on these programs for their college training.

The two major proposals—the $8,000 mega-cap on all Federal student aid that an individual would be allowed to receive—and the means test to be imposed on students with family incomes between $30,000 and $60,000—would reduce aid to thousands of needy students and their families—especially those at private colleges and universities.

Consider the impact of this proposal of students in my own State of New York:

The $8,000 mega-cap would mean a loss of $28 million in GSL loans—which translates into the reduction or loss of loans to 18,260 students;

The means test required of students with family incomes between $30,000 and $60,000 would mean a loss of $105 million—which translates into 59,000 students having their loans reduced or eliminated.

In 1978, Congress established a national policy of providing some form of aid to all students regardless of income. We have seen substantial retreat from this position since 1981.

To further erode the purchasing power of student aid dollars—by taking away dollars—should not be accepted by either House of Congress. I urge my colleagues to join me in opposing any measure that seeks to cut these programs further. The Senate's compromise on student aid, with the blessing of the administration, compromises the promise of educational opportunity.

THE BARNES-HAMILTON RESOLUTION IS MUST READING

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, my Democratic colleague from Colorado earlier defended ostrich Democrats and redefined the ostrich. The Barnes-Hamilton resolution represents bipartisan ostriches with amnesia. It provides for surrender to communism in Central America, a unilateral disarmament of freedom fighters, and in fact its rejection of the U.S. Government as a legitimate vehicle for aid entitles anyone who votes for Barnes-Hamilton to wear a button that instead of saying "I Love New York," says, "I Despise America."

I challenge every Member to read this nine-page resolution before voting for it. It is an incredible document of totally confused logic, and remarkably anti-America as a legitimate vehicle for aid kind of thinking.

THE BITBURG CRISIS

(Mr. MRAZEK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I began to circulate a letter among my colleagues to Chancellor Helmut Kohl which I hope might contribute to a resolution of the Bitburg crisis.

It is clear that the decision to visit Bitburg cemetery has become an embarrassment for President Reagan, awakening deep and bitter emotions among thousands of Holocaust survivors and eliciting a wave of criticism from our Nation's veterans and Jewish groups. I do not believe that President Reagan or Chancellor Kohl were aware of the fact that 47 SS soldiers were buried at Bitburg when the decision was made to visit the site, nor do I believe that the President would have made such a decision if he had known this fact. At the moment, the only remaining reason for his visit to Bitburg is his concern for offending Chancellor Kohl and the German people.

The letter I am circulating urges Chancellor Kohl to withdraw his Government's invitation to the President to visit Bitburg. Instead, it asks him to extend an invitation to President Reagan to visit some other appropriate site to express his friendship and respect for the German people. Such a move would satisfy our shared goal of fostering peace and understanding between our two nations and would resolve a crisis which threatens of create lasting divisions within our Nation. It is my hope that with enough congressional support this approach to Chancellor Kohl will help contribute to a solution to this crisis and I invite my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in lending their support to this initiative.

WE MUST FOLLOW OUR INTELLIGENCE AND CONSCIENCE

(Mr. LEVIN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the report of the House Administration Committee on the Eighth District of Indiana election has been issued. I do not believe the minority report has been issued yet, so I have been reading the remarks of the minority on special orders. I must say those remarks are riddled with inconsistencies.

You know, earlier, the position of the minority was count as few ballots as possible; now, it is count as many. Before it was no special election; now it is a special election at any cost. Before it was apply Indiana law; now it is disregard it. While some in the minority are referring to the importance of comity in this House, others in the minority have been casting aspersions on the character of their Democratic colleagues.

Each of us needs to follow our own intelligence and our conscience on this matter. I have faith that my Democratic colleagues will do just that.

CHILI: AMERICA'S FOOD

(Mr. LUJAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUJAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am privileged to introduce legislation which, although incendiary and almost sure to provoke heated debate among my distinguished colleagues, would designate chili as America's official food.

In the past there have been those who would place the turnip at this pinnacle instead of chili. We find no fault with their desire to elevate this lowly tuber. We only question their good judgment. There are those who would name apple pie to this lofty position. We think apple pie makes a wonderful dessert—after a bowl of chili. There are many wonderful foods in America and we love and respect them all. However, we still contend chili enjoys a universal popularity throughout the width and breadth of this great land that is unequaled by other American foods.

I would urge each of my colleagues to study carefully the resolution that I am introducing today. After you have done so, I am sure you will agree to join me in this great movement.

LEGISLATION TO SAVE AMTRAK

(Mr. RICHARDSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to save Amtrak by freezing its funding with no inflation increase, plus a study to determine it further, whether it be privatization or whether it be a public sale.

I welcome the opportunity to say that my support for a viable rail passenger service is unequivocal—I believe such service to be vital to our economy, to our security, to our national health and well-being. While the importance of our rail passenger system is sometimes eclipsed by the orbits of the space shuttle, few would deny the fact that almost 20 million persons used Amtrak rail service in 1984 alone; that Amtrak's long-haul passengers are largely drawn from the elderly and the poor; that in the instance of a national emergency, we will all be grateful our rail passenger service was supported by the American people and the Congress of the United States.

The Reagan administration recently recommended zero funding for rail passenger service in this country. While this President seeks to eliminate a vital service to our citizens, the governments of every other major industrial country in the world affirm their support for rail passenger service through reasonable rail subsidies; they provide us with ample evidence that success results from government cooperation and commitment.

This leads us to the question of what the basic role of the Federal Government should be in providing rail passenger service to this country—I will answer this question by saying the role is real. The role is important and the role is substantial. I do not advocate unlimited and indiscriminate funding of rail passenger service—in fact, I advocate just the opposite—I advocate judicious use of the Federal dollar, evidence of a willingness to save taxpayer's money, the need to cut back, support for alternatives to subsidization. This is why I will introduce a bill today which will do just that—it will freeze Amtrak funding at fiscal year 1985 levels for the next 2 years and will study ways to further reduce Federal subsidies. Nonetheless, I believe rail passenger service to be important to the future of the country and Government support too important to the future of rail passenger service.

Mr. Speaker, I do not deny that I have an interest in preserving the Amtrak system—many New Mexicans are employed by this service, it means $10 million additional to my economically depressed district each year, and Amtrak's trains stop in five towns I have been elected to serve. And while I have a personal interest and commitment to seeing that these benefits continue, I would point out that I am not alone—Amtrak serves over 500 communities nationwide—more than all the major airlines combined; Amtrak serves 161 communities that have no air service; Amtrak serves 52 communities that have no bus service; Amtrak serves 29 communities which have neither air nor bus service; and Amtrak employs 21,000 people across the country.

The administration tells us it is committed to economic growth and commerce—how much commerce will occur in those 29 cities which will have no transportation services whatsoever when Amtrak is gone? How much economic growth will result when 21,000 people lose their jobs?

The administration tells us it is committed to national security—how secure will we be if we eliminate 76,000 rail seats that could be used by military personnel in the event of a national emergency?

This administration tells us it is committed to private enterprise and competition—well, we all are, but have there been any takers for rail passenger service?

This administration professes support for a strong, diversified economy—how strong, how diversified will we be with no rail system, no mass transit systems, no airline subsidies, no bus transportation, no Government commitment to national transportation needs?

Mr. Speaker, the gauntlet has been thrown to the 99th Congress—we can take this opportunity to express our commitment to a strong, lean, efficient rail passenger service or we can have none at all. The choices are very clear and I urge everyone here today to make that choice which is best for this country—a rejection of the administration's misguided notion that we can do without rail passenger service and an affirmation of our support for the Amtrak system.

THE BITBURG DILEMMA

(Mr. SCHEUER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, we have all heard my colleague from New York, BOB MRAZEK, express the views of so many of us about this pitiful Bitburg problem.

At this point everything has been said on the subject that needs to be said and Elie Wiesel, and our colleague STEVE SOLARZ, said it all with grace, restraint, eloquence, and no little bit of class. At this point, I think any further President bashing or administration trashing would serve no useful purpose. The question is how do we get out of this painful, awkward, and unpleasant dilemma.

I join with my colleague, BOB MRAZEK, in urging Chancellor Kohl to exercise some compassion, some sense of collegiality and sensitivity and invite President Reagan to recognize the profound feelings of sadness and regret the American people could harbor toward all war dead, toward all soldiers who fell in battle.

Perhaps Chancellor Kohl could invite our President to visit the grave of Chancellor Konrad Adenauer at Rondorf, or Pastor Martin Niemöller at Wiesbaden, these two soaring spirits who represent the greatness and mobility of Germany and everything that the new Germany stands for. In this way, perhaps, we can get beyond the mistakes and the misunderstandings of the recent past and on to a fine, full and richer relationship with the German people.

REAGAN POLICIES REGARDING GENOCIDES

(Mr. LEHMAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, it comes as no surprise to me that President Reagan chose to honor German soldiers killed during World War II, and not the victims of the Nazi sponsored genocide of that war, until a public outcry forced Mr. Reagan to reverse himself.

Sadly, this is a familiar pattern. Two weeks ago, President Reagan announced his opposition to a congressional resolution to commemorate what is commonly known as the first genocide of the 20th century, the Armenian Genocide. At that time, Mr. Reagan said that his support for a day of remembrance honoring the 1½ million Armenians murdered or driven from their homes by the Ottoman Empire in 1915 would: "harm relations with an important ally."

Oddly, this is the same reasoning Mr. Reagan used in deciding not to visit the death camps of the Jewish Holocaust on his visit to Germany next month. Today, American Jews and American war veterans feel the same bitter anguish that Americans of Armenian descent felt 2 weeks ago. The anguish that come from the realization that their President would ignore their historical heritage for the convenience of today's international politics.

Mr. Speaker, the appropriate remembrance of these horrors of history allows all of us to put them in perspective and to deal with them emotionally. Our alliances with Germany and Turkey are vitally important to America and the preservation of peace. But, we need not prop them up with an evasion of truth.

NEW FORMULA FOR THE CONTRAS

(Mr. MARKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, there are two big stories today in the newspaper.

Coca-Cola has a new formula for its soft drink, and President Reagan has a new formula for aiding the Contras. Both are a little sweeter, but each is really the same old thing.

Congress must not abandon its goal of bringing peace and reconciliations in Central America. Because President Reagan has not abandoned his goal of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government. The issue is startlingly simple: Are we going to fund a war to overthrow the government of another country? Congress has said no to that. So when we vote today, let's be honest. Let's cut the doubletalk. Combat boots and K-rations are not humanitarian aid. Let's heal the wounds of war in Central America. Let's move to restore normalcy to that godforsaken country.

KEEP THE HOUSE IN SESSION 24 HOURS A DAY EVERY DAY

(Mr. CONYERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to congratulate those of my colleagues whose sincerity and conviction lead them to stay up for 24 hours debating an issue of importance to them. The only problem is that the initiative in the congressional seating race in Indiana seemed to have conked out around midnight last night, and I want to express my deep regret at this show of insincerity about the conviction and passion for which they stayed up only 24 hours the night before.

Lest this be misinterpreted as a sign of weakness or giving up on the cause, I would encourage my colleagues to let us rally around this issue, and keep the House in session for 24 hours every day from now on until justice is reached in this matter. Move forward. If you need some Democratic colleagues, I will do my best to try to supply them, but do not stay up until midnight and then move away from this issue for the rest of the night. If you are going to do it, let us do it right, and protest this cause for 24 hours.

WIC PROGRAM IN JEOPARDY

(Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am sad to report to the House of Representatives that once again the Reagan administration, under the leadership of David Stockman, has engaged in a direct attack on newborn infants and their mothers.

We find that once again, in spite of overwhelming bipartisan support and in spite of direct directions from the Agriculture Appropriations Committee that they were to spend money for the Women, Infants and Children's Program, the leading program that we have to diminish the incidence of mental retardation, of birth defects, of handicapped children, and even more importantly, of reducing infant mortality in this country, we now discover that once again this administration is failing to send the money so that these women who have been certified at high nutritional risk, at great risk of giving birth to a less than perfect child, are once again being thrown off of the rolls. Their pregnancy will not stop because this administration decided not to put forth the money. Their pregnancy does not know fiscal years, it does not know continuing resolutions.

So what we now have is this administration taking direct actions to increase the number of children in this country who will be born with birth defects, who will be born at low birth weight, children who will not have the same opportunity at success in the American society as others. This is a direct onslaught. They make it with absolute foreknowledge of the detrimental impact that they will provide to these women and to these children.

I would hope again that the Congress would rally, as it has in the past, both Republicans and Democrats, to tell Mr. Stockman, who is also waiting for his first child. He is hoping for a healthy pregnancy. I would hope he would understand that each and every mother and father of these children is hoping for that, but they will have a far greater risk of their child dying, of their child being handicapped, of their child being retarded, than Mr. Stockman's newborn baby will.

MAKING APPROPRIATIONS FOR AID TO NICARAGUA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 136 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 247).

□ 1318

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 247) to provide U.S. assistance to foster peace and nurture democratic institutions throughout Central America with Mr. BROWN of California in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

□ 1320

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 136, the first reading of the joint resolution is dispensed with, and the joint resolution is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The text of House Joint Resolution 247 is as follows:

H.J. RES. 247

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. UNITED STATES SUPPORT FOR PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

The Congress finds and declares the following:

(1) The United States desires peace in Nicaragua and throughout Central America. United States policy toward Nicaragua should encourage all combatants to establish a ceasefire and come together in peace negotiations in order to resolve the internal Nicaraguan conflict, nurture democratic institutions in that country, and promote peace and stability, as part of a regional settlement through the Contadora process or the Organization of American States.

(2) The countries of Central America, working through the Contadora process, have agreed to 21 principles (set forth in the Contadora Document of Objectives issued on September 9, 1983) which provide an appropriate framework for achieving peace and security in the region.

(3) Combatants on both sides of the conflict in Nicaragua have expressed in words their goals for peace and democracy in Nicaragua and throughout the region. United States policy should be designed to encourage these goals, including through the resumption of bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua.

(4) There are disturbing trends in Nicaragua's foreign and domestic policies, including—

(A) the Sandinista government's curtailment of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and the independence of the media;

(B) the subordination of military, judicial, and internal security functions to the ruling political party;

(C) the Sandinista government's close military ties with Cuba, the Soviet Union, and its Warsaw Pact allies, and the continuing military buildup that Nicaragua's neighbors consider threatening; and

(D) the Sandinista government's efforts to export its influence and ideology.

(5) The Congress will continue to monitor developments in Nicaragua to determine whether progress is being made to curtail these disturbing trends. Such progress will be a key element in congressional consideration of future economic and security assistance requirements in the region.

(6) If the Congress determines that progress is being made toward peace and development of democratic institutions in Nicaragua, consideration will be given to initiating a number of economic and development programs, including but not limited to—

(A) trade concessions,
(B) Peace Corps programs,
(C) technical assistance,
(D) health services, and
(E) agricultural development.

(7) Should Nicaragua not address the concerns described in paragraph (4), the United States has several means to address this challenge to peace and stability in the region, including political, diplomatic, and economic means. In addition, the United States—

(A) should through appropriate regional organizations, such as the Organization of American States, seek to maintain multilateral pressure on Nicaragua to address these concerns;

(B) should, if called upon to do so, give serious consideration to supporting any sanctions adopted by such an organization; and

(C) should consider the imposition of trade sanctions.

(8) In assessing whether or not progress is being made toward achieving these goals, the Congress will expect, within the context of a regional settlement—

(A) the removal of foreign military advisers from Nicaragua;

(B) the end to Sandinista support for insurgencies in other countries in the region, including the cessation of military supplies to the rebel forces fighting the democratically elected government in El Salvador;

(C) restoration of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and the independence of the media; and

(D) progress toward internal reconciliation and a pluralistic democratic system.

(9) The Congress is deeply concerned about human rights violations by both the Sandinista government and the armed opposition groups.

SEC. 2. PROHIBITION ON FUNDING FOR MILITARY OR PARAMILITARY OPERATIONS IN NICARAGUA.

The prohibition contained in section 8066(a) of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (as contained in section 101 of Public Law 98-473) shall continue in effect without regard to fiscal year until the Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing that prohibition.

SEC. 3. ASSISTANCE FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF A CONTADORA AGREEMENT AND HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE FOR REFUGEES.

(a) IMPLEMENTATION OF CONTADORA AGREEMENT.—During fiscal year 1985, the President may allocate $4,000,000, which shall remain available until expended, for payment to the Contadora nations (Mexico, Panama, Colombia, and Venezuela) for expenses arising from implementation of an agreement among the countries of Central America based on the Contadora Document of Objectives of September 9, 1983, including peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems.

(b) HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE FOR REFUGEES.—During fiscal year 1985, the President may make available up to $10,000,000 for the provision of food, medicine, or other humanitarian assistance for Nicaraguan refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they have been associated with the groups opposing the Government of Nicaragua by armed force. Such assistance may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and only upon its determination that such assistance is necessary to meet humanitarian needs of those refugees. To the maximum extent feasible, such assistance should be provided to those organizations in kind rather than in cash. Assistance may not be provided under this subsection with the intent of provisioning combat forces.

(c) WAIVER OF LAWS.—Assistance under this section may be provided notwithstanding any other provision of law, except that section 531(c) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (prohibiting the use of funds for military or paramilitary purposes) shall apply to any assistance under subsection (b).

(d) SOURCE OF FUNDS.—Funds used pursuant to this section shall be derived from the funds appropriated to carry out chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) or chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or section 2(b) (relating to the "Migration and Refugee Assistance" account) or section 2(c) (relating to the Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund) of the Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1962.

SEC. 4. REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS.

No less frequently than once every 3 months, the President shall submit to the Congress a written report—

(1) describing any actions by the Sandinista government, and the groups opposing that government by armed force, which have contributed to or hindered efforts to establish a political dialogue in Nicaragua, to find a peaceful solution to the conflict, and to nurture democratic institutions in Nicaragua;

(2) describing the status of the Contadora process and United States efforts to begin the political dialogue in Nicaragua and to find a peaceful solution to the conflict;

(3) containing an accounting of any funds used under section 3 for implementation of a Contadora agreement or for humanitarian assistance for refugees; and

(4) containing such recommendations as the President deems appropriate with respect to future United States policies regarding Nicaragua.

SEC. 5. PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST FOR AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT TO NICARAGUA.

(a) PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST.—On or after October 1, 1985, the President may submit to the Congress a request for authority to take specified actions with respect to Nicaragua.

(b) CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST.—A joint resolution which grants the President the authority to take those actions specified in the request submitted pursuant to subsection (a) shall be considered in accordance with the procedures contained in section 8066(c) of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (as contained in section 101 of Public Law 98-473), except that references in that section to the Committee on Appropriations of each House shall be deemed to be references to the appropriate committee or committees of each House. For purposes of this subsection, the term "joint resolution" means only a joint resolution introduced after the Congress receives the President's request pursuant to subsection (a), the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That the Congress hereby authorize the President, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to take those actions with respect to Nicaragua which are specified in the request submitted to the Congress pursuant to Public Law 99- .", with the public law number of this joint resolution inserted in the blank.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendments are in order except the following amendments, which shall be considered as having been read, shall be considered only in the following order, and shall not be subject to amendment: First, the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, 1985, by, and if offered by, Representative HAMILTON of Indiana; and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative HAMILTON and a member opposed thereto; and second, the amendment in the nature of a substitute printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, 1985, by, and if offered by, Representative MICHEL or his designee, and said amendment shall be debatable for not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by Representative MICHEL or his designee and a Member opposed thereto.

For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] rise?

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. HAMILTON

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, pursuant to the rules, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. HAMILTON: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SECTION 1. UNITED STATES SUPPORT FOR PEACE IN CENTRAL AMERICA

(D) the Sandinista government's efforts to export its influence and ideology.

(5) The Congress will continue to monitor developments in Nicaragua to determine whether progress is being made to curtail these disturbing trends. Such progress will be a key element in congressional consideration of future economic and security assistance requirements in the region.

(6) If the Congress determines that progress is being made toward peace and development of democratic institutions in Nicaragua, consideration will be given to initiating a number of economic and development programs, including but not limited to—

(A) trade concessions,

(B) Peace Corps programs,

(C) technical assistance,

(D) health services, and

(E) agricultural development.

(7) Should Nicaragua not address the concerns described in paragraph (4), the United States has several means to address this challenge to peace and stability in the region, including political, diplomatic, and economic means. In addition, the United States—

(A) should through appropriate regional organizations, such as the Organization of American States, seek to maintain multilateral pressure on Nicaragua to address these concerns;

(B) should, if called upon to do so, give serious consideration to supporting any sanctions adopted by such an organization; and

(C) should consider the imposition of trade sanctions.

(8) In assessing whether or not progress is being made toward achieving these goals, the Congress will expect, within the context of a regional settlment—

(A) the removal of foreign military advisers from Nicaragua;

(B) the end to Sandinista support for insurgencies in other countries in the region, including the cessation of military supplies to the rebel forces fighting the democratically elected government in El Salvador;

(C) restoration of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and the independence of the media; and

(D) progress toward internal reconciliation and a pluralistic democratic system.

(9) The Congress is deeply concerned about human rights violations by both the Sandinista government and the armed opposition groups.

SEC. 2. PROHIBITION OF FUNDING FOR MILITARY OR PARAMILITARY OPERATIONS IN NICARAGUA.

The prohibition contained in section 8066(a) of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (as contained in section 101 of Public Law 98-473) shall continue in effect without regard to fiscal year until the Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing that prohibition

SEC. 3. ASSISTANCE FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF A CONTADORA AGREEMENT AND HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE FOR REFUGEES.

(a) IMPLEMENTATION OF CONTADORA AGREEMENT.—During fiscal year 1985, the President may allocate $4,000,000, which shall remain available until expended, for payment to the Contadora nations (Mexico, Panama, Colombia, and Venezuela) for expenses arising from implementation of an agreement among the countries of Central America based on the Contadora Document of Objectives of September 9, 1983, including peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems.

(b) HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE FOR REFUGEES.—During fiscal year 1985, the President may make available up to $10,000,000 for the provision of food, medicine, or other humanitarian assistance for Nicaraguan refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they have been associated with the groups opposing the Government of Nicaragua by armed force. Such assistance may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and only upon its determination that such assistance is necessary to meet humanitarian needs of those refugees. To the maximum extent feasible, such assistance should be provided to those organizations in kind rather than in cash. Assistance may not be provided under this subsection with the intent of provisioning combat forces.

(c) WAIVER OF LAWS.—Assistance under this section may be provided notwithstanding any other provision of law, except that section 531(c) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (prohibiting the use of funds for military or paramilitary purposes) shall apply to any assistance under subsection (b).

(d) SOURCE OF FUNDS.—Funds used pursuant to this section shall be derived from the funds appropriated to carry out chapter 1 of part I (relating to development assistance) or chapter 4 of part II (relating to the economic support fund) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 or section 2(b) (relating to the "Migration and Refugee Assistance" account) or section 2(c) (relating to the Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund) of the Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1962.

SEC. 4. REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS.

No less frequently than once every 3 months, the President shall submit to the Congress a written report—

(1) describing any actions by the Sandinista government, and the groups opposing that government by armed force, which have contributed to or hindered efforts to establish a political dialogue in Nicaragua, to find a peaceful solution to the conflict, and to nurture democratic institutions in Nicaragua;

(2) describing the status of the Contadora process and United States efforts to begin the political dialogue in Nicaragua and to find a peaceful solution to the conflict;

(3) containing an accounting of any funds used under section 3 for implemention of a Contadora agreement or for humanitarian assistance for refugees; and

(4) containing such recommendations as the President deems appropriate with respect to future United States policies regarding Nicaragua.

SEC. 5 PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST FOR AUTHORITY WITH RESPECT TO NICARAGUA.

(a) PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST.—On or after October 1, 1985, the President may submit to the Congress a request for authority to take specified actions with respect to Nicaragua.

(b) CONGRESSIONAL ACTION ON PRESIDENTIAL REQUEST.—A joint resolution which grants the President the authority to take those actions specified in the request submitted pursuant to subsection (a) shall be considered in accordance with the procedures contained in section 8066(c) of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (as contained in section 101 of Public Law 98-473), except that references in that section to the Committee on Appropriations of each House shall be deemed to be references to the appropriate committee or committees of each House. For purposes of this subsection, the term "joint resolution" means only a joint resolution introduced after the Congress receives the President's request pursuant to subsection (a), the matter after the resolving clause of which is as follows: "That the Congress hereby authorizes the President, notwithstanding any other provision of law, to take those actions with respect to Nicaragua which are specified in the request submitted to the Congress pursuant to Public Law 99- .", with the public law number of this joint resolution inserted in the blank.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 136, the amendment in the nature of a substitute is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] will be recognized for 1 hour, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 6 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. This amendment seeks to move toward a negotiated solution which will protect the national interests of the United States in Central America:

It deemphasizes a military approach. It encourages a ceasefire.

It prohibits military aid to the Contras, until Congress acts otherwise.

It encourages a regional approach to peace. It encourages the Contadora process and the use of the OAS.

It encourages diplomacy. It encourages bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua.

It offers incentives to Nicaragua if it conducts itself in a way which promotes peace and development.

It promises sanctions if it does not.

It makes available humanitarian aid for the refugees of the conflict through international groups.

It provides for a Presidential report, congressional monitoring, and an assured reconsideration of policy in light of changing circumstances.

All of us in the House share common goals. We want peace in Central America. We want national reconciliation in Nicaragua. We want the removal of Soviet and Cuban military advisers. We want Nicaragua to stop its excessive military buildup, and its destabilization of the region.

The question before us is how best to achieve these goals. Until recently, the President has favored military assistance to the Contras. Now the President has changed his views and favors U.S. assistance for economic and humanitarian aid to the Contras. That is a significant change and the President is to be commended for it. That change has altered the entire nature of the debate, and, in my judgment, for the better.

The question before us today, thus, is no longer about continuing military assistance, it is about what form this economic and humanitarian assistance will take:

What agencies will administer this aid;

What kinds of oversight and accountability provisions will exist to insure that this assistance is for truly humanitarian purposes; and

Whether funds shall be available for the Contadora process.

These are narrower questions than the previous issue before us concerning whether the United States would continue to fund a covert action against Nicaragua.

The $14 million under discussion today is a relatively small sum of money, but the shift in policy by the President away from military and toward economic and humanitarian assistance, can be a key signal of the future direction of U.S. policy.

This amendment would:

Provide $4 million for expenses arising from the implementation of a Contadora agreement, such as expenses for peacekeeping, verification, and monitoring systems;

Provide $10 million humanitarian assistance for refugees who are outside of Nicaragua, regardless of whether they are associated with the Contras. This assistance may be provided only through the International Committee of the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees upon the determination of such organizations that the assistance is necessary for humanitarian purposes and may not be provided for the provisioning of combat units;

Require that the President must report to the Congress every 3 months on progress made in achieving the objectives of the resolution and on any expenditure of funds under the resolution and may, under expedited procedures, request further action by the Congress any time after October 1, 1985;

Continue in effect the prohibition of funding for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua;

Support a cease-fire in Nicaragua, peace negotiations and a regional settlement of the conflicts in Central America through the Contadora process or the Organization of American States;

Notes the disturbing trends in Nicaragua's domestic and foreign policies, set up a procedure for monitoring those trends and make curtailment of them a key element in future congressional decisions;

Call for consideration of economic and development programs for Nicaragua and technical and trade assistance should progress be made in bringing peace and democracy to that troubled nation; and

Call for consideration of political, diplomatic, and economic steps by the United States unilaterally and through the OAS should progress not be made by Nicaragua in addressing these concerns.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment, embodying a constructive new policy for peace in Central America, deserves strong support for several reasons:

First, this proposal is bipartisan proposal. It is cosponsored by three Democrats and four Republicans. We contend today over the one major aspect of U.S. policy toward Central America on which there is no consensus. But that obscures the progress that has been made in recent months toward a consensus on Central American policy. Following the constructive contribution of the Kissinger Commission and of others, there is today a growing recognition of the importance of Central America to the United States, of the social and economic deprivation which has existed there, of the external threat, and of the need to provide both economic and security assistance to friends in the area.

Yet, on Nicaragua there are deep divisions.

This amendment is sponsored by Members with a variety of views and approaches to the problems of Central America in an effort to get beyond the deep divisions which have plagued Central American policy and get the United States behind regional peace efforts and negotiations aimed at national reconciliation in Nicaragua. It is an effort to help build on the emerging consensus on policy toward Central America.

Second, this amendment emphasizes the importance of a regional peace settlement.

U.S. efforts alone will not bring peace and stability to Central America. We must work with, and have the support of, our friends in the area. U.S. policy should be directed toward promoting regional peace and stability through the Contadora process. This amendment is based on the premise that the best way to achieve U.S. goals in Central America is through close coordination with the Contadora countries and the other friendly governments in the region.

The Contadora countries believe that they are now close to achieving a regional peace settlement, according to President Betancur of Colombia. As a sign of our additional commitment to the diplomatic process, this resolution provides $4 million for expenses arising from implementation of an agreement among the countries of Central America based on the Contadora principles.

There does not exist, at present, an established Contadora administrative unit capable of receiving funds to implement such an agreement, but the Contadora nations have over 100 diplomats working on a Central America agreement. Costs will be associated with peacekeeping, verification and monitoring provisions of any regional peace settlement.

We do not now know the precise costs associated with implementing agreements or how much of them the United States will be expected to pay. However, we believe we should be prepared to support and encourage Contadora diplomacy. The $4 million is seed money for peace. It is a tangible demonstration of our commitment to support regional diplomatic efforts toward a peace agreement.

Third, this proposal shifts the emphasis of U.S. policy away from military options to the pursuit of nonmilitary, diplomatic, political and economic strategies.

The amendment is based on the view that we have not fully pursued available diplomatic, economic and political options.

The amendment provides for tough-minded diplomacy. It encourages the United States to take its case and its evidence to the OAS, the United Nations, and the Contadora nations. It encourages a regional settlement with the involvement of the Contadora countries and other friendly governments in the region.

By deemphasizing military options and allowing time for negotiations, the amendment tests the stated desire of the Government of Nicaragua to pursue negotiations with the Contadora countries and the resumption of bilateral talks with the United States. Negotiations among the parties to the internal conflict in Nicaragua will not be easy, but that is the whole point of negotiations. If there were no disagreements, negotiations would not be necessary.

If negotiations do stall or if Nicaragua's disturbing policies continue, the United States has several policy options it can pursue which can make life difficult for the Sandinistas. These include:

Strengthening the defense capabilities of Nicaragua's neighbors;

Taking political and economic steps against Nicaragua in conjunction with our allies in Europe and Japan; and Acting through regional security mechanisms and in cooperation with our friends in the region.

To date, the United States has been unable to pursue these alternatives effectively because our friends and allies are reluctant to support our efforts while we support the covert war against Nicaragua.

The amendment does not preclude, at a later date, the consideration and pursuit of military options against Nicaragua. Those military options should be a choice of last resort, not the means early employed, in U.S. policy.

It is my view that measured nonmilitary policies to protect and promote U.S. interests, in conjunction with the broad-based regional diplomatic process, offer the best hope to achieve regional peace and stability in Central America.

Fourth, this amendment is balanced. It seeks to put equal pressures on all parties to the conflict in Nicaragua.

This amendment:

Puts equal pressure on all sides of the internal Nicaraguan conflict to enter a negotiating process to achieve national reconciliation in Nicaragua and promote a pluralistic, democratic system in that nation;

It expresses our deep concern about the disturbing external influences in Nicaragua and the conduct of the Nicaraguan Government;

It criticizes both the Sandinistas and the groups opposing the Sandinistas on human rights; and

It provides incentives for Nicaragua if its conduct changes in ways the United States considers important for the peace and stability of the area, and sanctions if it does not.

Because this balanced approach puts pressure on all parties, it has a more realistic chance of promoting a negotiating process. No government wants to negotiate with a gun at its head or when its opponents have incentives for negotiations to fail.

We must be both fair—and tough—in our approach. That balance is in this amendment and that combination is more likely to win the respect and support of other states in the region and around the world. The military action denied us that respect and support.

We all have our objections to Nicaragua's policies and doubts about dealing with the Sandinista government. But if pressures and incentives are to work on that government, there must be time to begin a negotiating process and the absence of undue and unbalanced pressure on the parties. This resolution provides that time and balance.

It also tells the Nicaraguan Government, that if they do not grasp the opportunity offered, the United States will pursue policies that will make life even more difficult for them.

Fifth, this proposal provides for the humanitarian relief of refugees.

There are growing numbers of refugees outside of Nicaragua, and these people need help.

People who are in need of food, clothing, and shelter should be helped, and that aid should be provided on a nonpolitical basis. The $10 million in this proposal is not intended to help carry on a war. It does not provide food and medicine and clothing to the Contras so the assistance they receive from other sources can be used to carry on the war. It is intended to help those who have been victims of the war. This aid is to be provided regardless of whether refugees have been associated with the groups opposing the Government of Nicaragua by armed force.

To insure that this humanitarian assistance reaches those in need, the vehicles for its provision are the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and the International Committee of the Red Cross. Both of these organizations have long assistance in refugee assistance and in this region. This assistance would be provided according to the standard procedures under which these organizations normally operate. These procedures include that aid cannot be provided to armed groups or individuals.

Sixth, this proposal provides for Executive reporting and congressional review of policy to determine what additional steps are necessary, as circumstances change.

Should the diplomatic process not move forward, the Congress will weigh that fact heavily. The Congress will consider carefully which parties have been helpful in advancing peace and which parties have been a hindrance.

Congressional ability to reopen this issue at a later date is an important signal, and incentive, to all parties to the conflict.

The Sandinistas would know that if they did not participate in such a dialog, they will have strengthened the case for aid to the Contras.

The Contras would know that their own good faith efforts, as well as their willingness to address human rights violations, would be carefully monitored by Congress.

This process of report and review will build restraint and incentives into the process. At each step, as circumstances unfold, the Congress will have an opportunity to review and adjust its policy.

Under this amendment both the Congress and the Executive must work together in future consideration of policy. Neither can proceed alone, but the executive branch will have the assurance that Congress will not be able to delay action because of expedited procedures.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] rise?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to this ill-advised amendment, and I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] is recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman yields 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I noticed that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana said that this legislation will facilitate bringing this matter before the OAS and the Contadora countries. I wonder why we do not bring it to the World Court. Everyone seems to think the World Court is so great, with its Soviet judge, with its Iranian judge, and with its judge from Communist Poland. That would be a great place to bring this controversy. But I digress.

Now, all problems, someone said, are caused by solutions, and this legislative solution certainly creates a lot of problems. The Democratic Party's felt need for an alternative has produced this bizarre creature. I mean no disrespect, but this bill reminds me of a dog with emotional problems. It barks at its friends and wags its tail at its enemies. It says, with Communists, pressure won't work, so let's kill them with kindness."

Well, I sit on the Foreign Affairs Committee with the chief sponsor of this legislation, and I sit at the feet of some great statesmen, and one to whom I pay strict attention on that committee is the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ], who has introduced legislation to provide $5 million in military aid to the non-Communist resistance in Cambodia.

One of the things he said during the markup, which I have almost committed to memory, is as follows:

> And while it's very true that ultimately the Vietnamese might react with more force, everybody recognizes that there is no way the non-Communist resistance is ever going to force Vietnam out. That's clearly impossible. But what is possible is that an increasingly effective resistance, by increasing the price Vietnam has to pay for their occupation of Cambodia, might induce the Vietnamese to agree to a political settlement.

Now, this legislation is not benign. It is not even merely cosmetic. It is not huff and puff, as the gentleman from Illinois said last night.

This legislation does direct and deadly damage to the democratic resistance in Nicaragua. It is retreat. It is disarmament. It is surrender. How you are going to have tough-minded diplomacy, having vacated the field altogether boggles the mind. It turns freedom fighters into refugees, into exiles from their own country and, of course, they can live on the handouts that the United Nations decides to let them have.

It does nothing to encourage the Sandinistas to stop their internal repression, their external subversion or to negotiate in good faith. It throws in the towel. It runs up the white flag and signals the Sandinistas to consolidate their revolution. It tells them they do not need the pretense of pluralism now. It helps them squeeze smaller the available space that the democratic opposition might have in Nicaragua.

Honduras and Costa Rica must be saying, "With friends like this, who needs enemies?"

Do we really want to transform them into a giant refugee camp, another Lebanon? Do Honduras and Costa Rica want to yield their sovereignty to the U.N. Commissioner on Refugees or to the Red Cross?

And the appropriation to the Contadora group of $4 million to implement a peace treaty is a triumph of hope over commonsense, since this bill encourages surrender, disarmament, and permanently decapitates the Contras by permanently prohibiting military assistance to the democratic resistance, no matter what.

How in the world are they going to have any incentives to negotiate? We offer those of whom the Washington Post yesterday said we owe a "decent concern," we offer them disarmament, surrender, and refugee status. We turn Central America into an area of guaranteed instability, which is a euphenism for concentration camps for thousands of refugees.

This is not mere indifference. This is despair. This is disaster and it says to people willing to fight and die for their freedom, "We won't help you fight, but we'll help you flee. If Honduras and Costa Rica won't accept you, let's ask the United Nations to buy you some boats." Then our pullout will have created boat people in this hemisphere as well as Southeast Asia.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRADISON].

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hamilton substitute, of which I am an original cosponsor. As a one-time supporter of military assistance to the Contras let me explain why my thinking has changed, and why I support only humanitarian aid at this time.

The originally stated goal of U.S. aid to the Contras was to help slow the flow of arms from Nicaragua to El Salvador—a goal which is as sound today as it was at the onset. With the disclosure of the mining of the Nicaraguan harbors it took no great imaginaiton to realize that the reasons for aid had been broadened far beyond what the Congress and the American people had originally been told. And this was done in such a way as to put in danger the lives and property of Nations friendly to the United States whose ships frequent Nicaraguan ports—hardly a way to build international support for the Central American policies of the United States. My change of view on Contra aid dates from the disclosure of the mining.

My concern deepened with the reports—growing in frequency—of alleged atrocities committed by Contras against unarmed citizens. Many specific allegations were brought to my attention by constituents, both lay and clergy, who are respected citizens in my community. Frankly, I don't know whether these allegations are true or not. Upon inquiry both to the House Intelligence Committee and the administration, I was advised that no comprehensive inquiries into the accuracy of these charges have been made by our Government. That to me is simply unacceptable. I can think of no higher priority than assuring the Congress and the American people that those who receive our assistance will not misuse it.

Without such assurances, I could not support the President's request. If there is truth to the charges that the Contras have indulged in torture, murder, kidnaping, and rape of innocent civilians—and I repeat I don't know whether such charges are correct—U.S. military aid should not be resumed until there are adequate controls to stop such activities in the future. I say this not with a Pollyanna view of war or to suggest that the Sandinistans are a bunch of choir boys—they are clearly guilty of unspeakable crimes against humanity—including genocide—and the export of revolution and violence. I am adamant on this issue because I do not believe that the Contras—by descending to the level of the Sandinistas as has been alleged—can, by such tactics, expect to win the hearts and minds of the people of Nicaragua whose support is crucial to the success of the Contras' cause. One must doubt that the Founding Fathers would have succeeded in their revolution if they had indugled in such tactics.

As for humanitarian aid the principles are clear, and flow from the finest traditions of our people. Nicaragua is racked by civil strife producing a steady flow of refugees. It is clearly appropriate to provide food and medicine to such refugees, whether Contras or not, and this can be done most efficiently through established international organizations with proven records and experienced staffs.

Let me close by indicating that I don't understand the partisan cleavage on this issue. I consider myself a supporter of the long and distinguished bipartisan foreign policy traditions of the late Senator Robert Taft, who lived in the district I now have the honor to represent. The substitute to which I have lent my name drafted by a group of us about equally divided between the two parties. During the process I offered to exchange ideas with the administration in the hope that the disagreements we see in this debate over how to provide humanitarian aid could be avoided and we could as a government speak with one voice on this issue. Only when there was no response to my offer did I decide to cosponsor the Hamilton substitute which I believed then and believe now sets policies which offer the best chance for achieving U.S. aims in Central America.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Chairman, as we begin this debate today or continue what we started yesterday, I would ask my colleagues to do one thing. This may be a shock to all of us, but I will admit that very few of us read every word of every resolution that comes in front of us. That may be a shock to our constituents, but certainly not to us.

Read this. Read this substitute. Read what they are proposing and tell me what it does to facilitate peace, what pressure it puts on the Sandinista Communists, who have already rejected peace offer after peace offer from the Contras, who even though the United States gave over $100 million of aid after they came to power, continue to move toward the Soviets.

What is in here? There is nothing wrong with this amendment. It just doesn't have a darn thing to do with this debate. It has nothing to do with what we are talking about today.

Let me just go through some of the words in this amendment and again I would ask my colleagues to read this.

We are going to "monitor" developments in Nicaragua and then if they do not move in the right direction, what are we going to do? We are going to refuse to send the Peace Corps. We are not going to send technical assistance. We are not going to send health services. These are all things, most of them, that we did anyway in 1979. It was the Carter administration that pulled them back. We have already tried that approach.

Another word that is used is that we "give serious consideration" to support sanctions adopted by the OAS. Let me get down to section 2, which is the real guts of it. Section 2 continues basically the confirmation by this Congress of the Brezhnev doctrine, which basically says, "What is free is negotiable and what is the Soviet Union's you can't touch." It confirms that. No military aid to this area, no military aid to the Contras. It reaffirms that doctrine.

Then we get to the heart of the amendment. It is really going to accomplish something; $10 million, and what is that going to be used for? It is going to be used for refugees outside of Nicaragua. Now, that may be all well and good. That may be fine. Maybe we should do that, but it has nothing to do with the issue at hand.

Then we get to the $4 million that is going to be held out for the Contadora process. Again, there is nothing wrong with that, but let us not kid ourselves about what this does.

I spoke yesterday about asking my colleagues on this side of the aisle what steps they were using to get the Sandinistas to change their ways.

□ 1340

I kept receiving the answer yesterday that we were going to get it, we were going to get it today with this amendment.

Mr. WEISS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WEISS. It seems to me that it has been said repeatedly that what we are supposed to be doing is getting the Contadora process in action with the verification of all of the various things, for removing advisers, for having the arms reduction in that area. That is the way to move, and the gentleman, it would seem to me, would support that, and that is what this resolution does.

Mr. DEWINE. I certainly support that. What I am saying is that there is nothing really wrong with what your resolution does. It just does not do much. That is the tragedy of it, it just does not do much.

I would ask some of my colleagues on this side of the aisle, you were saying that we are going to come back and revisit this issue in 6 months. I love that word. I never learned that word until I came to Congress. Now it is a new word. We are going to revisit this issue in 6 months.

Well, gentlemen, let me ask you, let us put the ball right over there in your court. Tell us, tell the American people today that assuming, let us just assume, and maybe we are naive, but let us assume that the Sandinistas do not become democrats in 6 months. Let us assume that they do not have good negotiations. Let us assume that none of these things happen. Who among you is going to vote for military aid to the Contras? Let us start with that.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. DEWINE. I will yield, but let me phrase the question first. Then I will yield to the gentleman in just a second.

I would like to know, just yes or no, who, if assuming all of those things will come in this Chamber, who will say yes, yes I am going to vote for military aid to the Contras?

Mr. FOWLER. I will discuss it, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. DEWINE. How many more?

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DEWINE. Yes, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I would say to the gentleman if this is as serious a problem as the gentleman describes, is he willing to bring in a declaration of war, the United States against Nicaragua? Why are you not?

Mr. DEWINE. If I can reclaim my time to answer the question, I think the whole point of the debate today is that, my God, we do not want to have to do that. But we have another viable option and it is certainly not this piece of paper that is in front of us, although there is nothing really wrong with it.

The other option is to keep the pressure on the Sandinistas by the military.

Mr. MCCAIN. will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. And I yield to my friend from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN].

Mr. MCCAIN. It is very interesting that we keep bringing up the question, "Are you prepared for a declaration of war?" The gentleman from Georgia obviously knows that none of us support such action and the reason why we are so strongly in opposition of this idiotic proposal is because we do not want to have to be in a situation where this Nation may have to declare war, and the gentleman from Georgia knows that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield ?

Mr. DEWINE. I yield to my friend from New Mexico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I appreciate the gentleman yielding.

I would like to tell my colleague that should these principles not be adhered to by the Sandinistas, I see this resolution as basically a message to Managua that there will be Members of Congress like myself who agonized over this vote who will not continue to support the Sandinista efforts as we have indirectly.

If these declarations are not adhered to, that they stop their exporting of revolution, that they continue the human rights violations and persecutions, that they not negotiate with the Contras, here is one Member that will change his vote accordingly.

The gentleman asked for that.

Mr. DEWINE. I appreciate that from these two Members. I would like to hear it from some others.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. I yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I want to make this point too, that I agree, this amendment is not bad, but it does not do anything. And the worst thing about it is, I guess, it makes it look like we are doing something.

Mr. DEWINE. It is a sham.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. It is a sham. And I think the people proposing it know that they will not, probably cannot get an agreement with the other body on this anyway, so we are not going to be doing anything about this.

Mr. DEWINE. If I can reclaim my time for a moment, it does nothing about this issue. Maybe from a humanitarian point of view it is good, but it does nothing about the issue.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. With all due respect to my colleagues, I appreciate what they said, and I am certainly sure they meant it and will do that if the Sandinistas do not come through as they are expected to do. The only problem is who is going to be there to give the military aid?

Mr. DEWINE. Will there be any Contras left?

Mr. MCCAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWINE. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MCCAIN. I think the point of the gentleman from California is very clear. The Barnes amendment simply encourages refugees.

Do we really believe that they are going to sit there as refugees and wait until next October, and still be able to take up arms against the Sandinista government which has opposed them and suppressed them?

In the meantime, what is the Sandinista government doing? They are setting up free fire zones, they are continuing their importation of 18,000 tons last year of military equipment, from the Soviet Union, that flow of arms continues on unabated, and they continue to increase their ability to destroy freedom fighters. At that time we will be faced with a much more difficult situation.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ZSCHAU].

Mr. ZSCHAU. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Today is a new day. I had hoped it would be a day where we could begin to forge a bipartisan policy toward Nicaragua.

Goodness knows we need one. We need a policy on which there is broad consensus. Without consensus, a foreign policy cannot be sustained. If a policy cannot be sustained, it is not going to be effective.

The intense debate yesterday obscured the broad areas of agreement on this issue. It was my hope that we could build on those areas of agreement to establish a policy toward Nicaragua that would attract bipartisan support.

It came through loud and clear in the debate yesterday that we agree—at least most of us—that Nicaragua has betrayed the goals of its revolution and poses a threat to its neighbors.

The question has been: What do we do about it?

Some say we should do nothing; it is none of our business. Others say we should support armed resistance to force the Sandinista regime to change its way.

I say that achieving change by force in Nicaragua would be difficult at best and with a lack of broad support in this country that policy is doomed to failure.

But we do have relatively broad agreement in the Congress and the administration that regional economic development and a regional treaty among the Central American countries is a most promising approach to solving the problems posed by Nicaragua. A verifiable treaty under which all countries in the region would respect the rights of their own citizens and the security of their neighbors would address the concerns that we have.

We have such a negotiation under way. The Contadora process was started 2 years ago. In September of 1983, the five Central American countries plus the Contadora countries of Mexico, Venezuela, Panama, and Colombia agreed to 21 objectives having to do with protecting human rights, establishing democracy, and ending foreign military involvement in the region and support of the insurgencies in neighboring countries.

I talked with a State Department official just last week, and I was amazed to learn how much progress there had been in the negotiations. It's surprising with the issues being so complex and with so many participants just how few sticking points there still are in those negotiations. It is quite possible that by the end of this year there could be an agreement designed to meet the Contadora objectives that could be signed by all of the countries in the region.

Where we've had the most disagreement on this issue is over the question of how we in the United States can foster these Contadora negotiations. Some say we need to pressure the Sandinistas and that the Contras are the best instruments of pressure.

Others, including the leaders in the Contadora nations, say the Contra activities are counterproductive, that they give a reason, or at least a rationale, for the Sandinistas to increase their military capabilities.

The Barnes/Hamilton resolution is not perfect, but I support it because I believe it can provide the basis for a new policy toward Nicaragua which would attract bipartisan support. Perhaps it can be improved in conference with the other body. It offers an approach that emphasizes diplomacy while retaining all other options. It would call for a cease-fire and a dialog within Nicaragua, support of the Contadora process, and provide some humanitarian assistance, although, as the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. McCAIN] has indicated, such assistance would be restricted to those outside of Nicaragua because it is specifically designed not to support continued fighting.

I believe this policy does provide pressure on the Sandinistas. It monitors specific items of concern—removal of foreign forces, end to insurgency support, restoring liberty in the country, and reconciliation with the armed opposition—and it provides some incentives. Most importantly, anytime after October 1 of this year the President can bring to the Congress and have considered under expedited procedures, any new proposal for stepped up pressure on Nicaragua if there is a lack of progress, or for an improved relationship, if there is progress.

The question was asked: Which Members would support stronger action if there is no programs? Would any supporters of Barnes-Hamilton support military and paramilitary assistance to the Contras if there is no progress or if there is an escalation of Sandinista military activity in the region? This Member, would support strong actions under such circumstances and I believe other Members would do so as well.

It has been charged that the Barnes-Hamilton resolution "does nothing." That's true if you assume that "doing something" necessarily means military activity.

When we deal with the Middle East which is a very complicated situation, we do not assume that we have to support insurgencies in some of the countries in order to "do something" to bring peace to that region. I do not think we should have such a narrow definition of "doing something," restricted to just military activity alone.

This resolution will not be attractive to all Members. If you believe we have no business in the region and we should not try to influence the outcome, it will not be attractive to you. If you want to increase Contra fighting capability it will not be attractive to you. If you do not want a regional treaty that would restrict all foreign military involvement in the region, including ours, it will not be attractive to you.

But if you want to begin to build a new bipartisan policy that gives diplomacy a chance, I ask your support.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CHENEY].

Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Chairman, we have spent a lot of time over the past few days debating the merits of U.S. policy in Central America. Many of us have traveled to the area, some of us on more than one occasion. With only a few exceptions, nearly every Member I've talked to or traveled with, has decried the evil nature of the regime that today holds power in Nicaragua.

During the debate on this floor for the past 2 days I have repeatedly heard Democratic members including the sponsors of the Barnes alternative admit that the regime in Nicaragua does censor the press, violate human rights, hold fraudulent elections, engage in subversion against its neighbors, and serve as the host country to vast numbers of Cuban, Soviet, East German, Libyan, and PLO advisers. Most Members of this body have concluded, or would conlcude, if they took the time to study the matter that what we have in Managua today is a Marxist-Leninist, Communist government. The more liberal wing of the Democratic Party, and that includes virtually all of the leaders and would-be leaders of the Democrats in the House of Representatives, claim to be concerned about the possible spread of communism in this hemisphere. They claim to be sincerely committed to pursuing policies designed to do something about the strife and turmoil and tragedy in Central America.

But Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to take them very seriously when they bring before us something as watered down and basically irrelevant as the proposal now before us.

The Barnes plan plays right into the hands of the Communist government in Nicaragua.

The Barnes-Hamilton amendment signals to the Sandinistas that they are free to consolidate their internal control and repression.

The Barnes plan urges the Nicaraguan resistance to give up and leave Nicaragua. It seeks to turn the Nicaraguan resistance into refugee exiles dependent on handouts from the United States and our allies.

What is even worse, is that the Barnes plan does absolutely nothing to encourage the Sandinistas to stop internal repression, stop external subversion, and negotiate in good faith.

The Communist government is in the midst of a civil war and there will be no peace in Nicaragua until they negotiate with their own people. Until they attempt to accommodate the other pluralistic elements within Nicaragua, such as the church, the business community, and other political beliefs, there will be no lasting peace in Nicaragua.

This Barnes-Hamilton amendment is a fascinating document—it really is. I don't know why generations of American diplomats didn't think of this approach to halting and reversing the spread of communism. Why, think of what Harry Truman could have done with this when faced with the crisis in Europe after World War II—instead of spending billions on the Marshall plan and on building NATO he could have made a donation to the International Red Cross. And instead of sending American troops to Korea to save South Korea from the Communist aggression of the North Koreans, he could have made a donation to the International Red Cross.

This is a whole new doctrine in American foreign policy—the Barnes doctrine.

This is how it will work in Central America. Got a problem with the Communist government in Nicaragua—are they censoring the press? Why we'll give a donation to the International Red Cross.

Are they persecuting the Catholic Church and other religions? Give a donation to the International Red Cross.

Have they engaged in a massive military buildup that grossly distorts the balance of power in the region? Give a donation to the International Red Cross.

Have they invited thousands of Cuban, Soviet, East German, Libyan, and PLO advisers into Central America?

Do they hold fraudulent elections and commit human rights violations even on their own people?

Have they engaged in efforts to subvert the governments of El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica?

Are they doing everything in their power to create a Soviet-Cuban style, Communist dictatorship in Central America? Give a donation to the International Red Cross.

Now, in all fairness to my colleagues who authored this amendment, they do also ask for negotiations. It wouldn't be right to leave you with the impression that they only want to give money to the International Red Cross.

Now I would like to believe it's that simple for us to hold our own against our Soviet adversaries in Third World conflicts—but I don't believe it is. I think the record is replete with evidence, from the last two administrations that we have done everything humanly possible to persuade this government in Managua that we want to work with them, to help them develop, to see them become a free and independent nation. And no matter what we've tried we find that they are driving, more out of consideration for their relationship with the Soviet Union, than they are by a true concern for the circumstances of their people.

I would have greater confidence in the proposals of our Democratic colleagues if I thought there were any circumstances under which they would come to this floor and recommend a more decisive course of action. Or if I believed that a year from now after this policy has failed, they would come to the well of the House, admit the policy had failed, and support a more effective policy. But I have a hunch, that when this policy fails, and it will fail, they will blame the administration, rather than this policy.

The question of providing lethal assistance, weapons and ammunition, to the FDN, the democratic forces fighting to reclaim their revolution, is unfortunately, not before us today. The only choice is between the proposal of Mr. BARNES and Mr. HAMILTON, or the proposal of the Republican leader, Mr. MICHEL. I don't think that it is a difficult choice. The Michel option at least preserves the principle of U.S. support for the only people in the hemisphere who are willing to put their lives on the line, to defend their nation against those who would pose a Communist ideology from outside the hemisphere.

The International Red Cross may run good refugee camps, but they will need a lot more than $14 million, if the Communist government in Nicaragua is able to consolidate this power and the remaining non-Communist elements are forced to become refugees. And the Red Cross is irrelevant if our objective is to oppose further subversion and aggression in Central America.

In the final analysis, Mr. Chairman, if you believe we are faced with a serious, Soviet-backed, threat in Nicaragua, you should defeat the Barnes-Hamilton package, and support the Michel substitute.

If you believe, as I do, that the FDN Contra forces are dedicated to defeating the Communists and restoring democracy to the Nicaraguan revolution, then you should defeat the Barnes-Hamilton proposal.

And finally, if you are truly interested in avoiding even deeper involvement of U.S. forces in Central America, you should vote to help the Nicaraguans help themselves. If this House refuses to go forward with at least humanitarian aid to the Contras, the ultimate cost to the Nation in terms of lives and treasure will be far more than $14 million.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHENEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN].

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Chairman, I intended to take my turn later on but I think it is very important to point out the absence of incentive for negotiations as part of the Barnes-Hamilton amendment.

There is also a prohibition on military assistance to Nicaraguan resistance which remains in place in this amendment.

I think it is very important to hear what Managua radio Sandino Network said this morning while they applauded the congressional vote last night. I will only read the last paragraph:

> In conclusion, the Nicaraguan Government wishes to reiterate its firm irreversible position that it will never accept any kind of a dialog with the mercenary forces directed and financed by the United States Government regardless of the pretext to stage this dialog.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I regret that my colleague from Wyoming, Mr. CHENEY, refused to yield for debate, for what he said deserves to be answered.

The speech that he read has been read in this Chamber by him and others many times before. Only the name of this year's country has been substituted.

A few years ago I heard the same speech read by similar spokesmen for this administration when we were supporting a government in Ethiopia against Marxists, as they called themselves, in Somolia. After pursuing this policy—thought to be in the best interest of the United States—for a while we found that events change and now ironically we are supporting the Somolians even though Mr. Barre calls himself a Marxist, against the Communists in Ethiopia.

□ 1400

I remember when that speech was read a few years ago by administration spokesmen about Albania, which was first a Soviet satellite, second, a Chinese Communist satellite, and is now some form of xenophobic nationalism, I guess, which our country embraces.

I remember when that speech was read by administration spokesmen in this body about Algeria, a country that we condemned as Communist, but to which we are now providing arms and understanding.

I remember when that speech was read about the Sudan and Zimbabwe and Marxist Mozambique, but have now changed our policies. I remember too well the accusations heard here today that there is no reconciliation, no negotiation possible; that we cannot find a way to solve our problems, eliminate hostile influences, and to support the forces of democracy short of waging war.

I urge my colleagues to put the problem of Central America in that perspective of recent history. Central America is important to the United States. It is not at this moment vital to the United States.

But the United States is vital to the freedom and economic development of Central America. We can sustain a better course; 40 Republicans along with 40 Democrats last night said a military solution is not the only solution and not a bipartisan solution.

The amendment offered by Mr. BARNES today is first step in achieving a sustainable U.S. foreign policy in minimizing hostile influences in Central America. I hope you will support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARTNETT].

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday to the debate on a similar issue to the one we have before us; and I have tried to listen patiently today. I guess I consider myself somewhat more unlike those who are on the floor here and maybe more like those who are in the gallery or walking around outside in the street.

I do not know a lot about foreign policy. I do not known a lot about Albania and Ethiopia. I care because there are people there, human beings who have a body and soul. I care for their well-being. I do not know a lot about them, and I guess to some degree I am not as concerned about them as I am about the people that I call my fellow Americans here in these United States.

My colleague that preceded me here in the well, Mr. CHENEY, rhetorically asked some questions:

Do you believe that Nicaragua exports terrorism?

Do you believe that Nicaragua oppresses free speech and religion?

Do you believe that Nicaragua is a bastion now for Soviet military hardware and advisers and Cuban advisers?

Do you believe these things?

Do you believe that communism and Marxism in this hemisphere is a threat to life in the United States the way we have known it?

My friends, if you do not believe these things then, of course, anything that I would say today is going to fall on deaf ears.

If you do not believe that communism is a threat to our way of life in these United States and if stability in Central America is not of great concern to these United States, then you may as well not even be present in this Chamber.

Do you not think that it is in the best interests of the United States for us to have some control of activities in Central America? Do you not believe that if Nicaragua were to go unabated in exporting terrorism to all Central American countries, that ultimately they would be knocking on the door of the borders of Texas from Mexico?

Do you believe that our whole economic structure in these United States would be unalterably changed? Do you not believe that really we should put our country first and not be so concerned about world opinion?

What is the reason for the presence of Soviet military advisers and Cuban military advisers and hardware in Nicaragua? For its own self-protection? An armed force in excess of 60,000 men for its own protection from bordering countries who scarcely have active police forces?

Do you wonder some time the confusion that the American people must experience when they feel a great surge of pride in this country; a great surge of patriotism, a great sense of America being first in the hearts of their fellow countrymen, and they look to this Congress, which has been referred to by some as the "superbowl of hypocrisy?" And see some of you here in Congress always blaming America for all the world's problems.

You express concern about stability. You express concern about your neighbors, and yet still you support a plan such as this put before us by Mr. BARNES and Mr. HAMILTON. A plan which would sell out the freedom fighters of Nicaragua.

Mr. Chairman, people like me, just simple little Americans that do not have the fancy educations and all the liberal ideas that perhaps some of you have; we wonder. We wonder, what is it you are doing? Why do you not have your own country's best interest at heart?

Because most assuredly when this plan fails, and it will, the same voices that have been raised from this Chamber today will be blaming this administration, for once again having failed with its foreign policy in Central America.

No, I guess I am just like the poor little old farmer maybe from Kansas, or the peach grower in Georgia, or maybe the realtor in Charleston or the insurance agent in Raleigh who thinks, "Why can't there be a simple solution? Why can't we just tell Nicaragua, 'Either straighten up or we're coming down?' "

Mr. FOWLER. Will the poor little peach farmer yield?

Mr. HARTNETT. I will not yield. Mr. FOWLER, you've had your say, thank you.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will you yield to me?

Mr. HARTNETT. No, I will not, sir.

My colleagues, America is asking itself; CBS, NBC, and ABC notwithstanding, "Won't somebody tell us the truth? Won't somebody tell us what really is going on in Nicaragua?"

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARTNETT. For once, I would urge my colleagues on the other side of the aisle, let us not, all of us, collectively try to set foreign policy; let us not all of us be experts after 2, 4, 6, 8 years in Congress of what is best for us in Central America. Let us try to help to some small degree people who are vitally concerned about their own future, as we should be about ours.

Please defeat this Barnes-Hamilton plan and let those folks up there in the gallery and out there on the streets who are wondering "What kind of a menageria is this place?" Let them know that we have the best interests of you at heart, our fellow Americans, and that best interest would be to see that there is stability in Central America and that the Contras be allowed to continue their effort to bring about the type of government they want in their country and let us really be against oppression, and let us really be against tyranny and communism and Marxism in our own hemisphere and maybe the confusion, I am sure which so many of our fellow Americans suffer from will be cleared up once and for all when we act with one clear voice and say, we are going to help those people who are trying to help themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I urge support of the Hamilton substitute, because I think it is a viable alternative. It is bipartisan—and my colleagues on the other side—if they bother to read the names of the cosponsors, they will see that this is a bipartisan effort.

It is the President of the United States who started this positive process when he first came forth with his plan for humanitarian aid. He should be given credit for this initiative.

I think that the message or alternative is, Mr. President, that we share your objective, peace, but we think we have a better way to achieve it through negotiations, through peace, through compromise, through the Contadora, through bilateral discussions with the Nicaraguans, and finally, between the Contras and the Sandinistas.

This is a good provision. It says the following: The Contadora process, which has been flawed, needs some pumping up in the areas of verification and inspection, so let's give them the foundation to achieve these mechanisms. Should there be a treaty with peacekeeping forces required, this provision makes that foundation a lot closer to reality.

It also sends another message. It says that the Contras are violating human rights, but it also more forcefully says that the Sandinistas are doing an equal amount of damage to internationally recognized human rights and human decency. This provision says that both sides must clean up their act.

This is a substitute that, in essence, says that this is a message to Managua, and that message to Managua is this: You have got to negotiate with the Contras besides cleaning up your act or else. And Mr. Cruz' proposal, I think, is a positive point of departure, an extremely good set of democratic principles. It says to the Sandinistas very forcefully: You have to reduce your Soviet and Cuban ties.

It makes a number of points which are important for peace and negotiation. It makes a number of points that are critical. Most importantly, it says that aid will be funneled through the Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner on Refugees, to respectable international organizations that would be in charge of disseminating this assistance responsibly and equitably.

There is another issue which has not been brought up, one that has been sparked and provoked by a recent Supreme Court decision. I will call it the Morrison decision, which severely restricts the flow of Government information to the press and public and the Congress. So sweeping was the Court's language that the CIA could, if it wished, now hold back unclassified sources of information—newspaper clippings, for example—from release from the Freedom of Information Act.

What I am saying is that this decision, which has been pursued by the Justice Department, and which Mr. Meese refused to answer whether he would jail a reporter if the reporter published classified information, even if it was leaked, even if it was the lowest classification, which is limited official use. What we are doing in the Hamilton substitute is preventing this potential kind of abuse by chanelling this assistance through the Red Cross.

So this is one Member of Congress who, if many of these provisions in this resolution are not followed by the Sandinistas, I will not vote again to limit a punitive response to them. I think that this is a very clear message to Managua, which expires on October 1, a date many Members like myself will be looking at to see if the Sandinistas can clean up their act. I think this amendment gives peace a chance. It spurs for negotiations within Contadora countries. It puts the United States very clearly on the side of a negotiated settlement. It provides a foundation to carry out the Contadora process, which has been flawed on both sides, on our side for not backing it, but also from the side of many of the Contadora nations that have clearly tilted toward the Sandinistas.

I urge the full support for this provision which is a bipartisan effort, which is also supported by several Republicans in this body as well the majority of Democrats. Let us not look at foreign policy as a partisan issue. Let us not call each other ostriches and other adjectives. Let us call ourselves American Congressmen who are willing to give peace a chance.

I am in strong support of the Hamilton measure, which combines humanitarian aid with a sound approach to U.S. foreign policy in Central America. The International Red Cross and the U.N. High Commission on Refugees are universally respected as a humanitarian aid organizations. The UNHCR provides protection and support services to refugees of conflicts throughout the world.

There are now more than 25,400 refugees in Honduras and several thousand in Costa Rica who have fled the conflict in Nicaragua. In Honduras, many of these refugees were at first received at the Mocoron Refugee Reception Center and then were transferred to smaller communities under the protection of the U.N. High Commission on Refugees [UNHCR]. The UNHCR has protection officers present in the refugee camps and has contracted out services through the World Relief Organization. In Costa Rica the Socorro Internacional Organization has also done a fine job in providing services to several thousand refugees. Including many Miskito, Sumo, and Rama who have fled the conflict. Individuals, such as Kennith Serapio, a Miskito doctor who continues to provide services to his people inside the refugee camps, deserve our support and encouragement.

Mr. Speaker, the UNHCR has been very careful to focus its support services in a way that avoids ideological preferences. I expect that the indigenous peoples in these camps will have access to their political leaders without violating this precept, including leaders from the Misurasata organization.

This measure is the humane thing to do, it is consistent with our overall objective of achieving diplomatic solutions to the regional crisis and it is in line with our stated support for the Contadora process.

I would like to insert for the record two articles, one that describes the potential negative effecting the Supreme Court decision, the other a New York Times article reporting on General Gorman's testimony before the Senate. General Gorman's statement was the subject of much contention in the debate yesterday. I insert it for purposes of clarifying the record. I also include articles from the Washington Post.

The articles follow:

REAGAN WINS ANOTHER BATTLE FOR GOVERNMENT SECRECY

(By David Wise)

The Supreme Court's decision giving the Central Intelligence Agency blanket power to keep its sources of information secret is a stunning victory for the Reagan Administration in a program to restrict the flow of government information to the press and public.

Last Tuesday's 7-2 decision, written by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, allows the CIA to refuse to reveal names of researchers who participated in a program that tested mind-altering drugs on unsuspecting Americans. The program, known as MK/ULTRA, lasted from 1953 to 1966 and resulted in at least one death.

So sweeping was the court's language, that the CIA could, if it wished, now hold back unclassified sources of information—newspaper clippings, for example—from release under the Freedom of Information Act. Mark Lynch, counsel to the American Civil Liberties Union National Security Project, said: "It in effect gives them [the CIA] complete discretion to withhold anything they want. The information doesn't have to have anything to do with national security."

The timing of the court's decision could not have pleased the White House more. It comes just as the Justice Department is prosecuting what may be the most significant national security case in modern times—a case that could lead to government crackdowns on officials who leak to the press and on reporters.

The arrest by the FBI last October of Samuel Loring Morison on charges of espionage briefly made headlines, as much for the distinguished name he bears as for the circumstances of the case. Morison is the grandson of the late Samuel Eliot Morison, the Harvard historian.

Samuel Loring Morison was charged with selling classified satellite photographs of a nuclear-powered Soviet aircraft carrier to Jane's Defense Weekly, a British military magazine. Morison worked for the magazine part time, in addition to his job as a photo analyst at the Naval Intelligence Support Center.

It is clear that the Reagan Administration intends to use the Morison case to break new ground in the continuing battle between government and press over the control of information. Not since the 1971 Pentagon Papers case and the subsequent prosecution of Daniel Ellsberg, who gave that history of the Vietnam War to the New York Times, has Justice Department sought to apply the espionage statutes to an official who leaks information to the press.

And if the government succeeds in convicting Morison, will reporters be next? Floyd Abrams thinks so. Abrams, an authority on government secrecy and co-counsel for the New York Times in the Pentagon Papers case, declares: "One of the risks [in the Morison case] is that the interpretation of the espionage law now offered by the Justice Department might well be applicable to reporters. Merely publishing classified information could constitute a crime. It's a harrowing prospect."

Morton H. Halperin, a former deputy assistant secretary of defense and director of the Center For National Security Studies, also believes that the Administration may be using the Morison case to lay groundwork for future prosecution of reporters under the espionage laws.

"If Morison is convicted and the statute upheld, they'll indict more government officials who leak," Halperin said. "Then they'll . . . start indicting reporters and move right down the line with the press."

All this fits a pattern of information control. In 1982, Ronald Reagan issued a new executive order on the classification of government documents. The order eliminated automatic declassification of new documents and made it easier for government bureaucrats to classify information. In 1983, Reagan issued another order that would have required hundreds of thousands of government workers to take lie detector tests. It would also have forced 122,400 officials to sign agreements to submit books and other writings containing intelligence information for government review, even after returning to private life. Under pressure from Congress, the directive was suspended, but many officials had already signed agreements.

Does the Reagan Administration really intend to go after reporters for printing government secrets? Atty. Gen. Edwin Meese III offered little comfort on that score. "I think it depends on the circumstances of the case," he said when questioned at the Washington Press Club on March 20.

What makes government lawyers particularly confident about the Morison case is an unprecedented ruling by a federal district court judge in Baltimore on March 14. Judge Joseph H. Young, refusing to dismiss the Morison case, held that the spy laws could be applied to government officials who leaked to the press. That issue was never reached in the Morison prosecution, which was dismissed, because of improper government actions.

But now that a federal judge has held that leakers can be prosecuted for espionage, it may be a short step to apply the same laws to reporters who receive and publish leaked information.

To understand the cat-and-mouse game over official secrets, the Espionage Act of 1917 must be viewed together with the classification system. That system first established for civilian departments by President Harry S. Truman in 1951 creates three categories of classified documents: confidential, secret and top secret. These are defined as information that, in turn, could cause "damage," "serious damage" or "exceptionally grave damage" to the national security if released.

With certain narrow exceptions, it has not been against the law for a government official to give a classified document to a reporter. "There has been no suggestion up to now that the classification system has been brought under the espionage statute," Abrams says. "Maybe the Morison case will provide a backdoor method to apply the classification system to persons outside the government." It was precisely to close the gap between the classification system and the espionage statute that the CIA recently proposed a law to make it a crime for government employees to disclose "classified information." The White House has since dropped the proposal.

But that decision is not what is seems. As Halperin points out, "It would be absurd to ask Congress to enact a statute at the very moment that the government is in court in the Morison case trying to prove that the statute already exists." Lynch, one of Mori-son's attorneys, thinks the government has adopted a "two track strategy. If they lose, they go for the statute. If they win, they don't need it."

Robert F. Muse, another Morison attorney, expressed deep disappointment with Judge Young's opinion. "What gets lost in the judge's opinion," he said. "is the nature of information in a democracy. The people are supposed to know."

They will know less under the new Supreme Court decision. Congress has already passed a law exempting CIA "operational files"—covert operations and clandestine intelligence collection—from public disclosure. The Supreme Court ruling goes far beyond that. In the information war, the press and public are clearly losing.

U.S. GENERAL SAYS NICARAGUA REBELS CANNOT WIN SOON

(By Bill Keller)

WASHINGTON. February 27.—The retiring commander of American military forces in Central America said today that the Nicaraguan rebels were incapable of overthrowing the Sandinista Government in "the foreseeable future" regardless of whether they received American aid.

But the commander, Gen. Paul F. Gorman, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that support of the rebels should be resumed, along with diplomatic measures, to keep up economic and political pressure and "bring the Sandinistas to a reckoning."

Asked after the hearing how long such pressure would take to produce changes in the Nicaraguan Government, he replied, "Years."

OVERTHROW SOON NOT FEASIBLE

General Gorman, who will turn over his command on Saturday, said that while most of Nicaragua's neighbors had unofficially told him that they would favor a change in the Sandinista Government, the rebel forces were too small and ill trained to accomplish such an objective.

"I would argue that you build your policy on what's possible." he added later. "I don't think overthrow is feasible in the near future."

In Managua, Nicaraguan officials said today that they had asked for a meeting between President Daniel Ortega Saavedra and Secretary of State George P. Shultz to renew "dialogue" between the two nations.

In Costa Rica, Reagan Administration officials said, the Government is considering whether to curtail relations with Nicaragua, a development that the officials said could help persuade Congress to renew aid to the Nicaraguan rebels. [Page A10.]

POWER SHARING CALLED AIM

The Administration's justification for supporting the rebels has evolved in the past year from blocking arms shipments to neighboring countries, to pressuring Managua to amend its behavior in the region, to seeking a change in the Nicaraguan government.

President Reagan, at a news conference six days ago, said the goal of United States policy was to "remove" the "present structure" of the Nicaraguan Government. The President said he wanted the Sandinistas to "say 'uncle' " to the rebels and allow them to share power.

General Gorman said today the rebels had not succeeded in cutting off arms shipments from Managua to Salvadoran guerrilla groups. But he said the civil war in Nicaragua had "drawn off the energies of the Sandinistas and has diverted one heck of a lot of money" that would have gone to underwrite the Salvadoran revolution.

"Whatever you were investing in those 16,000 fighters, you got more than your money's worth," he said.

But as far as actually winning their military struggle, he said, the Nicaraguan rebels are "marginally able to sustain" their troops and cannot expect victory "in the foreseeable future."

SALVADOR REBELS IN SWITCH

General Gorman said that in El Salvador military gains by the Government had forced a major reversal in the strategy of the rebel Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front.

He said the United States had obtained copies of "instructions" from rebel leaders in Managua to field commanders to abandon a strategy of fighting the Salvadoran Army in large formations, to break down their formations into smaller units and to return to urban warfare that had been abandoned a few years ago.

As a result, he said, the number of guerrillas in the capital city of San Salvador had grown recently from 50 to 500, with missions to kill and kidnap Government officials as well as attack economic targets.

SHOOTINGS SAID TO RESTART

"The shootings have started again in San Salvador, and in my judgment, most of the violence has been a product of this F.M.L.N. decision," he said, using the initials in Spanish of the rebel group.

In response to a question from Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, the general said there was "no reason to believe" that the violence was caused by death squads operating with Government approval.

General Gorman's appraisal, given at a three-hour hearing, was the finale of a 22-month assignment as commander of the Southern Command during which he was credited with building the American military operation from a sleepy backwater to a forceful instrument of foreign policy. The general has announced he is retiring, after 40 years' service, to a farm in Virginia.

His successor, Gen. John R. Galvin, was at the hearing today and said he planned to depart for the command headquarters in Panama on Thursday.

General Gorman's appearance came as the Administration is pressing Congress to permit $14 million in covert aid to the Nicaraguan rebels. A vote is expected in April or early May.

General Gorman said that despite the absence of United States assistance, which was cut off by Congress last year, the ranks of the rebels had been growing. He put the strength of the several rebel groups at 16,000 armed men and said they could field "half again as many fighters in several months" if given financial support.

The main accomplishment of the rebels, he said, has been to drain resources that the Nicaraguan Government would otherwise use to subsidize Salvadoran guerrilla groups.

Praising the Nicaraguan rebels as "freedom fighters" whose goal is to oust the Sandinistas, he said: "I don't see any immediate prospect that these guys in blue suits in the hills are going to march into Managua. It seems to me that the whole resistance movement has got another year or more of slogging to go before that were ever in prospect."

"The answer," he added, "lies in some kind of combination of pressures and diplomacy."

Later General Gorman alluded to the controversy in Congress last year over reports that the Central Intelligence Agency had supplied the rebels with training manuals in guerrilla warfare.

"Most of these folks, as I understand it from talking to the Hondurans and Costa Ricans, are uneducated campesinos," he said. "Most of them can't read. I think the only people that have used the manuals that were produced for them effectively is members of this body."

Questioned after the hearing, General Gorman said United States aid would not change the prospects for a rebel victory. "I don't see how you could imagine that a force of 16,000 is going to overthrow a government that has under its control 10 times that number of people in their army."

He told the committee that without a renewal of aid to the rebels, "the campaign will begin to peter out, wear down."

"The nature of the beast is that you join what you think is a winning cause," he said.

Such a guerrilla reversal would be followed, he predicted, by an exodus of rebels and their families into neighboring Honduras that would swell the refugee population there to more than 50,000.

The general said that leaders he had talked to in other Central American countries, especially Costa Rica and Honduras, while publicly calling for diplomatic measures, had unofficially said the Nicaraguan Government "must change."

"The leaders that I have had discussions with on this subject have stated unanimously that they cannot deal with a Marxist-Leninist garrison state in their midst. They must change. They will then usually go on to say, 'If that means they must be removed, then so be it.' "

CIVILIANS QUIT BORDER ZONE—MANAGUA CLEARS SITE TO ISOLATE CONTRAS

(By John Lantigua)

MURRA, Niacaragua—Large areas of the northern Nicaraguan mountains have been cleared of civilians, according to government military officials, who say those wilderness areas are now strictly war zones in which the Sandinistas will increase their firepower.

On a recent trip beyond this town 120 miles north of Managua, I walked about seven miles into one of those newly militarized zones where until now the rebels had been able to find food, refuge, information and recruits.

The residents evacuated in the past two months were among at least 7,000 families that the Sandinistas say they are in the process of relocating to less remote areas.

According to local military officials, the road I followed is being improved to facilitate the Army's access to the mountainous zone, considered strategic because it is just across the border from Honduras and the largest of the rebel camps, called Las Vegas.

The spine of hills that runs out of Honduras and by Murra has been a principal thoroughfare for the contra rebels who enter Nicaragua from that camp, Sandinista officials say.

Houses along the road were abandoned and had been emptied of all possessions. In some cases, roofing material had been dragged away and the insides of the stripped houses were exposed to the elements. In other houses, bread ovens and primitive cooking stoves made of clay had been smashed to prevent use by the rebels.

There were no people to be seen. Chickens, pigs and cows, which normally surround such rural houses and which the rebels have been known to buy from farmers, were also gone.

On trees, the Sandinistas had posted a message telling the rebels that 1985 would be a year in which they "continue to be defeated" and offering them amnesty.

Entitled "A Letter of Return," the poster featured a drawing of a uniformed rebel turning in his rifle and being welcomed joyfully by his family.

"The Popular Sandinista Army agrees to respect your life, our physical integrity and agrees to give you just and dignified treatment if you deliver yourself with this document to our troops or to the nearest militia post with your equipment," it said.

After almost two hours of walking, I rounded a bend and was stopped by the sound of a bullet being shifted to the chamber of a bolt-action rifle. No one was visible. As I raised my hands, a Sandinista soldier stepped out from behind a canvas lean-to farther up the road.

Lt. Felix Sanchez, who was at a makeshift camp around the next bend, said no civilians were to be in the area. He said the next Sandinista outpost, at an abandoned hamlet called Rosario overlooking the border, had been besieged last month by hundreds of rebels, and that 11 Sandinistas had died there.

Sanchez said his men, who patrol for three miles around their camp, taking them close to the border, had not seen a contra in two weeks.

"We think they are in Honduras reorganizing," he said. "They used to take advantage of people who lived in areas like this. They used to get food from them, but now they can't anymore and they are having to reorganize."

In an interview in Managua, Tomas Borge, minister in charge of internal security, said that with civilians removed from the area "it makes it easier to use our artillery. It clearly becomes a war zone."

Observers said they expect to see use of Soviet-made Mi24 helicopter gunships.

Asked if the Mi24 would be used in the new militarized zones, Borge said: "If such helcopters were here, it would be stupid to have them as museum pieces."

Borge said he expected rebel attacks soon in conjunction with a congressional vote on whether the United States should renew their funding.

NICARAGUAN REBELS CUT MILITARY OPERATIONS—LOSS OF CIA FUNDING IS SAID TO TAKE TOLL

(By Edward Cody)

MANAGUA, NICARAGUA.—Short of supplies and transport, anti-Sandinista rebel forces recently have reduced the scope and level of their three-year-old guerrilla war.

U.S. and rebel officials have attributed the reduction in rebel activity mainly to lack of funds, which apparently is catching up with the main guerrilla force nine months after Congress imposed a ban on CIA financial aid.

Interior Minister Tomas Borge said the shift also reflects recent successes by the Popular Sandinista Army in driving rebel forces northward toward the border region with Honduras and, for many, across the border into camps within Honduras. In a reflection of this, Defense Ministry reports have shown a clear drop in the number of incidents in recent weeks.

"This favors us, because the war is going away from the interior of the country and toward the border," Borge said in an interview, referring to the decline of rebel activity in the more populated and economically important central zone.

"But at the same time, it implies a certain risk, because a border war is always dangerous for the implications it might have for a neighboring country, in this case Honduras. We will try to be very careful not to give any pretext that could provoke an incident."

U.S. officials in Honduras have expressed similar fears that more regular rebel crossings of the border area raise the risk of clashes between Honduran and Nicaraguan troops in the frontier hills.

At the same time, the increase in rebel troops on Honduran territory has intensified nervousness within the Honduran armed forces over that country's role in aiding the U.S.-backed insurgents.

The Honduran government protested sharply when 17 Nicaraguan soldiers drove across the border and were arrested Tuesday in what Managua said was an accident. But an aide to Borge expressed confidence that the soldiers and their military trucks will be returned without major complications.

Borge estimated that 6,000 to 7,000 guerrillas from the main rebel group, the Nicaraguan Democratic Force, gathered recently in camps in southern Honduras near the mountainous border with Nicaragua. This is up sharply from the number late last year, when most of the rebels were reported inside Nicaragua ambushing Sandinista Army and government vehicles and agricultural cooperatives.

U.S. and rebel officials have put the number inside Honduras at 5,000 to 6,000 from a total strength estimated by rebel officials at more than 12,000.

Miskito, Sumo and Rama Indian rebels in the Atlantic coastal region and Eden Pastora's independent anti-Sandinista guerrillas along the border with Costa Rica have another several thousand armed men. But they have been largely inactive for a number of months because of a lack of supplies, their leaders have acknowledged.

Borge said the Popular Sandinista Army has done better against the Democratic Force rebels in recent months because it has adapted to guerrilla tactics and increased the number of special units.

Sandinista forces also have put special emphasis on striking at rebel supply lines to prevent guerrilla troops from remaining for long periods inside Nicaragua, he explained.

Rebel leaders have told visitors to their camps in Honduras that they have had trouble resupplying forces inside Nicaragua. But they attributed this to lack of consistent ammunition deliveries and adequate maintenance of aircraft used to make drops. This, they explained, was a result of money shortages.

Adolfo Calero, the chief Democratic Force political figure, said the organization has raised more than $5 million since the congressional fund cutoff last spring. But aides of the rebel military chief, Enrique Bermudez, said they have been unable to continue supply drops at the same pace as when CIA funds and logistic help were available.

After barring further CIA aid a year ago, Congress voted last fall to make $14 million more available to finance rebel forces, but only on the condition that the funding be approved this spring in another vote.

On Thursday, President Reagan proposed that the $14 million be used only for humanitarian assistance should Nicaragua begin talks with the rebels. Managua rejected this approach, and Congress is to vote on the money this month.

Before the cutoff last spring, the CIA had provided rebel forces with a sum estimated by congressional sources at $80 million since 1981.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN].

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, last night I quoted President John F. Kennedy, when he said that "The trumpet summons us again to bear the burden of the long twilight struggle." How did that young American hear the trumpet of liberty. Well, President Kennedy sent the Peace Corps to Colombia for one. Then, President Kennedy sent economic aid to the nation of Colombia when it was in trouble. But President John F. Kennedy also sent Green Berets as advisers to Colombia. He understood the nature of the enemies of liberty. One of the best moments in what I thought was a quality debate on this House floor yesterday came from a gentleman on the majority side of the aisle. He delivered his remarks as well as President Reagan has ever communicated with this House of Representatives. He commanded our attention. Obviously he spoke from his heart and his keen mind. It was stirring the way in which the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ROEMER, delivered his speech. And here is part of what he had to say about the Hamilton-Barnes amendment. He said "The resolution does nothing. It huffs, it puffs, but nothing happens."

He went on. "We pay people to leave Nicaragua * * * it is finally the ultimate copout. On the battlefield of freedom it is the old 'check's in the mail speech'." These ringing words are Churchillian. And that check is not even a bilateral check that we will get credit for because we are giving the money to a terrified, politicized local Red Cross.

Now, I have seen the author of this amendment, Mr. HAMILTON, flash his fangs for freedom on the Middle East and on other issues. I know he can be tough. But here in totally uncharacteristic style he lays down like a doormat and tells the Communists in Managua that they won, here walk on our face. I know the cosponsor Mr. BARNES has a big heart. But I do not recall seeing him ever flash his fangs in righteous indignation at Communist terror anywhere in this hemisphere. But he does speak out strongly on human rights, and I repeat, he has a heart. But in this case, with this amendment, he puts his Neville Chamberlain bumpershoot under his armpit and, also, lays down on the ground and invites his face to be walked upon by the comandantes.

Now, one of the things that the gentleman from Louisiana said last night was that he would not slap the President in the face, that he would stand with him on that tough vote last night. Forty Republicans, however, slapped the President egregiously. I understand someone in the White House said go ahead, hit us in the kisser, it's OK, we are going to lay down on this one and we are going to fight later on for the Michel amendment. The Michel amendment has teeth, not very big ones, but it is the way to go right now in the spirit of compromise, because even the other body had to be given a personal assurance from the President that the money would be used for humanitarian purposes before they would give him a 53-vote victory.

Let us analyze out of respect for history, because we are commanded by the statutes in front of the Archives to study the past, what would have happened if this Congress in 1947, when Greece and Turkey were begging for aid to fight communism, if we had given the money to the Greek Red Cross. First of all, one of the Members who voted to support the President last night, Mr. CLAUDE PEPPER of Florida, voted against giving money to Greece and Turkey in 1947.

We should all heed his advice by vote and profit from his wisdom gained over almost four decades of experience watching Communists break promises. I have here a May 5, 1947, article from Time magazine. It says that the money to save Greece from communism was delayed for weeks after Senate passage because of bitter bickering in the House of Representatives. Of course people were dying in Greece during that bickering.

The most interesting thing about that 1947 debate on aid to save Greece, a country then with a population about equal to today's Honduras and Nicaragua combined, was how much money was voted to help freedom. Greece is barely reaching 10 million citizens now, three decades later. So for a small land mass, low population country in mortal peril, how much money did our generous Nation provide? $300 million in 1947 dollars. The economic aid to Greece was $150 million, and the military aid was exactly the same—$150 million; $100 million went to Turkey. In 1947 dollars that is billions that we were giving to Greece and Turkey. And now we renege on only $14 million. Do you really grasp what $14 million buys in defense? Well, that amount of money would not buy one single F-16 fighter. Not one, because an F-16 comes in now at just over $15 million. An Abrams M-1 tank, is over $2 million each. Way over. Precisely $2,553,700. What the President wants in food for the democratic forces is less in dollars than six M-1 tanks in defense dollars. If the Managua government continues on its Communist course this early $14 million assist to the refugee families of freedom fighters may turn out to be the security bargain of the century.

The comandantes are laughing in our faces over the Managua radio today because of last night's vote. They appreciated those who slapped the President last night. They would love to see this pussy cat amendment send money only to the Red Cross. Of course they do not want the Michel amendment to pass later today. If we are going to truly keep their attention vote for the Michel amendment. Some of these comandantes have had brothers or wives that were killed by Somoza's Guardia. They are dedicated to totalitarian rule and bound by a blood debt. The way to really make them truly happy is to vote for Hamilton. I want them worried not happy. I will vote for the Michel amendment. If you want to cover your political assets vote for both. But I suggest showing some true grit in the name of freedom. Humanitarian aid for those who are willing to die for freedom is the very least we can do.

I submit for the RECORD the May 1947 Time magazine article on Greek/Turkish aid.

WHAT IS PAST IS PROLOGUE

If Congress fails, to act, aggression will get the green light and the rest of the world, including America, will get the red light.

The way Sen. Arthur Vandenberg defined the issue last week, the Truman Doctrine was sure to win Senate approval. However, reluctant some senators might be, they concurred with Vandenberg's warning against "the cost of noncompliance." Even the opposition floor leader, Sen. Edwin C. Johnson, who charged the $400,000,000 program to bulwark Greece and Turkey against Communist Russia was "in reality a declaration of war," knew he was fighting a losing battle.

Once two weeks of soul-searching debate ended on last Tuesday, April 22, the Senate voted 67-23, to authorize the Greek-Turkish aid. Voting Aye were 35 Republicans and 32 Democrats. The Noes comprised a rare alliance of sixteen Republicans (mostly Midwestern isolationists), four conservative Democrats (Johnson, Kenneth McKellar, Harry F. Byrd, and W. Lee O'Daniel), and three Wallace-minded left wing Democrats (Claude Pepper, James E. Murray, and Glen H. Taylor).

Specifically, the Senate thus voted to: (1) spend $150 million on Greek economic rehabilitation, as much for Greek military aid, and $100,000,000 for Turkish military aid, all before July 1, 1948; (2) furnish military equipment; (3) send military missions and civilian supervisory staffs; and (4) authorize the United Nations to take over the program, should it be willing and able.

Broadly, the Senate's vote was a vote against the traditional ideas of isolationism and neutrality, a vote in favor of containing Communism, a vote for shouldering international burdens formerly carried by the British Empire, a vote to support President Truman's plan "to help free peoples to maintain their free institutions and their national integrity against aggressive movements that seek to impose upon them totalitarian regimes.

But although Secretary of State George C. Marshall attached "the highest order of urgency to immediate passage," the Greek-Turkish aid ran into delay in the House because of bitter bickering over a separate bill to provide $350,000,000 for post-UNRRA relief to hungry peoples.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, it was my bad fortune last night to come to the well immediately after the eloquence of the gentleman from Louisiana, and this afternoon to follow my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Let me say at the outset that we are talking today, right now, about the Hamilton alternative. I have heard BARNES' name mentioned. There is no debate time allocated under the rule for the Barnes amendment. So we are addressing the Hamilton alternative. This is therefore the key vote.

A lot has been said about the money issue. I think it is overstated. It is the context in which this whole issue came before us, but we are talking about the process of developing a policy toward Central America, particularly Nicaragua, and the money is really a secondary importance. The Secretary of State stated that the refugee money was not even needed.

I submit that the arguments that say that the refugee money will promote Contra refugees is extraneous because the language in the bill is permissive; the President need not allocate 5 cents of the $14 million if he does not want to.

This measure is called weak, a huff-puff. Last night I addressed the House, and I am not going to repeat my remarks here. I submit it is by far the strongest of the alternatives with far more teeth in it than anything else that is before us.

What I want to dwell on, Mr. Chairman, however, is something that I was not aware of when I talked last night, quite late, to this body saying that I thought that the Hamilton alternative expressed the policy that we all shared. What I did not have before me was the eloquent letter that the President had delivered to Senator DOLE that afternoon prior to the vote in the Senate.

My colleagues, obviously there are differences in that letter with respect to the allocation of money, but in many important respects, this letter tracks the Hamilton alternative. This, my friends, is the President's statement of what he is going to do in Nicaragua. What we did last night, what the Senate did yesterday is irrelevant.

It has nothing to do with what the President says he is going to do.

In his letter, he talks about the resumption of bilateral talks between the United States and Nicaragua; it tracks Hamilton. He says that these talks must be in support of the Contadora process. The Hamilton alternative is the only vehicle before us that comes out statutorily in support of the Contadora process.

He says the response to bad faith by the Sandinistas will be diplomatic efforts. Compare this with HAMILTON'S call for immediate multinational pressure on Nicaragua to address our concerns. The President condemns atrocities by both sides; compare Hamilton's language on human rights.

The report to the Congress that the President says he will give includes progress in achieving peace which is contained in the Hamilton alternative reporting requirement. An accounting of the funds obligated is contained in the Hamilton alternative. The President writes: "It may include such recommendations I deem appropriate," an invitation contained in the Hamilton alternative. Finally, a request for expedited handling, which is spelled out in detail in the Hamilton alternative.

My colleagues, this, again, is what the President says he is going to do. Hamilton says what the President says he is going to do. If we do not pass Hamilton, we will not go to conference with the Senate with any language that is near to what the President says is the policy of the United States. We will have wasted this entire week contributing nothing toward the development of a policy in Central America and with respect to Nicaragua.

Only if we go with the Hamilton alternative will we be able to come out of the conference with something that approximates what the President wishes, a statutory expression of what the President wishes to do in that part of the world.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH].

Mr. GINGRICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, the preceding speaker is very distinguished, but to use the President's letter to defend explicitly what the President opposes is a bit much. The Barnes-Hamilton resolution is a remarkable document worthy of opposition. It is a collection of inaccurate history, muddled analysis, misleading platitudes, and remarkably strange proposals.

This is only a nine-page document. Earlier the gentleman from New Mexico, who I had yielded to yesterday, would not yield to me, but I was going to comment on two things he had said. First, he had described that the Sandinistas are bad too, that they violate human rights too. However, Barnes-Hamilton unilaterally disarms the freedom fighters. Somehow, it does not get a Soviet-Cuban agreement to disarm the Sandinistas.

Second, he said we ought to give our money to, and I am quoting the exact word, "respectable" international organization. To which I would have asked, "Is there no American Government agency which is respectable?" Is it so impossible to trust your own government, to respect your own government, to have any belief in the American Government, that you are going to believe in the United Nations for Pete's sake?

You are going to turn to the United Nations as one of the two options? An institution increasingly dominated by anti-American sentiment, by dictatorships and by people who, on occasion, can hardly be described as favoring our values?

But this nine-page document is worth studying in more detail because it is a classic study of "ostrichism," which is, on occasion, bipartisan. Which does involve much of the State Department, and which infects much of the academic community and news media. This, however, is an extreme example of ostrichism with amnesia, in that the ostriches frankly cannot even remember their own history.

Let me walk through it. "The United States desires peace in Nicaragua and throughout Central America." I agree. "We should encourage all combatants to establish a cease-fire." Well, in the first place, if you read Marxism-Leninism, that is a little tricky since they say flatly they cannot concede any kind of cease-fire with the West. In the second place, if you look at the way Barnes-Hamilton operates, we strip the defenders of Western values, while the Cubans and Soviets keep pouring in support for the people who would oppress Western values.

It talks about an internal Nicaragua conflict; about nuturing democratic institutions in that country. Promoting peace and stability; wonderful language. But let us look at it in the context of Marxism-Leninism. I just say on page 2, paragraph 3, is one of the finest examples of ostrichism in modern American history. "Combatants on both sides of the conflict in Nicaragua have expressed in words their goals for peace and democracy in Nicaragua." Adolf Hitler must somewhere be burning in hell, wishing he had lived two generations later so he could manipulate Americans instead of Englishmen.

Expressed in words? How mindless do you have to be to visit Ortega who says he is a Marxist-Leninist, to not read the Grenada Documents where they say specifically, "Our job is to lie to the Americans." To not read Arce's speech where he says specifically, "Our job is to lie to the Americans." To talk about Communist words, goals of peace. Andropov used those words; he was the head of the KGB and locked people up, and put them in insane asylums. Adolf Hitler used those words. How incredibly ostrich-like do you have to be?

They talk about disturbing trends in Nicaragua. It says:

> The Sandinista government's close military ties with Cuba, the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies and the continuing military buildup is a bad trend.

Now, yesterday I had weapons here on the floor that came from Bulgaria, North Vietnam, Libya; we might mention the Palestine Liberation Organization. There are a lot of people involved in Nicaragua who are bad people who hate America, who want to destroy freedom. What do they promise to do? This is a wonderful example of ostrichism. Page 3, paragraph 5:

> The Congress will continue to monitor developments in Nicaragua.

Can you see Ortega now turning to his Cuban and Soviet advisers going, "Well, my many friends who have been down here, who I visit with regularly are going to monitor us." I would say to my Democratic friends: We have evidence in the Grenada Documents that at least one Democratic Congressman actually submitted documents to the Grenadian Government which they thought they were supposed to edit.

As you monitor Nicaragua under this threatening, decisive Barnes-Hamilton offer, are you going to let them edit it? Are you going to include their advice? Are you going to sit down and negotiate with them over what the report ought to say? Are you going to really be tough with them and say, "You know, gosh, fellas." Remember the Comandante Ortega letter a year ago? They have not done a single thing that you wrote them and asked them to do. What are you doing in response to their intransigence? You are unilaterally disarming freedom in Central America.

This is your toughness? These are your threats?

Let us go on. Let me just say two last things. In light of our great experience with communism in Angloa, we are now on page 5 imposing, in effect, the Clark amendment for Central America to stop freedom fighters anywhere in Central America from getting our kind of help from us.

On page 6, we talk about refugees. I just want to make two final comments. First, it is nice for the people, who, in the past having undermined freedom, saw as a consequence of their votes to cut off aid to freedom boat people, refugees from Afghanistan, refugees from Vietnam, refugees from Cuba, to now say, "Well, who do we not in advance recognize there are going to be lots of refugees?"

There are only two things wrong with your acceptance of refugees. One is you do not admit honestly in Barnes-Hamilton what will really happen which is the refugees are going to come to America, and they are going to cost a lot more than $10 million.

□ 1430

Second, in what I think is the most unbelievable statement I have seen recently, you in effect say you despise America and the American Government so much you would rather give the money to the United Nations Relief Commissioner than have the American Government handle it. It is the most incredible proposal I have seen in a long time, and as I said earlier, I think anybody who votes for it could wear an "I Despise America" button with a great sense of dignity.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am for our country first. That does not mean always sending in the troops. There has been a terrible breakdown in bipartisanship in foreign policy these last few years, and that breakdown is only furthered by the wild charges that are thrown about here, and also the distortions by opponents of the Hamilton resolution.

For example, the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Georgia, they read from page 3 and attack the resolution for lacking any teeth. They do not refer to the further actions that are threatened in this resolution if certain conditions do not happen. They do not refer to the fact there is a reference to supporting OAS sanctions. They do not refer to the fact that this Congress would consider the imposition of trade sanctions.

Are we serious about considering such actions. The answer is yes. Are there circumstances under which we would support such actions? The answer to that is yes.

Proponents of the Michel resolution talk in terms of humanitarian assistance, but in truth it represents a continuation of a policy of undeclared war.

Mr. Chairman, here is the basic issue as I see it: Should the United States, not de jure but de facto, declare war today on the Government of Nicaragua? Those who support the policy of such declaration have not carried the burden of proving the wisdom of that policy. I am pleased to join other colleagues on a bipartisan basis in supporting the Hamilton resolution. It will help to revive a spirit of bipartisanship that has been lacking in foreign policy under this administration, and the lack of which is causing, for this country and the world, unfortunate consequences.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield at this time 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING], a member of the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Mr. GOODLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, as colleagues on both sides of the aisle know, I have not supported covert aid to Nicaragua before I was on the Intelligence Committee, while I was on the Intelligence Committee, or after I was on the Intelligence Committee, although I was a strong supporter of making sure overtly that, as a matter of fact, the Sandinistas could not export revolution and could not be a conduit through which arms would flow into El Salvador.

However, having said that, I realize we have a real moral and ethical obligation to supply humanitarian aid to the Contras. Why are the Contras there? The answer is simple. We, the Congress of the United States, saw to it that as a matter of fact they are there, doing what we asked them to do; not the President of the United States, not the CIA, but as a matter of fact, the Congress of the United States. And do not tell me you did not know what they were going to do. I read all that testimony when I was on the Intelligence Committee.

There were two issues, two issues all the time, from the very beginning in what you read: to have them turn inward and interdict arms, in that order and in that importance. I think it is important to understand that.

So we have a moral and an ethical responsibility now to provide humanitarian aid.

I wish I could support the initiative of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON]. I have a great deal of respect for him. On the surface, it looks like it could be rather attractive.

First of all, it talks about aid for those who are refugees and I would like to get some aid to Costa Rica, which is having refugee after refugee after refugee land on their border and come into their country, 13-, 14-, 15-, 16-year-old kids who do not want to serve in the Sandinista army. They do not want to serve because they do not believe what they are doing and they do not want to serve because, as a matter of fact, they will be fighting their brothers, their fathers, and even their grandfathers.

It looks good on the surface because, of course, it gives us all an out. If we are wrong, myself included, because we did not go ahead with military aid, and if a few years from now we discover that that was positively the wrong thing to do, we have an out, because in this resolution, or in this amendment, we say things like, "We are not very happy with what you are doing as a Sandinista government. We think you are misbehaving. We would like you to change your ways, and if you do not change your ways we will have the President do something else, or we will ask OAS or we will get the Contadora process involved, and we will really do things."

The Contadora process. We are asking countries who have more problems than they know what to do with, and they are going to have more and more as revolution spreads throughout the area, and we are asking them to somehow do something about bringing order in that particular area.

I will send money to do something about Colombia, but that something is to try to prevent them from, as a matter of fact, sending all sorts of drugs into this country, but let us not be duped by what appears to be a good solution. Let us show the world, as a matter of fact, that we will be ethical and we will be moral. We put them there and we will provide humanitarian aid, and we can do that, as a matter of fact, with Michel II.

The Speaker for 10 years while I was here used to talk about "Give one to America. Do things for America. Put America first." Well, in the 3 months that I have been here this year it is rather disgusting because I have a feeling we now have a different banner: "Win one for the Tipper." That seems to be the name of the game. Well, we should not be winning one for the Tipper, we should not be winning one for the Gipper. We ought to go back to what we heard about the first 10 years. Let us do something for America. Let us put America on top and show that, as a matter of fact, we have a moral responsibility, we have an ethical responsibility. We put them there. Now let us support them with humanitarian aid and we can do that with Michel II.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH].

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, first I would like to compliment my leader, Mr. MICHEL, for crafting a compromise that is preferable to the Senate-passed approach and represents at least a half victory for critics of American policy in Central America.

Why, then, would I argue it is not good enough and that the approach of Mr. HAMILTON and Mr. BARNES should prevail in today's debate?

The primary issue before us today is not political judgment about what's happening in the region, where American citizens are honestly divided; the primary issue is one of due process, the method by which decisions are made in our democratic society.

Here, Vietnam analogies are facile. There is great disagreement in this country about what we should have done in that struggle.

But the main lessons of Vietnam do not relate to reassessments of policies but how those policies were determined.

In this regard, the profoundest issue before us is not that of policy, but that of the constitutional process.

If you believe the constitutional process has been scrupulously followed in Nicaragua, that the Boland amendment which specifically proscribed attempts to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua was not violated, then vote for the Michel substitute.

If you believe the rule of law is advanced by the U.S. decision to withdraw from jurisdiction of the World Court, vote for the Michel substitute.

If you believe U.S. policy should not involve invoking the Rio Treaty or U.N. Charter, vote for the Michel substitute.

If on policy grounds you believe humanitarian aid should be of such a nature as to have the effect of provisioning troops involved in or preparing for armed conflict, vote for the Michel substitute.

If, on the other hand, you believe the Constitution stipulates that war making authority is designed to be the joint responsibility of Congress and the executive, then vote for the Hamilton-Barnes amendment.

If you believe the responsibility of Congress is to redress humanitarian problems in the region regardless of whether recipients are Contras, and that aid should be administered neutrally by the International Committee of the Red Cross and the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, vote for the Hamilton-Barnes amendment.

In the final measure, the issue before this body is primarily a constitutional one. As a Republican member of this body—one who holds a conservative view on constitutional issues—I would urge my colleagues to pay heed above all to this issue of due process. It, in the final measure, is more important than the different policy perspectives we all share.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, so that there will not be any misconstruction of the President's position on Barnes-Hamilton, I would like to submit for the attention of the Members of the House a letter addressed to the minority leader, Mr. BOB MICHEL, dated today, April 24, 1985, which reads in part:

The proposal to be offered by Mr. Barnes and Mr. Hamilton would divert funds from existing economic assistance and refugee accounts for humanitarian assistance to refugees outside Nicaragua and for the expenses of implementing an eventual Contadora agreement. Members of Congress should be under no illusion about this proposal. Its adoption would damage our national security and foreign policy interests. By providing a financial inducement for members of the resistance to leave Nicaragua and become refugees in other countries, it relieves pressure on the Sandinistas while, at the same time, it increases the burdens imposed on the neighboring democracies. As a result, fragile democracies would be weakened, their economic recovery would be stalled, their security would be diminished—and the civil war in Nicaragua would go on.

Mr. Chairman, the Barnes-Hamilton proposal may be a bipartisan effort, but its authors may well have spared themselves the time. It really does absolutely nothing to satisfy the very real problems of Nicaragua.

The people of the United States may often feel that Central America is unimportant to us, but sooner or later they are going to come to realize that Central America and we are on the same continent. We are neighbors, our histories are intertwined, and our futures are inseparable. What happens today in Central America could very well foretell events in the United States tomorrow.

Similarly, what we do or fail to do in Central America today directly affects our mutual relationship, as well as our combined futures.

Those who have opposed the President's policies in Central America were wrong when they said we should have pulled out of El Salvador 5 years ago. They are wrong again in saying we should pull out of Nicaragua today. The United States may have made many mistakes in the region in the past, but its policy over the last 6 years represents a conscientious effort to remedy those mistakes.

Support for the freedom fighters, whether through provision for military hardware or humanitarian assistance, is consistent with U.S. objectives to preserve democracy and freedom in Central America. The Nicaraguan Sandinista government has rejected every opportunity to bring peace and freedom to its people ever since the fall of Somoza, and they give us absolutely no indication that their intentions have changed in the slightest in recent months. Just 2 weeks ago they pushed Nicaraguan terrorists into Honduras, smuggling arms and intending to foster an armed rebellion against the existing government.

Mr. Chairman, for the United States to fail at this time to support the only people in Nicaragua who espouse free elections, pluralistic government, and an end to tyranny and oppression is to tell Central America and the world that the Monroe Doctrine is dead, and that the United States will accept any threat to its security that the Soviet empire wishes to impose in the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. Chairman, the Barnes-Hamilton proposal is a farce. It does absolutely nothing to foster democracy in Nicaragua or in Central America.

As an answer to Communist aggression, it offers an incentive, an inducement to innocent Nicaraguan citizens to flee the offending tyrants in their homeland and to accept and depend upon U.S. refugee assistance in other nations. Furthermore, it provides wholly unneeded money for diplomatic cocktail parties and the like for participants in the Contadora process.

I am not sure that the 3,500 political prisoners who are being tortured and jailed under subhuman conditions in Nicaragua will thank us if Barnes-Hamilton passes. Neither do I think that the Indians whose villages have been pillaged and burned, or the mothers, the wives, and the families of those who have been impressed into the national army, or the relatives of those who have been summarily executed, will have much good to say about us.

But Daniel Ortega, Miguel D'Escoto, and the other members of the Marxist junta will be absolutely delighted. And I am sure they will have quite a party on us tonight. But they will get over it soon enough, for, after all, tomorrow they will have to go back to work, for we must remember they promised to spread revolution throughout Central America.

Mr. Chairman, let me say to my colleagues that I hope we will defeat this proposal and, at the very least, vote for Michel II.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LUKEN].

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hamilton substitute.

The administration has been sounding the alarm on Central America for some time now.

But has our covert military involvement against the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua contributed to stability in Central America or advanced the peace process? I think not. It does one thing, it ensures more bloodshed.

By adopting the Hamilton substitute, we can place the United States on the path toward a more constructive role in seeking a negotiated peace in the region.

By adopting the Hamilton substitute, we will send a signal to those countries participating in the Contadora peace process that the United States wants to make a positive contribution to the peace process and strongly opposes the continuing military escalation in the region. This is the only resolution which moves directly to support Contadora.

All Americans want to see an end to the violence in Central America and the restoration of stability in the region. And we want the people of Central America to have an alternative to dictatorial government and military conflict.

The Hamilton substitute adopts a carrot-and-stick approach that makes clear congressional concern about the Sandinistas' close links to Cuba and the Soviet Union, their violations of human rights, and their efforts to destabilize the region. These are specified along with removal of a military adviser and the offer of economic and development programs.

But it also places the United States squarely on the side of the Contadora group of nations that are seeking a peaceful solution of the conflict in Central America.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the genetleman from New Jersey [Mr. COURTER].

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding the time to me.

The Hamilton amendment that we are debating right now, for those Members who during the debate have forgotten the main thrust of it, does simply two things: No. 1, it gives $10 million in humanitarian aid to refugees outside the country of Nicaragua; and, No. 2, it gives $4 million for the implementation of a treaty that has not been negotiated, that has not been worked out.

Looking at it on its face, but for the $4 million in appropriations to enforce a process that has not been completed, it is not a bad amendment. It deals with money to refugees. If the problem in Nicaragua was a drought, if the problem was a great flood, if the problem was an earthquake and, therefore, there were a lot of refugees outside the borders of Nicaragua, I could understand voting for $10 million, or $14 million, or $25 million in humanitarian aid, but that is not the problem.

That type of humanitarian aid could be dealt with by a separate bill, a supplemental, increased appropriations to the United Nations, increased appropriations for a foreign aid bill.

The problem is the fact that the situation in Nicaragua is inside. It is internal. The problem is not the fact that there are refugees. That is an unfortunate result, and a terrible consequence, and a tragic result of what is going on inside the country, which is a lack of liberty, a lack of freedom, a closed society, no right to petition their government, increased censorship, no independent judiciary, the lack of habeas corpus, a growing Sandinista army which is now 15 times the size of the army of Mr. Somoza; involvement of the PLO, involvement of the Libyans; that is what the problem is and that is the flaw in the Hamilton amendment. It does not address the problem which is internal, inside the country of Nicaragua.

Indeed, we are distraught as to what is happening with that country. The Soviet bloc advisers, the involvement of the Palestinian Liberation Organizatio, the subjugation of free trade unions, the devastation of the Miskito Indians, a lack of free press, that has all been mentioned before. We have seen all the evidence, but many of us still miss the forest for the trees. Some of us believe that these are separate problems that can be attacked separately. Indeed, they cannot.

The central problem is Marxism-Leninism. The problem is the fact that they are now controlling more every day the internal policies and structure in that country. There is one single major problem in Nicaragua, communism. There is one solution and that is internal reconciliation through the democratic process, living up to the commitments made in 1979.

Mr. Chairman, we have a moral obligation in Nicaragua. This is an obligation to see that the promises of the Nicaraguan revolution of 1979, of democracy, of pluralism, of civil rights and justice, are fulfilled. We took this obligation on ourselves in 1979 and we must not forget that fact.

In our recognition of the Sandinistas in 1979, what this Congress did, what this Government did was make a conditional recognition. It was not carte blanche regardless of how the Sandinistas acted. It was conditional. It was based on the fact that they would fulfill the promises of the revolution of 1979 and in fact they did not.

If we do not do something, if we do not assist, if we do not give some signal that we will assist the democratic freedom fighters in that country, it will give two gigantic signals throughout the entire world. First, that the United States will allow a Marxist-Leninist totalitarian dictatorship in our own hemisphere.

Second, the story will be that we cared enough about Nicaragua under Somoza, we cared enough about Nicaragua in 1979 and the Nicaraguan people to help eliminate Somoza but we do not care enough about the Nicaraguan people in 1985 to help eliminate totalitarianism. That would be a shame.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I read earlier today a statement of Alexandr Solzhenitsyn in a different context. I think that quotation by him is more relevant today than earlier:

> You have the impression that democracies can last forever. But you know nothing about it. Democracies are lost islands in the immense river of history. The water is always rising.

Democracy is fragile. It deserves our support.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES Of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, my complaint about our involvement in Nicaragua is that there does not seem to be any coherence to the policy there. I was just visiting with a group from Oklahoma outside this Chamber and they said:

> How do you explain the United States' incoherent policy, on the one hand being the largest purchaser of Nicaraguan products from a government we supposedly despise, and on the other hand taking American tax dollars to try to overthrow that government through military means?

These same Oklahomans said:

> It doesn't appear that we really have used the diplomatic pressure that is at our command, nor have we used the economic pressure to try to bring democracy to that country.

Well, that is my concern also and that is what really was behind the development of the Hamilton alternative. This proposal is a genuine bipartisan effort to chart a middle course between a military option and getting out entirely.

What this alternative does is to set up a series of incentives and disincentives or threats, if you will, that can be imposed by our Government after we have had an opportunity to measure progress toward peace and democracy.

The whole purpose is to try to bring some semblance of peace to that wartorn country immediately by having a cease-fire and by getting the warring parties back to the conference table.

This alternative, unlike the Michel alternative, sets forth a measurement by which we can judge whether or not progress is being made toward peace in a framework of a policy, a sensible policy, toward Central America. If progress is being made, there are several incentives that the alternative of Mr. HAMILTON says Congress will consider: economic development, agricultural assistance, Peace Corps assistance for Nicaragua, and if progress is not made, the same fast-track procedure that we are dealing with this week will be available to the President and to the Congress to revisit the entire aid question, including military aid.

Furthermore, we will be able to add to the military option a whole series of economic and trade sanctions that will be a disincentive to the Sandinista government, if indeed they have no interest in moving toward peace and stability in that country.

This is not an easy question. I have discussed it with several of my friends on the other side of the aisle. We want the same thing and I think we are sincerely trying to find the best way to get there. That is my concern and I deeply believe that the Hamilton alternative is the best way to get a cease-fire and a movement toward peace in Nicaragua.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt very much there is much to be said on a matter of policy in this area that has not been said in the course of the 10 hours yesterday, much less earlier today.

I do think, however, that it is in order to direct the attention of Members to the two substitutes that are before us, one now and one that will follow, because there are some extraordinarily significant differences.

I address my remarks in particular to Members on my side who may be in some doubt as to which of the two they would vote for, or, in many cases, as to whether to vote for either of the two.

We heard a moment ago a quote from a letter, I believe dated today, from the President, in which he was quoted as saying that the Hamilton-Barnes proposition would "damage our national security."

Let me suggest to the Members that one could only believe that if indeed one felt that military assistance to the Contras was necessary, and that, may I say, is precisely one of the issues that is at stake between the Hamilton-Barnes substitute on the one hand and the Michel on the other.

I urge Members' attention to that. I urge your attention to section 2 of the Barnes-Hamilton proposition. This is at the heart of the matter and I am quite certain it is what the President has in mind when, from his perspective, he argues that adoption of the Hamilton-Barnes matter would "damage our security."

Section 2 in the Democratic alternative reads in part as follows:

> The prohibition contained in the Department of Defense Appropriations Act of 1985 shall continue in effect without regard to fiscal year until the Congress enacts a joint resolution repealing that prohibition.

□ 1500

Mr. Chairman, that is the so-called Boland amendment. That is the provision which stands at the moment in law and which prohibits U.S. military assistance to the Contras. But it stands in law only in the current appropriations bill for the Department of Defense and will therefore expire on the last day of September.

The President's original proposition provided for military aid 2 months from now. Now, the only difference between what the President initially requested which this House rejected last night, and the alternative to be offered later today by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] is that the case of the President's original request we would have had to have waited 2 months for military aid to be resumed, while under the Michel amendment we will have to wait 5 months for the existing statute to expire, as it will at the end of this fiscal year.

In the Democratic alternative there is a continuation of that prohibition indefinitely in law, a law which this House and this Congress would have to act affirmatively to repeal in order for there to be a resumption of U.S. military assistance through any other channel.

Absent this provision, if we were not to adopt the Democratic alternative, then on October 1 the President would become free, through a variety of means available to him, through covert funding, to resume military assistance without any other action on the part of this House.

That, it seems to me, is vital difference number one for those Members who are debating in their own minds whether or not to support one of these alternatives and, if so, which one.

No. 2, let me refer you to the text of the Michel resolution: "$14 million made available to the Nicaraguan democratic opposition for humanitarian assistance," and they exclude arms, munitions, or other weapons of war. Look at that first loophole. You could drive literally and figuratively trucks through that. Trucks are not weapons of war. All kinds of logistic support could go.

But section 2 is the crucial one. It reads as follows: "The Administrator of AID shall have such powers as may be necessary to carry out section 1," that is the $14 million, "notwithstanding any other provision of law relating to the administration, disbursement or use of funds."

Read that once, read it twice, and what it says is that, if he so chooses, the Administrator of AID could turn the money over to the Central Intelligence Agency, which is precisely what the President has made clear he wishes to do, and they could administer it. Who else, I ask you, is in place in Nicaragua to administer the funds? Surely not AID. They are not operating at the moment, as I understand it, in Nicaragua. And only, God knows, the CIA has some kind of infrastructure through which these funds could be administered, and given the wording of the Michel resolution that could very clearly be the case.

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic substitute expresses justifiable concern about the domestic and foreign policies of the Government of Nicaragua without committing the United States to policies that would also be unwise.

It would put into place a policy that would provide genuine incentives for a negotiated solution to the difficulties that exist between the United States and Nicaragua; and to the problems that divide the Nicaraguans themselves.

The Hamilton resolutions would not bring us into conflict with international law or with the publicly stated views of Latin American governments. I think it would set the United States on a course that should be welcomed not only by democratic governments within the region, but also by democratic individuals who are presently opposed to many policies of the regime in Managua, but who are reluctant, as well, to become associated with the Somozist military leadership of the FDN.

I am not convinced that any congressional action with respect to Nicaragua is required. Our commitment to Contadora, to democracy and social justice in Latin America, to international law, and to the peaceful resolution of disputes should not be in doubt. We should not have to restate our position on these issues. But the policies of this administration have cast doubts about our national commitment to these values, and the Hamilton substitute should relieve that concern.

I think we are all well aware that the question of military aid for the Contras is not dead. But I am confident this House will never approve such aid unless the Contras reform themselves dramatically, and unless the Government of Nicaragua begins to act in a manner requiring a regionally sanctioned military response. I do not believe either event is likely. The Hamilton substitute will permit us to consider future Presidential requests for military aid on an expedited basis, and while I don't believe this ought to be necessary, I do believe that future events will make the military approach even less supportable as time goes on.

For these reasons, I urge adoption of the substitute.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding.

I just want to address myself to colleagues who feel strongly about no aid for Nicaragua, no matter what the circumstances. I think if you are opposed to the President's military plans for Nicaragua and the use of taxpayer's money to implement those plans, you really have to vote for the Hamilton amendment. In my judgment, and very clearly, this is the only way we will help to defeat the President's bid to have that kind of military intervention.

Certainly vote no on Michel which would, in fact, or possibly the money might be channeled because of the ambiguity of the language, it could possibly be challenged through the CIA. And I think we want to be out of that whole situation.

So I urge my colleagues who are tempted to vote no across the board to vote "yes" on Hamilton and "no" on Michel.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS.]

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, although I was positive about what I was doing yesterday, I am not so sure about what is happening today.

First of all, I have some grave reservations about us being in Nicaragua even for those so-called peaceful purposes. The reasons are several.

First of all, to offer sanctuary from the war in Nicaragua will cause a great amount of migration among Nicaraguans to Honduras where they may be recruited through intimidation by the Contras. Indeed, it has already been documented that this has been done in certain numbers.

Next, all proposals for humanitarian assistance make no differences between Contras and displaced civilians; therefore, we have the same problems as the Michel substitute to support the Contras, a proposal which is contrary to our long-term interests in the region.

Finally, if I vote for Barnes or vote for Hamilton, who is going to vote with me "No" at the end? We have already voted, and I would like somebody to talk with me about this. We do not need to be sending any kind of joint resolution to the other body to be compromised in conference where everybody that supported Barnes will end up sorry that they ever did it. Why do we not just terminate these proceedings now? We have debated the Republican-Reagan joint resolution. It was passed in the other body; it was defeated here yesterday. I propose we do not go any further.

Now, I need somebody to join me and the members of the Black Caucus who are going to vote no on final passage. And I hope that we will consider these problems.

The Barnes joint resolution is, quite frankly, defective as it stands now. I am hoping that we will get some support about this one way or the other.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SAVAGE].

Mr. SAVAGE. I just want to explain that while I am going to vote for the Hamilton substitute, it is only to have some basis to defeat the Michel substitute in this committee. I do not want the Michel substitute to pass, for it is worse.

But, mind you, the Hamilton substitute is also wrong.

We won the victory last night when we said no to the President. There is no need for any further compromise.

The Democrats must not be confused over the rejection of the Reagan premises. We have language in the Hamilton substitute that justifies the kind, rationalizes the kind of continued interference that the Reagan administration proposes.

So when we go into the House today after this committee report I am going to vote against what I hope will pass in committee. I am going to vote against it and the Hamilton substitute. There should not be a dime laid out in any way of our taxpayers' dollars involving us in the situation in Nicaragua. Let the Nicaraguans decide on their own destiny.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. LONG].

Mrs. LONG. Mr. Chairman, recently, President Alfonsin was recognized for his achievements in restoring democracy to Argentina. He was the recipient of the first Democracy Award.

In President Alfonsin's address to a joint session of Congress, he said that militarism is not a solution to the problems of Central America and the Contadora process must be strengthened to achieve peace in the region.

The people of Louisiana and those of Latin America have always enjoyed a unique relationship—a relationship built on mutual respect, trade and a common desire for progress.

Militarism is not working. Furthermore, the continued use of military force in Central America alienates Latins and threatens U.S. markets in the Western Hemisphere.

Louisiana farmers sell tons of rice to Latin America. Enactment of the Barnes-Hamilton amendment would support a political framework to establish and maintain democracy and preserve the opportunity of Louisiana farmers to promote their products in Latin America.

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I applaud the remarks of the gentlewoman from Louisiana who just spoke a minute ago pointing out a very important fact that heretofore has been ignored in this debate. I first took notice of the threat that our current policy is having to the markets in Central America about a year ago when the President of Mexico, Miguel de la Madrid, said that the U.S. policy in Central America of naval operations and military maneuvers is alienating the Latin American people.

My colleagues, there are 500 million Latin Americans. Their staple is beans and rice. The largest markets for beans and rice produced in the United States is the Western Hemisphere.

If our policy is threatening our markets in Central America, we have another reason to be concerned about U.S. policy in that region. Of course we are concerned primarily with peace and with democracy and with what we perceive to be a threat of communism and, above all, we are concerned about our own national security.

But in addition to those things the failure of our current policy, a United States policy that is out of control in the region, costing millions, maybe even billions of dollars, threatening the lives of brave Americans, alienating our allies in the Western Hemisphere, is also threatening commercial markets that our people need in this country during difficult times. And especially the American farmer, who is suffering a depression-like condition throughout the farm community.

I urge my colleagues from the farm States to vote for the Barnes-Hamilton substitute, to provide some process for negotiation in the region and to address the policy in that region that will find support among our allies and that will not alienate Latin Americans and that will continue the opportunity for our farmers to sell our rice and our beans in the Western Hemisphere.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Barnes-Hamilton resolution. The Barnes-Hamilton resolution puts the Sandinista government on notice that we will not tolerate a pattern of abuses of the basic principles of fair play and pluralistic government.

The resolution states clearly that the United States will reward future efforts on the part of Nicaragua to move toward pluralistic democracy and reconciliation with its opponents, and that we will act swiftly and decisively to impose multinational pressures on Nicaragua if that country does not remove foreign military advisors, end its support for regional insurgencies, restore individual liberties and press freedoms, and make progress in conducting free and fair elections. The substitute puts the Sandinista government on notice that future congressional decisions on aid to the Contra forces and foreign aid to Nicaragua will rest heavily on the actions of the Sandinistas.

The Sandinista government should not assume that adoption by this body of the Barnes-Hamilton substitute is a signal to conduct business as usual. Such an interpretation does not invite reconciliation between our two governments. Rather, it ensures our mistrust of and hostility toward the goals of the Sandinista regime.

To the Sandinistas, the message of Barnes-Hamilton is loud and clear: Join the community of peoples who value democracy and you will remain our friends. Preach the virtues of civil liberties, religious freedom and a free press and you will be welcome in the company of the democracies of the Western Hemisphere. The choice is yours. We can walk together as free peoples or return to a period of confrontation and mistrust.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Sandinistas and President Ortega hear and heed our message.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute offered by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Mr. HAMILTON. The substitute continues the prohibition on further U.S. military aid to the Contras. It provides $10 million for humanitarian assistance to refugees outside of Nicaragua, and it provides $4 million for implementing a Contadora agreement if one is achieved. The substitute calls for escalating diplomatic, political, and economic pressures on Nicaragua if the Sandinista regime fails to reverse repressive policies within Nicaragua, or fails to end its activities aimed at destabilizing its neighbors.

Further funding of the Contras can only serve to enkindle wider hostilities that could engulf the entire region. That flawed policy provides the Sandinistas with an opportunity to portray itself as the defender of the Nicaraguan people against foreign-financed paramilitaries. It provides the Sandinistas a convenient excuse for their failure to live up to their original promises to build a more open and just society in Nicaragua. An open and just society does not import Soviet and Cuban military advisors to oversee an arms buildup far beyond the legitimate requirements of self defense. An open and just society does not harass church personnel and disrupt church affairs. An open and just society does not assist insurgencies against its neighbors. An open and just society allows the full participation of opposition political parties in elections. An open and just society strives not to impose oppressive censorship on a free press, but strives instead to defend individual liberties and the freedom of expression.

The Sandinista regime contends that its oppressive policies are necessary measures in the face of the threat posed by the Contras. The Contras cannot be blamed for all the societal ills and shortcomings in Nicaragua since the revolution of 1979.

Today's vote is not on the record of the Sandinista regime in power in Nicaragua. It is a crucial vote on the direction of American policy in Central America. It is a vote on whether we are willing to put our full and committed support behind the principled initiative of the Contadora nations to bring peace and stability to Central America not through military means, but by regional negotiations. The negotiations proposed by the Contadora nations are aimed at attaining practical, worthwhile results such as; bringing an end to support for insurgents against a cosignator, and limiting national military forces to legitimate self-defense roles and configurations. The goals of Contadora are very similar, if not identical, to the expressed purposes and aims of American policy in Central America. We as Americans have a profound desire that the people of that troubled region should have the opportunity to live in democratic societies that defend their individual rights, and which promote peaceful relations with neighboring countries. The Hamilton substitute is well-crafted. It gives diplomacy a chance to work. Military escalation will do nothing to improve conditions inside Nicaragua. Instead, it will impose greater suffering on the people of Nicaragua, and draw us closer and closer to the commitment of American troops to that region. We have before us today, in the Hamilton substitute, an alternative to the administration's request for additional military aid to the Contras in Nicaragua. It seeks to draw American policy toward Central America away from the direction of wider military confrontation. It deserves the support of this House.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, while I have urged my colleagues to support the Hamilton amendment as a matter of legislative strategy, I also have grave reservations concerning this resolution, which was the best but flawed alternative placed before us.

I have severe objections to the provision contained in the Hamilton amendment that would permit the reopening of the question of aid to the Contras after October 1, 1985.

The Congress has spoken on this question numerous times and with wisdom in opposing such assistance to the Contras.

I, therefore, urge the defeat of any proposal on final passage that would contain a provision that would reopen this debate.●

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, as my colleagues well know, the issue of continued U.S. military aid to counterrevolutionaries fighting in Nicaragua has been difficult. It truly defies some of the simplistic analysis we have heard during this lengthy debate from both sides.

On the one hand, we have heard that the Contras are little better than bloodthirsty remnants of the dictatorial Somoza regime, who are willing to kill women and children to regain their control of this nation. The Sandinistas, we are told, are no real threat to the United States.

From the other side, we are told that the Sandinistas are mere puppets of Libya, the PLO, Cuba, and the Soviet Union, who are bent on destabilizing all of the Americas, and bringing the United States to its knees. Under this scenario, the Contras are the moral equivalent of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson, if not Joan of Arc.

Mr. Chairman, I think we know that there is some truth in what has been claimed by both sides. We know too that there has been some exaggeration by both sides.

The issue before us, however, is not whether we have our differences with the Sandinista government. We most certainly do have our differences—very serious ones.

The issue before us is whether those differences can only be settled by furnishing direct military aid to the counterrevolutionaries in Nicaragua. We are being asked to choose between that military option and some other option that might lead to a negotiated settlement.

Let's examine the military option. Stated another way, the military option is the use of armed force to achieve a foreign policy objective.

Should we be using armed force to achieve foreign policy objectives? Without getting into the morality of using force for purposes other than self-defense, I certainly could not rule out the use of force in Central America under certain circumstances.

But I feel many would agree with me that the use of armed force should be the last resort in settling major disputes with other nations. The problem with the administration proposal is that military force is being used as a first resort.

Have we broken diplomatic relations with Nicaragua? No, we have not.

Twenty percent of Nicaragua's exports go to the United States. Have we cut off trade? No.

Have we denied landing rights to Nicaraguan airlines? Again, the answer is "no."

Have we attempted to work with our allies to deny bank loans and international financial aid to Nicaragua? Again, no.

What about denying visas to Nicaraguan citizens? Cutting off investment? Isolating Nicaragua through diplomatic pressure on its neighbors? The answer is "no, no, no."

Instead, we have persisted in aiding the insurgents as a means of overthrowing the Sandinista government.

The irony is that the Contras simply are not in a position to accomplish that goal. Yet, our military aid to the Contras gives Cuba and the Soviets the excuse they need to increase their military presence in the region—and it is that presence that we use to justify our support for the insurgents in the first place.

The further irony is that, even if our approach was the correct approach, the $14 million requested by the administration is not nearly enough to assure its success. In fact, it would probably take closer to $100 million per year to raise and support the type of army that might have a chance of overthrowing the Sandanista regime, and even then it would probably require direct military assistance from the United States.

I think that the truth of this matter is that the situation in Nicaragua under present circumstances is ill-suited for a military solution.

We do now have an opportunity, however, to attempt a diplomatic solution, by working with others in the region and supporting the Contadora process.

In this regard, the alternative before us today, the Hamilton-Barnes amendment, puts us on record as supporting a peaceful resolution to our disagreements with Nicaragua. It furnishes $10 million for humanitarian assistance, to be administered by the Red Cross and the High Commissioner for Refugees; $4 million set aside for the Contadora process.

It gives us an opportunity to reduce the deaths, and move toward the democratic process in Nicaragua. Nicaragua has stated that, if given the opportunity, it will reduce outside advisers and broaden democratic participation.

The Hamilton-Barnes approach gives Nicaragua exactly such an opportunity to show that it is willing to become a responsible member of the regional community. It calls their bluff by affording the Sandanistas some 5 months to demonstrate their good faith.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the approach outlined by Representatives HAMILTON and BARNES, although not perfect, is preferable to the Michel substitute. If we do not see progress—if the Sandanista government does not respond as they have suggested they will—then we will have an opportunity in a few months to consider other options in an expedited manner.●

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the distinguished gentleman from Texas, the majority leader, rise?

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The CHAIRMAN. Four hundred ten Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, Hamilton-Barnes says that the United States should provide only humanitarian aid and that this should be channeled through the U.N. High Commissioner on Refugees or the International Red Cross, and then only if they should decide to do it to meet humanitarian needs. These are respectable organizations, but there are respectable U.S. Government organizations capable of doing that, too. In addition, there are reasons why the proposed recipients might not be receptive to the two organizations named in the amendment.

People familiar with the plight of those who have fled Sandinista rule and familiar with the activities of the UNHCR say this would be a sure way to weaken and dishearten the regime's opponents.

Personal testimony comes from Dr. Othniel J. Seiden, a Denver physician who spent 3 weeks in Honduras close to the Nicaraguan border caring for Miskito Indian victims of the Sandinista regime. Dr. Seiden was a volunteer sponsored by the Victoria and Albert Gildred Foundation for Latin American Health and Education.

At first he thought he'd work in the UNHCR refugee camps. But Miskito leaders in Honduras persuaded him to come to their own villages where there were thousands of Nicaraguan Miskito refugees who desperately needed medical care. The Miskito leaders explained that the UNHCR medical teams refused to go to the villages but insisted the refugees come to the UNHCR camps. This most of the Indians refused to do.

According to Dr. Seiden, the Miskito refugees claimed they were much better off in the villages of their own people than in the UNHCR camps.

Working in the villages and in visits to UNHCR camps, Dr. Seiden found that all the Miskito leaders said was true. In the villages he talked to whole families who had left the camps and in the camps he talked to families who planned to leave. Not only was the food skimpy and poor and the medical care often inadequate, but the refugees said they were subject to "political extortion."

As Dr. Seiden puts it, "The Indians were very anti-Sandinista. After all, that was why they had fled Nicaragua. They found the U.N. personnel pro-Sandinista and always exerting pressure on them to stop supporting the Contras and go home and back the Sandinistas."

The Miskitos' most serious charge, according to Dr. Seiden, was that U.N. personnel would regularly question refugees to ascertain whether any relatives were serving with the Contras.

"If they were, the whole family was denied food rations," Dr. Seiden said.

"Based on my experiences," Dr. Seiden said, "Our channeling any kind of aid through the UNHCR would be like giving it to the Sandinistas."

Contrary to the belief of many, the ICRC has not been neutral in Nicaragua. The proof comes from none other than the former president of the Nicaraguan Red Cross, Mr. Ismael Reyes, who fled Nicaragua in 1982 and now lives in exile in Guatemala.

Mr. Reyes, who was a prominent Nicaraguan businessman, told in an article in the newspaper Diario de Las Americas on November 11, 1983, how the ICRC let the Sandinistas renege on an agreement and send thousands of their opponents to their deaths or to long prison terms.

Under a bargain struck between the Sandinistas and the Carter administration, if the United States exerted pressure on President Somoza to leave the country in 1979, then the new Nicaraguan Government would form a new army made up of former members of the National Guard and former Sandinista guerrillas. The Carter administration kept its part of the bargain—Somoza went into exile. But the Sandinistas, as has since become a pattern, did not keep their part.

Instead, most National Guardsmen, barred from the Sandinista army, were left adrift, feeling demoralized and threatened. Many wanted to leave the country or to go to rural areas and resume premilitary lives as farmers. According to Mr. Reyes, then the president of the Nicaraguan Red Cross, the ICRC reached an agreement with Tomas Borge, the Sandinista Interior Minister. Under the agreement, National Guardsmen who surrendered and took refuge in ICRC-protected buildings, the military hospital, or the churches, would be guaranteed proper treatment and, if they wished, safe conduct out of the country.

That agreement was broadcast nationwide and persuaded more than 4,000 National Guardsmen to surrender.

Reyes says he suspected the Sandinistas might violate their pledge and therefore suggested to the ICRC's chief delegate that the prisoners be moved to foreign embassies or given some other kind of protection. The ICRC delegate refused. Shortly afterward, the army, by then almost entirely Sandinista forces, raided the sanctuaries and rounded up all those who had surrendered.

Reyes says he pleaded with the ICRC chief delegate to denounce the roundup. He says the delegate replied that he had explicit instructions from ICRC headquarters in Geneva not to protest.

According to Reyes, many of the prisoners were summarily executed by the security police. Almost all the rest were tried by illegal special tribunals which condemned most to penalties of more than 15 years. They had committed no crime under either Nicaragua or international law; their only crime was to be members of the national guard and, therefore, potential opponents of Sandinista absolute rule.

The treatment of the prisoners was so scandalous that the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights and the International Commission of Jurists condemned the tribunals. But the ICRC kept silent.

Reyes continued as president of the Nicaraguan Red Cross until August 1982 when a Sandinista mob seized the Red Cross headquarters and Reyes was forced to flee the country. Again, the ICRC did not even protest.

Today, of course, all Red Cross activities in Nicaragua are wholly controlled by the Sandinista regime. It would be either folly or deliberate betrayal to channel U.S. humanitarian aid through the Red Cross.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 24, 1985.

DEAR BOB: I announced on April 4 a proposal to promote peace in Central America by fostering a dialogue between the Government of Nicaragua and the democratic resistance, accompanied by a ceasefire in the conflict between them. My proposal was intended, in the words of the Contadora Document of Objectives agreed to by Nicaragua and its neighbors, "to promote national reconciliation efforts. . ., with a view to fostering participation in democratic political processes in accordance with the law."

Since April 4, I have had the benefit of many fruitful exchanges with Latin American leaders and with members of the Congress. I have been encouraged by these discussions, which have shown that a broad consensus exists on the need for reconciliation in Nicaragua, based on democratic principles, as an essential aspect of achieving peace in Central America.

Today the House will vote on competing proposals on how to proceed with our policy in Central America. The choice to be made is a fundamental one that will have a lasting effect on the prospects for democracy, economic opportunity, and peace in this vital region.

The proposal to be offered by Mr. Barnes and Mr. Hamilton would divert funds from existing economic assistance and refugee accounts for humanitarian assistance to refugees outside Nicaragua and for the expenses of implementing an eventual Contadora agreement. Members of Congress should be under no illusion about this proposal. Its adoption would damage our national security and foreign policy interests. By providing a financial inducement for members of the resistance to leave Nicaragua and become refugees in other countries, it relieves pressure on the Sandinistas while, at the same time, it increases the burdens imposed on the neighboring democracies. As a result, fragile democracies would be weakened, their economic recovery would be stalled, their security would be diminished—and the civil war in Nicaragua would go on.

The other proposal before the House, to be offered by Mr. Michel, would appropriate $14 million in new funds to enable the Agency for International Development to provide humanitarian aid for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition. This alternative meets most of the objectives in my effort to promote a dialogue within Nicaragua which regional leaders have recognized is essential for peace in Central America. Rather than abandon the opposition, the Michel proposal would help to sustain it, giving peace a chance.

If Congress approves $14 million for assistance during the current fiscal year, no other U.S. Government funds would be spent for such material assistance to the armed democratic resistance. I will personally establish thorough procedures for the detailed management and accountability of the program in order to assure that these limitations on both the nature and amount of U.S. assistance are scrupulously observed.

I recognize the importance some members have attached to bilateral talks with the Government of Nicaragua. I am instructing my representatives to meet with representatives of the Government of Nicaragua. In their talks, the U.S. representative will press for a ceasefire as well as a church-mediated dialog between the Sandinistas and the united democratic opposition. I must emphasize, however, that such bilateral talks must be in support of the Contadora process and cannot become a substitute for these efforts to achieve a comprehensive, verifiable agreement among all the nations of Central America. Also, as I said on April 4, peace negotiations must not become a cover for deception and delay. If the Sandinista government shows bad faith by seeking to gain unilateral advantage, for example, through a further arms buildup during a ceasefire or intransigence in negotiations, I would feel constrained to respond accordingly in our diplomatic efforts and would not expect the democratic resistance to continue to observe a ceasefire which was unfairly working to their disadvantage.

While economic sanctions are unlikely by themselves to create sufficient pressure to change. Nicaragua's behavior, the Sandinistas should not benefit from their present access to the U.S. market while continuing their intransigence on issues effecting our national security. The Administration will favorably consider economic sanctions against the Government of Nicaragua and will undertake multilateral consultations with other Central American states in this regard.

The U.S. condemns atrocities by either side in the strongest possible terms. We will use our assistance to help ensure against wrongful acts by those who seek our help and we will urge them to take steps to investigate allegations of such acts and take appropriate actions against those found to be guilty.

The United States now stands at a moment of judgment. Experience has shown that a policy of support for democracy, economic opportunity, and security will best serve the people of Central America and the national interests of the United States. If we show consistency of purpose, if we are firm in our conviction that the promising developments over the past year in El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Guatemala also show the way for a better future for Nicaragua, then over time we can help see the democratic center prevail over tyrants of the left or the right. But if we abandon democracy in Nicaragua, if we tolerate the consolidation of a surrogate state in Central America responsive to Cuba and the Soviet Union, we will see the progress that has been achieved begin to unravel under the strain of continuing conflict, attempts at subversion, and loss of confidence in our support.

There can be a more democratic, more prosperous, and more peaceful Central America. I am prepared to devote my energies toward that end. But, I also need the support of the Congress. Yesterday, the Senate in a bipartisan vote for peace and democracy confirmed the commitment of the United States to those who struggle for liberty. I urge that the House of Representatives support such a measure today.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

VIRGINIA, April 22, 1985.

To the U.S. Congress

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS: I am writing you on behalf of Mr. Wycliffe Diego, a Miskito Indian who has been a leader of the ethnic organization of Nicaragua, Alpromisu, later named Misurasata, and now called Misura.

Mr. Diego has learned of the debate going on the Aid to the Nicaraguan rebels and is concerned about the outcome of your decision. The points he has asked me to convey to you are—among others—the followings:

The Miskito Indians believe that would be a moral responsibility of the US Congress to create thousands of refugees by not supporting the will of Nicaraguans who are looking to regain their country and their rights. They ask you to continue supporting their struggle.

To grant the status of "refugees" to those who are fighting would be to replicate the tragedy that more than 40,000 Indians and Creolles suffer both in Costa Rica and Honduras, as well as to augment the number of those "relocated" under the iron fist of the Sandinista regime.

Mr. Diego asks you, where are the refugees who are today in Honduras and in Costa Rica going to go? Where will go those who are inside Nicaragua expecting the liberation from the rebel forces and from their "allies"? What nationality will have the children born in a refugee camp? What rights do they have?

According to Mr. Diego the Miskito Indians have a long and sad experience with the condition of being a refugee, of being repressed and harassed in their own country and of being forgotten and negotiated by those who are in a position of power, away from the day-to-day poverty and suffering. he asks that you review the complaints presented before the Organization of American States Inter-American Commission on Human Rights by the Miskito Indians—through their Council of Elders—in November 1982; they reported about the mistreatment given to the Miskito Indians by some staff of the UNHCR as well as the bias approach they had in favor of the Sandinista regime. He states that even today they feel an attitute that favors the return of the refugees to Nicaragua despite the fact that conditions that caused the Indians exodus continue to exist in Nicaragua's Atlantic Coast. (ACNUR works through World Relief in Honduras and Mr. Diego acknowledges some improvement on the implementation of the programs but he says that the sympathy towards the Sandinista regime continues to pressure the refugees.

Mr. Diego will be in town next Wednesday and Thursday; he will try to visit you at that time. Thank you for the attention you give to this letter.

Very sincerely,

WYCLIFFE DIEGO.
ADRIANA GUILLEN.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts Mr. BOLAND the former chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence.

Mr. BOLAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this amendment.

I do so with the firm conviction that the House should move beyond the failings of the Sandinistas—real as they are—and consider a workable program for the resolution of our differences with Nicaragua.

I believe it is time for this country to move beyond simply lashing out at the Sandinistas.

It is time to develop a coordinated policy toward Nicaragua that has a chance for peace:

That has the support of the Congress and the American people;

That can be endorsed—publicly and privately—by the nations of the region;

That makes use of regional bodies such as the OAS and the Contadora group; and

That encourages negotiation with Nicaragua.

And yet it is also clear that we must not abandon those who legitimately oppose the repression of the Sandinista regime;

Those who seek to halt its support for insurgencies, in the region;

Those who wish to revitilize its economy; and

Those who simply wish to live in Nicaragua in peace.

Mr. Chairman, we would not be here today debating this resolution if military pressure on the Sandinista regime had worked. Because it has not, we must seek other, more productive, ways to address the problem Nicaragua represents to us, to its neighbors and to its people.

The Hamilton-Barnes amendment does this by emphasizing collective action with our Latin and Central American neighbors:

By supporting strongly the Contadora process,

By encouraging in every way a ceasefire in Nicaragua and a dialog between the Sandinistas and their opposition—both armed and unarmed.

The incentive to the Contras for a cease fire is U.S. aid in the form of humanitarian assistance.

For the Sandinistas, the incentives are both positive—improved relations and trade—and negative—economic sanctions and congressional reconsideration of the military option. The boost to Contadora is a U.S. policy of full support, material assistance, and a cessation of U.S. efforts to overthrow the regime in Managua.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not blind to the failings of the Sandinistas. Indeed, it sets them forth in some detail. It acknowledges Sandinista repression, the Sandinista military buildup, and Sandinista threats against their Central American neighbors. It acknowledges human rights abuses on both sides.

But instead of a military response, the amendment offers the prospect of better relations with Nicaragua:

If there can be a reconciliation between the Sandinistas and their opponents; if support to insurgenices ends; and if Cuba and Soviet influence can be removed.

So there are incentives for the Sandinistas to try to make the peace process work.

There are also some incentives of a negative kind.

The United States will not abandon the Contras. It will provide assistance to feed, clothe, and treat them during the period of the negotiations. Although the resolution places no deadline for the successful completion of negotiations, it does provide that the President can request military aid for the Contras after October 1. That review is designed to give the Sandinistas clear warning not to misinterpret last night's vote. They should realize that Hamilton-Barnes keeps the Contras in the game and, by doing so, recognizes their right, and that of the unarmed opposition, to a say in the future of their country.

So the Sandinistas must realize their conduct over the coming months—their response to these openings we create—must be positive and in good faith. If it is not, I believe they will find the Congress much less patient the next time this issue arises. The Contras, like the Sandinistas, also have a choice. They can avail themselves of up to $10 million in refugee assistance at sites outside Nicaragua, during the period of the various negotiations. This assistance will not permit them to wage their war. It will encourage a cease fire, but does not force one upon them.

Mr. Chairman, the need for this kind of approach is real. We have so many more diplomatic, economic, and military capabilities which could be brought to bear on the problem that Nicaragua represents. And, we want to do so in a way that sets us apart from the Soviets and the Cubans, that makes us a good friend and partner.

Mr. Chairman, what is striking about this resolution is that it builds so greatly on goals and concerns shared by the majority of the House. In effect, it takes up where the President's plan left off. It offers incentives to both the Sandinistas and their opponents. It deserves our bipartisan support and our best efforts to implement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 6 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] has 6 minutes remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, to close the debate in opposition, I yield my remaining time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. IRELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, the Barnes amendment provides a one-shot authorization of $10 million to support Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras and Costa Rica. That money is only a tiny fraction of what it will take to help the new Barnes plan refugees.

The Barnes plan will increase the number of refugees from Nicaragua. The plan creates a serious long-term refugee problem, but provides only a small amount of money for a short term to deal with the problem.

If we adopt the ill-advised Barnes plan, we should prepare ourselves for a long-term and probably massive commitment to refugee relief, and perhaps even to resettlement in the United States.

There are sound reasons to anticipate a major increase in the refugee problem. Recent history in Afghanistan and El Salvador should be enough to convince us that the problem is real. As economic and political conditions deteriorate under the Sandinista regime, the exodus from Nicaragua will continue. We have already seen the increase in Nicaraguan young men escaping the Sandinista military draft. We could easily be faced with an exodus proportionate to that of the Vietnamese and Afghans. I remind you that it is estimated that one-third of the Afghans now are refugees.

There are about 180,000 Nicaraguans already in Costa Rica and Honduras. The Foreign Minister of Costa Rica told a House Intelligence Committee delegation last week that there are now over 150,000 Nicaraguans in Costa Rica, and that there are many others on their way. Costa Ricans already are complaining that this has caused a substantial drain on their economy.

In Honduras the number of known Nicaraguan refugees has doubled in the past year. The general policy of both Costa Rica and El Salvador is to resist incorporating the refugees into their societies because they fear the political economic consequences. Permanent refugees will have to be resettled elsewhere, and the United States may end up having to accept a large number of them.

Let's consider for a moment the costs of sustaining refugees in Central America. Right now, only about 30,000 of the 180,000 or more Nicaraguan refugees in Honduras and Costa Rica may be receiving U.S. or U.N. aid. Currently the U.N. program supporting mainly Nicaraguan and Salvadoran refugees in Costa Rica has a budget of $7 million and helps 12,000 refugees. In short, in Costa Rica the United Nations is spending $600 per refugee, and is reaching only a fraction of the actual number of refugees.

I won't assume the worst case—that one-third of Central Americans would flee communism, as in Afghanistan. Instead, suppose that 10 percent might do so.

From Nicaragua alone we can bet on 300,000 additional refugees as the Sandinistas continue their repression. As things get worse under the Barnes plan, we could anticipate the necessity of helping 1½ million refugees. At an estimated $600 cost per refugee, sustaining them in Central America simply for a year might cost $900 million. If $10 million from the Barnes plan is added to existing U.S. and U.N. refugee aid for Honduras and Costa Rica, the current total will be $32 million. The Barnes plan is not even close, Mr. Chairman, not even close.

If the Barnes plan is going to increase the flood of refugees—as it surely will—the Barnes plan ought to include the real cost of taking care of them, not a puny $10 million drop in the bucket.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, the first question in my mind is what does the Barnes-Hamilton resolution do about the situation in Nicaragua? The answer is: Nothing.

But before I get into the substance, I will remind you once again how we got here. This resolution is not here after a hearing in the Foreign Affairs Committee or after a hearing or action in the Appropriations Committee. The Appropriations Subcommittee and full committee was moving last Thursday, and all of a sudden, when it was realized that they could not get something through the Appropriations Committee to be here on this floor by Tuesday, all of a sudden we showed up in the Rules Committee at a hearing on a resolution we did not have before us. When I asked the gentleman from Maryland what his proposal was, he did not have all the details worked out. Luckily, we finally got a rule that is basically fair, but I tell you, this is still no way to legislate on an issue this important in foreign policy.

What happened to the genuine, bipartisan efforts that were being made? You know, I really hoped for that, and I know that there were negotiations or discussions between the administration and Members on both sides of the aisle.

I personally talked to somebody and said, "Can we not find accommodation here?" As a matter of fact, how little can we do? If we accommodate or compromise any more than what is in the Michel resolution, we might as well send a love letter and say "Good luck and goodbye." I tell you, that is about what the Barnes resolution does.

I suppose what we have here is an effort by those opposed to the people who are fighting against communism in Nicaragua to have something to offer so it would not look like they were just saying, "Let us shut our eyes and ignore this problem and hope it will go away."

What is the alternative? Not very much. The Barnes-Hamilton amendment provides money to implement treaties not yet agreed to, rather than providing any impetus toward achieving that end. The Barnes-Hamilton alternative provides humanitarian assistance only for Nicaraguans already driven from their country and not one red cent for those who have chosen to remain behind inside their country to reclaim their land and their freedom. It is more of a reparation for democratic defeat and retreat than it is a reward or an incentive for democracy's triumph.

Mr. Chairman, contrary to our Spirit of '76, we seem to be saying the only good freedom fighter is an ex-freedom fighter living in exile. That is the one we will try to reward. It is almost like we are saying to the Sandinista regime, "Let us help you rid yourself of those undesirable elements in your country by rewarding them for fleeing your country and withdrawing all support from those who have stayed behind to fight for democracy and freedom. This is how we will bring peace to your troubled land."

Well, this approach may bring peace of mind to the Sandinista, but it will certainly not pacify or liberate or even accommodate the democratic resistance inside Nicaragua. It will only make their valiant struggle more difficult.

What does the Barnes resolution do to help the Contras? Nothing. Not even humanitarian aid. What does it do to really encourage the people inside Nicaragua to talk to each other and work out a settlement? Not anything.

The Michel substitute, on the other hand, the next issue we will be considering, puts us on the side of freedom and democracy and against tyranny, yet by providing only nonlethal survival assistance to the Contras, humanitarian aid. We have defined what the humanitarian aid is. We say it will go through AID and we encouraged the President to impose a trade embargo if they do not have good-faith negotiations.

The Michel amendment has the support of the President. I hope that this House will turn to support the President in his efforts as chief foreign policy spokesman and architect. We cannot speak with 535 voices when it comes to negotiating with foreign heads of states or advancing peace initiatives as we have been doing more and more often over the recent years.

Let us come together in a bipartisan fashion on the Michel amendment, not the Barnes substitute, to provide only humanitarian assistance to the democratic forces in Nicaragua. That is the least we can do as the leader of the free world. Reconciliation will only come if those forces of freedom are not abandoned.

Think about it. Vote "no" on Barnes and let us vote "yes" on the Michel substitute.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. COLLINS].

Mrs. COLLINS. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today to discuss the two Contra funding alternatives before the House.

I must admit that I have some difficulty with the Hamilton alternative. This compromise would provide $4 million to assist the Contadora peace process and $10 million in humanitarian aid to Nicaraguan refugees via the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

My difficulty with this proposal is that it opens up the possibility of continued Contra military funding. This could happen either in the House-Senate conference committee or in coming years after current hostility to Contra aid has died down.

It is my belief that even this alternative is an interference in the affairs of the Nicaraguan people. Though its sponsors' intentions are surely good, my opposition to even the most benevolent intrusion is so strong that I would vote against this alternative if I was not fearful that the Michel alternative might pass.

I am completely opposed to the Michel alternative which would provide $14 million in supposedly nonlethal aid to the Contras. It is understood that the President wants the CIA to handle but not to control this money.

It is easy to see how this aid could be misused. The CIA might not control this money but they surely would be responsible for distributing it. Yet the CIA has rarely acted as a refugee relief agency. If we want to help refugees, we should do so through respected channels such as the Red Cross or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

Even if the $14 million were used exclusively to buy food and medicine, the Michel alternative would still be providing military aid to the Contras. This is because the Contras could easily divert the money otherwise needed for food and medicine to buy weapons and ammunition. In this way, the President's nonlethal aid would be as deadly as any military funding we could provide.

Mr. Chairman, my other major concern with funding of the Contras is that a downpayment on our own direct military involvement in Central America—$14 million may not be enough to overthrow the Sandinistas. Yet combined with the $80 million the CIA has already provided to the Contras, it may be enough to commit us to long-term military involvement there.

Approving any form of aid to the Contras today may make future U.S. military action in Nicaragua inevitable. As our aid continues, our stake in the military situation grows. We have seen this vicious cycle before in Vietnam and can now observe it in El Salvador.

Now that I have compared the two alternatives before the House, I would like to say a few words about the President's peace proposal, a misnomer if ever there was one. It is my belief that it is merely a ploy to gain congressional approval of Contra funding.

Furthermore, we all know that this "new" package of proposals is nearly identical to one offered by the Contras themselves earlier this year. The Sandinistas rejected them at that time. One Latin American statesman summed up the President's offer to Nicaragua as "Drop dead or I'll kill you." This comment surely rings true.

Mr. Chairman, we must unequivocally cut off all aid to the Contras thus preventing our young men from ever dying in the jungles and mountains of Nicaragua.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time, 6 minutes, to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Central America and Latin America, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it is an honor for me to have the privilege to close this 2 hours of debate on the proposal that has been presented by the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HAMILTON, along with Chairman JONES and four members of the Republican Party, Mr. ZSCHAU, Mr. LEACH of Iowa, Mr. GRADISON, and Mr. FISH.

We have before us this afternoon, as everyone is aware, two alternative approaches. We have the bipartisan alternative that has been offered by Chairman HAMILTON and we have the alternative that has been offered on behalf of the Republican Party and, we have been told, has been supported by the President by the distinguished minority leader, Mr. MICHEL.

What is the difference between these two proposals and why should you support the Hamilton proposal and oppose the Michel proposal? That is the issue before us. What are the differences? Why vote for Hamilton? Why vote against Michel?

It is very simple. Let us focus first on the Michel proposal because that is the easiest one, I think, to focus on. If you voted last night against military aid to the Contras, then unless you believe in the tooth fairy and the Easter bunny, you want to vote against the Michel proposal this afternoon, because if you are against military support for the Contras, then you have got to be against providing $14 million in logistic supplies to the army, to the Contras. That is what the Michel proposal does.

Someone wiser than I once said an army marches on its stomach. Well, Mr. MICHEL will provide to that army food, medical supplies, other logistical support, it does not rule out transportation, I suppose trucks and other logistical support. So if you are against military support for the Contras and you voted that way last night, you have got to vote this afternoon against Michel.

Why would you want to vote for the Hamilton proposal? What is it in the Hamilton proposal that is attractive? We have been told all afternoon that the Hamilton proposal does nothing; it does nothing to the Sandinistas. I would suggest to you that what it does is call their bluff.

Within the last few days, the Sandinistas have said, President Ortega of Nicaragua has said, that if the United States does not fund the Contras and votes down what we did last night, so we have already taken one step, and votes down the Michel proposal this afternoon, and we just need to take one more step, if we do that, we have been told, and I do not know if it is true or not, they have told us things before that have turned out not to be true, but we have been told that if we do this, if we vote down the Michel proposal this afternoon, then they will do a number of things.

They will call a cease-fire. They will lift the censorship. They will lift the emergency restrictions. They will limit the number of foreign military advisers. They will get rid of some Cubans and some Soviets.

That is what we have been told will happen if we vote this afternoon against the Michel proposal.

I suggest to this Chamber that we find out if that is true. The Hamilton proposal says let us give the remainder of this fiscal year, just a little over 5 months, to see whether something positive can be worked out. The Michel proposal and the proposal we voted down last night say, "Let us go to a military approach. Let us finance an army that is trying to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua." I ask you ladies and gentlemen who are so anxious to move to this military approach and were at the beginning of it 3 or 4 years ago, why have we not used some of the other options that are available to us?

Why have we not, for example, used diplomatic initiatives and diplomatic pressure? We have not done that. Talk to the Contadora nations. They will tell you we have undercut their effort. We have not supported it. Why is it, if Nicaragua is so bad, that we have to finance a war against them? Why is it that Nicaragua has most-favored-nation trade status with the United States today? Why is it that the United States is Nicaragua's leading trading partner if the Sandinistas are so bad? Why did we first decide to use the military option? There are other options that are available to us.

We are a great power. What the Hamilton proposal says is let us go back and look at the other options. We have 5 months, and ladies and gentlemen, we are going to be back with this issue next fall. We are going to be looking at U.S. relations with Nicaragua. We are going to have to decide next fall what is an appropriate approach.

We have the option this afternoon to call the Sandinistas' bluff, to give time for diplomacy, to give time to see if the Sandinistas are going to keep these commitments they have made. Let us vote for the Hamilton alternative, a bipartisan alternative brought in good faith by Republicans and Democrats to this floor to try to create a consensus. Let us vote for Hamilton and let us vote against the Michel proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device and there were—ayes 219, noes 206, answered "present" 3, not voting 5, as follows:

Byron	Rodino

□ 1610

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Rodino for, with Mr. Badham against.

Mr. TOWNS changed his vote from "aye" to "present."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. MICHEL

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, pursuant to the rule, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will designate the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The text of the amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. MICHEL. Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the following sums are appropriated, out of any monies in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the Agency for International Development for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, namely:

Agency for International Development, for food, clothing, medicine and other humanitarian assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, $14,000,000, Provided, That none of the funds made available by this resolution may be used to provide arms, munitions or other weapons of war to any person, group or organization, directly or indirectly.

SEC. 2. The Administrator of the Agency for International Development shall have such powers as may be necessary and proper to carry out section 1 of this joint resolution, notwithstanding any other provision of law relating to the administration, disbursement or use of appropriated funds.

SEC. 3. The President is strongly urged and encouraged to take the steps necessary to impose an embargo on trade between the United States and Nicaragua if the government of Nicaragua does not enter into good faith negotiations with the Nicaraguan democratic opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to House Resolution 136, the amendment is considered as having been read.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] will be recognized for 1 hour, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

□ 1620

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to designate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] to make the allocation of time on our side of the aisle.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] is designated to control the time for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, at this time I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE].

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of my good friend, the distinguished Republican leader, BOB MICHEL.

Winston Churchill once described Russian foreign policy as an enigma wrapped inside a riddle. Mr. Chairman, by a margin of just five votes the House passed a resolution which I believe is riddled with contradictions, full of enigmas.

There is much in it that we can agree with and I would urge my colleagues to look at the resolution that was just passed because there are parts of it, indeed as we seek to reach a resolution of this problem, that we can all agree with.

The first paragraph says we desire peace. The Government of the United States desires peace. Of course we do.

Look at paragraph 4 on page 2 of the resolution. It says that there are, and I quote, "disturbing trends in Nicaragua's foreign * * * policies."

I would scratch "disturbing trends" and I would insert the words "appalling trends in Nicaragua's foreign * * * policies."

Look at the resolution you just passed and read what it says. "The Sandinista government's curtailment of individual liberties, political expression, freedom of worship, and the independence of the media." That is what the resolution says. Of course we agree.

It says it subordinates "military, judicial, and internal security functions to the ruling political party," and we agree.

It says, and I quote that resolution again, "The Sandinista Government's close military ties with Cuba, the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies, and the continuing military buildup that Nicaragua's neighbors consider threatening" and we agree.

And, Mr. Chairman, it says finally, if you read paragraph (4)(D) of the resolution that just passed, it condemns the Sandinista government's efforts to "export its influence and ideology," and, my friends, we agree.

We would stipulate in this House on both sides of the aisle to all of those proposals, I believe.

Then we come to the operative section, after the words, after the stipulations, to the effective language of the resolution that by a five-vote swing passed the House. And what did it do? It attempts to fly under the heading of humanitarian aid.

And what does it say? It says if you oppose, oppose the very government they have just condemned in order to get aid, you must leave your country. You must become a refugee or you are not eligible to receive 1 cent of the so-called humanitarian aid. That is a riddle and an enigma in this resolution. There is absolutely no way for one of those citizens who wishes to put his life on the line and fight for freedom of the press, and fight for freedom of religion, and fight for freedom of assembly to receive humanitarian aid unless he agrees to become a refugee.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution that this House just passed denies aid to the victims of oppression. The victims are the ones who are cut off from humanitarian assistance.

That ought not to be the policy of this Government. That ought not to be the policy of this House. That ought not to be what you go home and say to your constituents that you voted to do.

Do you really want to cut off humanitarian assistance to the victims of the Sandinista regime? That is what you just voted to do.

We can correct that in the next vote by voting for the amendment offered by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL]. I hope the House will do so in a broad bipartisan way. It is a straight-out effort at humanitarian aid, only humanitarian aid to those who would fight for the principles of democracy embodied in the Contadora documents which the Sandinista government repudiated, embodied in the charters that we believe in, embodied in what this Nation stands for.

I urge my colleagues to help the victims of oppression and vote for the Michel amendment.

□ 1630

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BONIOR].

Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, last night, the House upheld what has now become a proud tradition of courageous leadership in this body. We dealt U.S. involvement in the war in Nicaragua a resounding defeat—its largest defeat ever, yesterday's vote was a significant step, but surely not the last step, in the long and difficult process of bringing peace to Central America.

Today we must face that issue again on two more tough votes. And make no mistake about it—we face the very same issue today as we faced yesterday. The Michel substitute is cloaked in the soothing language of humanitarian aid but it is nothing less than continued aid to the Contras.

The Michel substitute is more direct aid to a brutal army waging a terrorist campaign against the people and Government of Nicaragua. Its funds can be used for communications equipment, trucks, uniforms, boots, and other materials essential to the war effort. In the past year, funds administered by the Agency for International Development, the very agency that the Michel substitute would fund, have been used along the Honduran border for roads and bridges—uses that directly facilitate troop movements.

The funds in the Michel substitute can be used to supply troops operating inside Nicaragua. They can be used to free up other Contra funds—and the Contras will surely not be short of funds from other sources—that can be used for the purchase of weapons.

Most importantly, the Michel substitute fails to reinstate the existing prohibition against diverting other U.S. funds to the Contras. It could free up far more than $14 million for future military aid.

Finally, it gives the Contras the official stamp of congressional approval that they have long sought. If we want to end this illegal and unjust war, we must defeat the Michel substitute.

The stakes are high. A recent New York Times article clearly documents that the administration views the present $14 million request as part of an effort to expand the U.S.-supported guerrilla forces to a 35,000-member army. This enlarged army will require substantially increased funding of at least $100 million per year. Even more disturbing, the administration sees aid to the Contras as part of a policy which considers the direct application of U.S. military force as an eventual option.

The Hamilton substitute provides an alternative to increasing U.S. military involvement in the region. It is grounded in the principles of international law, in the principles of democracy and respect for the sovereignty of nations that are our proud heritage as a nation. These are the principles, not our overwhelming military power, which give us the right to claim leadership among the community of nations. These are the principles we must embody in our policy in Central America today.

The Hamilton substitute emphasizes diplomacy over military intervention. It provides a strong endorsement and incentives to implement the Contadora peace process. And it provides genuine humanitarian assistance to refugees from Nicaragua, aid that will be supervised through internationally recognized relief organizations in areas where such assistance is truly needed.

The issue we face today is simple, it is clear. The war we are currently funding in Nicaragua, is a war that the American people do not want. A vote for the Michel substitute is a vote to continue that war. The American people are looking to us for a peaceful alternative, for leadership, and the courage of our convictions as a nation. The Hamilton substitute provides that alternative. I urge my colleagues to stay with Hamilton and defeat Michel.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LOEFFLER].

Mr. LOEFFLER. Thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman and Members of this body, the substitute which just passed does absolutely nothing to encourage the Sandinista Marxist-Leninist regime to stop repression, suppression, oppression internally or subversion internationally.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come for all Americans to sober up and understand that the stakes are exceedingly high. For us in this body, the time has come for us to put partisan politics aside and recognize what is so important with respect to foreign policy within our own hemisphere.

We must support the Michel substitute because it is through the Michel substitute that we provide assistance to those people within Nicaragua who desperately seek to live under a government by democracy, not a government by oppression.

It is the Michel resolution which will allow the United States of America to honor its responsibility to the free world—that we continue to be the beacon of democracy and provide support for those who want to have a life and a government like us. And there is no question that there are hundreds of thousands of people in Nicaragua that want this.

If, on the other hand, it would be the action of this body to disallow the passage of the Michel substitute, in my judgment, that would be a tragic mistake; tragic because then we are unilaterally abandoning the U.S. ability to assist in the formation of democracy while we are doing nothing to curb the activity of the Sandinistas in Nicaragua

If we in this body make a decision that we are unwilling to support the Michel resolution, that we are unwilling to take responsibility and adequate action to back up these people who need our help, then there is no question in my mind that in the years ahead we will pay a much higher price not only with respect to dollars but potentially with that ultimate option that I hope I never see placed on the table—the deployment of American troops in Central America to preserve our freedom and that of those within that region who need our help.

We simply cannot rip from the hands of a freedom-seeking people, the people of Central America who want what we have, the ability to achieve economic, social, and political attainments brought about by peace through the framework of a democracy defined in their own terms.

I have traveled in Central America, and I have looked at literally hundreds of people whose eyes express something that our Founding Fathers probably had as well; something that fortunately, we as Americans have never had to go through, but something that we must make certain that we stand up and support.

They want their freedom. They want a government in Nicaragua that honors a commitment that was made in 1979; that is democracy, not repression. That is democracy, the ability of people to move forward and enjoy the freedoms of religion and of the press, to be able to move forward in the private sector as members of labor unions and as entrepreneurs.

Mr. Chairman, when I was in Central America, as many of you who have traveled there, yes, I was greeted by government officials, but different than what we experience here when we receive officials from other nations; they were dressed like many of us on this floor today, but in addition they carried M16 weapons.

As many of you, they escorted us about their nation, in armed vehicles. As I reflect upon that type of environment, I had to think about my own State; about my own district that represents more than 500 miles of the Rio Grande River, more than a quarter of the entire border with Mexico.

I never want to see in Mexico what many of us have been greeted by in other parts of Central America. We must recognize that the matter we are now considering is much more than just Nicaragua. This is much more than just Central America; Panama, Costa Rica, Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador, and Belize. The country of Mexico must be a major factor for consideration.

The pearl of the aggressor, Nicaragua, is not countries within Central America, it is Mexico. I implore you to understand that we are talking about more than just the people seeking democracy in Nicaragua. We are talking not only about Central America; we are talking about North America as well, and our friend and neighbor just across the Rio Grande River and the boundaries of New Mexico, Arizona, and California.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, as the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee which has jurisdiction over AID activities, I want to tell you that if anyone votes for the Michel amendment, they should not kid themselves; and they should not try to kid anybody else, either here or in their home district.

If you vote for the Michel amendment, I want to tell you that you will be voting to allow military aid to the Contras; there is no question about it. Now, I do not describe the Contras, as some have, as being bloodthirsty. Some of them are; I think many are not.

If there is any individual Nicaraguan citizen for whom I have personal respect, it is Adolfo Calero. I regard him as an old friend. I relied on his advice extensively when we had the issue of whether or not to provide assistance to Nicaragua immediately after the revolution.

It was largely upon his advice that I supported that for a time. As I say, I regard him as a friend. He is, for the uninitiated, the political head of the Contras.

My objection to the Michel amendment is not my objection to Mr. Calero or a number of people who surround him. My objection is that the Michel amendment will not do the job that is necessary in bringing the Sandinistas to heel. I think that the Hamilton amendment, in contrast, has a much greater chance of accomplishing that.

I have no illusions about where the Sandinistas are trying to head. The question is not whether you like the Sandinistas or not. The question is not whether we are going to fight Marxism in Central America. The question is how to do it. The question is whether you are going to do it smart or do it stupid. And in my judgment the Michel amendment does not do it smart.

The problem with the Michel amendment is that it allows the Sandinistas to continue to make us the object of argument rather than turning that argument exclusively on their own conduct. That is what you do if you pass the Michel amendment.

Now allegedly, under the Michel amendment, this money goes to AID for humanitarian, nonmilitary purposes. But I tell you, as chairman of the subcommittee that has jurisdiction over AID, there is absolutely no way that I or anyone else can guarantee to you, in conscience, that that money will not go either to the CIA or to the Contras for military-related purposes, as has already been indicated.

Under this amendment, aid can go for logistics, aid can go for helicopters, aid can go for C-47's, aid can go to build the roads and bridges that facilitate the providing of military aid to the Contras. It can go for certain kinds of dynamite.

I want to remind you, there is not, in this amendment, the usual protection of a reprogramming process which is normally the case. Normally our subcommittee has an opportunity to review exactly how administration aid is being shifted, and if a shift would occur from one program to another or from one agency to another, our committee has the right of review. Under this amendment, there is no such right of review. Under the Hamilton amendment you did not need it because the money clearly would not go, under any circumstances, to the Contras. But under this amendment, it is simply military aid in other garb. It will get there; it will have the same effect. And it will enable the Sandinistas to resist the internal changes that I believe are necessary.

I think we do have to have pressure on the Sandinistas. I think we've got to have pressure on them for all four of the reasons that the administration has indicated.

But I really believe that there are only three actions that can legitimately—I ask for 1 more minute.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. OBEY. I really believe it is absolutely misguided to assume that the application of military, rather than economic pressure, can force this crowd in Nicaragua to change their tune in terms of their domestic policies.

The reason I believe that is because I honestly believe based upon my personal observations of them that you have half of the Sandinistas in control of that country now who would rather see a military invasion of Nicaragua, would rather be booted out of office, than to change their policies.

I really believe that half of them would much rather lose power temporarily on the assumption that having been forced out of office, they would then become the new Sandinos, not just within Nicaragua, but regionwide.

I think we ought to deny them that opportunity to be self-styled heroes.

Economic pressure is the greatest leverage we have in forcing internal change, in forcing divisions among the leaders of the Sandinistas. Economic pressure is what will cause the populace to raise questions about Nicaragua economic and social policies.

Hamilton has it; Michel does not; Michel is a slippery way to provide military aid—do not kid yourselves about it, and that military aid will be provided if you pass this amendment.

□ 1650

I urge you to follow the prudent course and stick with the Hamilton amendment.

Mr. BARNES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OBEY. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BARNES. The gentleman is about out of time. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

I think it is particularly important that the gentleman, who is the chairman of the subcommittee which has oversight responsibility with respect to the Agency for International Development, is in the well opposing the amendment that is before us, the Michel amendment.

One of my concerns about the Michel approach is precisely the fact that it places the Agency for International Development in the position of providing assistance to armed insurgents who are inside another country with which we have diplomatic relations and they are trying to overthrow that government. AID would be, if we adopt the Michel proposal, required to provide logistical assistance to armed forces inside another country. I wonder what the gentleman feels about the precedent of using the Agency for International Development as the mechanism for providing assistance to the armed insurgents in Nicaragua. What does that do to AID?

Mr. OBEY. In my judgment, what it does is to allow any enemy of the United States an opportunity to argue in the Third World that AID is nothing but a cover for our own military operations or desires around the world. That is not in our national interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY] has again expired.

Mr. BARNES. I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

If the gentleman will yield further, I think the gentleman makes a very important point. One of the allegations that is sometimes made about AID, I believe falsely, but one of the allegations that is sometimes made against AID is that it is engaged in covert activities or is in some way in collusion with the Central Intelligence Agency or is part of the intelligence services of the United States. And we have historically been very careful to maintain that separation between our intelligence gathering services and AID. Does the gentleman share my concern that if we adopt the Michel proposal we will be confirming those suspicions and confirming those allegations that are sometimes made that AID is not simply in the business of providing development assistance and helping people but really is engaged in some other kinds of activities?

Mr. OBEY. I think the answer is clearly yes. We will be playing into the hands of any enemy of America who wants to bring into question any activity of AID anyplace in the world. As I say, that is not in our national interest.

Mr. BARNES. Let me say further that I have heard from people within AID of their concern about this proposal, that it places AID in a dangerously unprecedented situation. The Michel approach providing aid to armed insurgents in another country through AID is a serious mistake.

I have one last question for the distinguished chairman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BARNES. Let me complete my series of questions, and I know there is plenty of time on the gentleman's side.

As I understand it, AID does not operate refugee camps to provide assistance——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY] has again expired.

Mr. BARNES. I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

AID does not operate camps to provide assistance to refugees or to feed people and to provide medical assistance. My understanding—and the gentleman can confirm this or deny it, I am not positive about this—the way AID operates, when it wants to provide that kind of humanitarian assistance, is that it normally would provide it through an international agency or private voluntary organization.

Mr. OBEY. That is correct.

Mr. BARNES. Or the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, or the International Committee of the Red Cross. Am I correct in that?

Mr. OBEY. That is absolutely correct. The difference is that under the Hamilton amendment we provide that aid directly to the agencies that normally provide that kind of humanitarian assistance. Under the Michel amendment there is a potential sleight of hand which goes on which allows that to be diverted for other purposes without the protection of the normal reprogramming processes which protect the congressional interest and the national interest on an issue like this.

Mr. BARNES. I thank the gentleman for his answers.

I think it is very important that our colleagues understand what the chairman of the oversight subcommittee has just said about this proposal.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. STUMP].

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Michel amendment. An amendment which honors the American commitment to stand by those who fight for democracy and who have defended U.S. strategic interests in Central America.

The Michel plan does three things:

First, it appropriates $14 million in fiscal year 1985 for humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic opposition.

Second, this assistance is to be administered by the Agency for International Development.

Third, the Michel amendment urges the President to take steps to impose a trade embargo on Nicaragua if the Sandinistas do not negotiate in good faith with the Nicaraguan democratic opposition.

Now, let me state what the Michel amendment does not do:

The Michel amendment does not provide any military or paramilitary assistance to any group in or outside Nicaragua.

The Michel amendment only provides funds during fiscal year 1985 for humanitarian assistance. The statutory prohibitions against any type of military assistance are not repealed, they continue throughout the entire period that these funds are available.

The Michel amendment does not authorize the CIA to administer this overt humanitarian assistance.

The Michel amendment does not place in a permanent statutory language a prohibition against further U.S. aid. This is not another Clarke amendment.

The Michel plan does not support the Sandinista government and it does not punish our friends and allies by saddling them with an enormous refugee problem.

Ten days ago the President of Honduras and the Foreign Minister of Costa Rica told me that "This is a vital year for Central America." This is not a year that the United States should waiver in its commitment to peace, freedom, and democracy in the region.

In a nutshell, the Michel amendment sends the right signals:

It signals our commitment for those who fight for democracy in Central America.

It signals our commitment to a peaceful resolution to the internal conflicts in Nicaragua.

It provides the Sandinistas with an incentive to end their internal repression and external subversion.

The Michel plan is a realistic, common sense amendment which deserves broad congressional support.

The Michel amendment may not go as far as I may personally wish it to go, and it may go further than others may prefer.

However, I think the Michel amendment is an amendment we all can and should support.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman for yelding.

I am one of the Members who in the past has voted against military aid, and I stick to that position. But I do see some useful aspects to the Michel substitute, and I want to have some of my questions explained and clarified.

There has been some debate, both privately and in the press, as to whether AID—and we just heard part of that discussion—has the statutory authority to administer the humanitarian aid provided by the substitute. Does the Michel substitute grant adequate legal status to AID so that it may perform these duties?

There has also been some speculation that the funds granted to AID could in fact be administered by the CIA. What guarantees and assurances can you give me that this diversion will not take place?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. In response to the gentlewoman's question, on section 2 of the Michel amendment, it is very specific on that point. The Administrator of the Agency for International Development shall have such powers as may be necessary and proper to carry out section 1 of this joint resolution, notwithstanding any other provision of law relating to the administration, disbursement, or use of appropriated funds.

I think the point is there "notwithstanding any other provision of law," so they do have ample protection there.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. The second question: The Michel substitute contains no provision that would prohibit the CIA or any other organization from utilizing funds from other sources for military assistance to the Contras. To what extent would legal prohibitions remain which would prevent the CIA from allocating other moneys for military assistance to the Contras?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Again, in response to the gentlewoman's question, the Michel amendment provides only fiscal 1985 money. The prohibitions on military assistance to the Contras in fiscal 1985 continue to apply under the Michel amendment. Prohibitions are in section 8066, Department of Defense Appropriaton Act, 1985, and in section 801, fiscal 1985 Intelligence Authorization Act.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman. That is very helpful.

The substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] does not speak to the question of a cease-fire or the Contadora process, but the President, I know, has sent a letter to this House that is very explicit on that part of the issue.

Mr. MICHEL. If the gentlewoman will yield, that is true, and when I take some time I will specifically enumerate those provisions of the President's letter that are appropriate to this debate.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I thank the gentleman. This has been very helpful to me.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4½ minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN].

□ 1700

Mr. MCCAIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few points, one of them, to start with, is in regards to the very eloquent statement made by the subcommittee chairman, Mr. BARNES, concerning all of the commitments that he said we were given by the Sandinistas, and he said we would be calling the bluff of the Sandinistas. Lifting of censorship; free elections; all the freedoms might be reinstalled if the United States terminates its support of the Contras.

In every single hearing that we have had of almost every witness and nearly every spokesman on both sides have declared that an integral part of the peace process in Nicaragua is dialog with the Contras, with the freedom fighters. Just as our subcommittee chairman justifiably demanded last year that the Salvadoran government and Mr. Duarte engage in negotiations with the rebels in El Salvador. What Mr. BARNES failed to mention, either on purpose or because he is unaware, is the statement of the Nicaraguan Government broadcast this morning over Managua Radio Sandino Network. I quote:

In conclusion, the Nicaraguan government wishes to reiterate its firm, irreverable position that it will never accept any kind of a dialog with the mercenary forces directed and financed by the U.S. government regardless of the pretext to stage this dialog.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCAIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARNES. I think the gentleman makes a very important point here, and I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. McCAIN. I wish you had mentioned it when you were speaking.

Mr. BARNES. I agree with the gentleman that the Government in Nicaragua should sit down and talk with the opposition within its own country. If the gentleman will recall, not less than 18 months ago, the Government of El Salvador issues statements almost identical in wording to the one the gentleman from the Sandinista government, saying we will never talk under any circumstances; there will be no dialog; it is impossible to talk to these people. What I am suggesting is maybe we will see the same kind of change in Nicaragua. Maybe we will not, but we are hoping that taking the steps that we have urged in the Hamilton approach will bring us that.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the subcommittee chairman. His version of history and mine are dramatically different. In fact, I was down in El Salvador before the elections, which you stated last year would cause Mr. Duarte to be in trouble with the Army if he won. This is a quote from your floor statement against military aid to El Salvador. Napoleon Duarte ran on the promise that he would negotiate with the rebels, and the Salvadoran people supported him on that, and they elected him, and now El Salvador has a legislature which strongly supports him.

So I do not believe the subcommittee chairman is accurate.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCAIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. In support of what the gentleman said, the Managua Domestic Service in Spanish dated yesterday, April 23, question:

Commander, can you tell us something more about the proposal that you made and sent through the two Congressmen and that Mr. Shutz has described as a fraud?"

Ortega:

We were exchanging views with the Congressmen. The truth is that we have presented nothing new, as Mr. Shultz and President Reagan's spokesmen have tried to imply. Instead, we simply arranged the peace proposals that Nicaragua has always made. Since these are logical and reasonable proposals, they have been well received.

We all know what those have been and what they have led to.

Mr. McCAIN. Thank you. May I just add to that, according to the Associated Press, Mr. Ortega this morning was asked about President Reagan's statement that there are Soviet military advisors in war zones in Northern Nicaragua. Ortega said:

The Reagan administration is trying to use symbols to try to impress Congress in that way so that it will approve of his warmongering plan.

You notice that Mr. Ortega did not deny the presence of Soviet troops in Northern Nicaragua. I would just like to as quickly as possible say that if we allow 6 months to go by, the Sandinistas will consolidate the revolution. They are building free-fire zones; they are relocating thousands of people in order to consolidate their power. At the same time, the freedom fighters will have extreme difficulty staying in existence.

We need to support the Michel amendment to give these people a chance and for us all to support, I hope in a bipartisan fashion, negotiations, a cease-fire, mediation by the Bishops, and a peaceful resolution to this very difficult issue.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I have had an unusual advantage the last couple of days. I have had to spend most of the time at home recovering from an operation, and I have watched this whole debate on television. Let me say that what is coming across to the television viewers is an outstanding discussion of what American foreign policy in Central America ought to be, regardless of your position on the particular issue.

There is a considerable consensus on both sides, at least among most of the people on both sides, despite some of the overblown rhetoric that I have heard. There is a consensus that we do not like the Sandinista government. I have not heard anybody defending the Sandinista government. I do not like the Sandinista government.

There is also a consensus that we ought to do something, with the powers available to the United States, to get that government to moderate some of its policies. I do not think there is a consensus that we ought to make them cry "Uncle," and try to force them to become a model U.S.-type of democracy, much as we would like to. But there is agreement as to certain interests that we and the neighbors of Nicaragua have. One is that the Sandinistas not try to use force and violence to export their revolution. Another is that they do not become a base for Soviet or Cuban military activity in Central America. We all agree on that. So there is agreement that we do not like the Sandinista government, and that some of the policies of that government ought to be changed. The basic disagreement is not over what kind of government Nicaragua should have but what kind of a government should the United States have. The question is whether our Government is going to follow policy that is consistent with our tradition of decency, of respect for law, of abhorrence of violence and terrorism, of openness and honesty toward the American people and the Congress. That is what debate is all about.

If you want to understand why a lot of people on my side of the aisle are voting the way they are, it is because we have been down this road before in Vietnam, and I do not need to recount what all that involved.

The real question is how do we use the powers of the United States to protect our interests and those of our friends in Latin America and at the same time, avoid escalating a war and getting in bed with some people who are doing things that would make any good American ashamed to be any part of that kind of activity.

Now, the problem I have with the gentlemen who are supporting the amendment that has been offered by Mr. MICHEL, is that they have not really said they are not going to use the military option. They have not said they intend to focus on the Contadora process, to use diplomacy and use our economic and other powers and mobilize opinion to get the Sandinistas to meet certain basic requirements of human decency and respect for the territorial and political integrity of their neighbors.

They continue to favor military options as the prime method for dealing with the Sandinistas. That is where we part company. There is nothing in the Michel amendment that puts the administration in a position where it cannot keep right on doing what it is doing; Supporting the Contras surreptitiously, giving them logistical support so, come the end of the fiscal year, they can go right on as though the Boland amendment and all of the policies we have hammered out here never existed. So it is clear where we need to focus if we are to get a constructive policy worked out. Thanks to the chairman of the committee, Mr. BARNES, and Mr. HAMILTON and the bipartisan supporters of the Hamilton resolution, we have the groundwork laid for that kind of an approach.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, please, please listen to these horrible examples of persecution in Nicaragua researched by Laura Ingraham, senior research fellow at the Council for Inter-American Security.

The nine comandantes know that in the end the religious faith of the people of Nicaragua will be their undoing. That is why they persecute religion. Laura Ingraham documents carefully.

RELIGIOUS PERSECUTION IN NICARAGUA

Totalitarian regimes are, by the inner logic of their ideology, violently opposed to religion. On the practical level any state which seeks total centralization of all power cannot allow an independent authority to stand aside and criticize their actions, especially not one which will criticize from the vantage point of transcendent morality. On the deeper level of ideology totalitarians, in a powerful perversion of our Judaeo-Christian heritage, believe that the state is the true salvific vehicle for a secular transformation of man into god. These humanist utopians therefore demand absolute allegiance to the state and will tolerate no competition in the arena of salvation history.

Although the Sandinista rulers of Nicaragua are self-admitted Marxist-Leninists, many had hoped that they would be different. Nicaraguan Christians of all denominations favored replacing Somoza with a more democratic government and originally supported the new regime. The enthusiastic endorsement of North American Christians was even more marked. One visitor, a Catholic priest from Michigan, proclaimed in 1983 that "the reign of God has arrived in Nicaragua." Unfortunately, however, the evidence of serious religious persecution documents that life in Nicaragua today is in fact an ongoing Calvary.

Religious faith runs deep in Nicaragua, especially among the poor. Thus the Sandinistas developed a novel program to eradicate this religious influence. Their two-pronged attack consists of serious covert persecution reinforced by occasional overt persecution. This covert persecution is founded upon using radical Christians, who are Marxist revolutionaries first and Christians second, to reinterpret Christian beliefs in ways that turn them into Marxist tenets of man and society. Father Ernesto Cardenal, Sandinista minister of culture, bluntly states, "Christ led me to Marx" and "For me, the four Gospels are all equally Communist" (National Catholic Reporter, Sept. 7, 1984). Then these Marxist Christians openly attack and undermine the orthodox church members and leaders, thus sparing the Sandinistas the onus of such action. Once the church is divided, the government is more able to control it directly, as is now happening.

Shocking evidence of the Sandinistas' fundamental hospitality to religious practice is revealed in plans for their first Christmas. A scant four months after the revolution, Julio Lopez, head of propaganda and political education for the FSLN, addressed a memo to the regional leaders of the FSLN:

* * * we are working to reorient the celebration of Christmas. We want to make it a special day for the children, one with a different content, fundamentally political * * *. Only five months after the triumph of the Revolution, it would be rather foolish to directly confront a tradition of more than 1979 years * * *. Sixty-two years of revolution in the Soviet Union have not been enough to completely eradicate this religious tradition. Therefore, to pretend to uproot such a tradition from our people in such a short period of time could only constitute a petit bourgeois revolutionary attitude.

Beside showing that from the start the Sandinistas took the Soviet Union as their model, this memo clearly depicts their willingness to work covertly, over a long period of time, to "completely eradicate this religious tradition."

The first groups to be targeted for overt persecution were the less mainstream religions: the small Jewish community, the Moravians, Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, 7th Day Adventists, and Pentecostals. Nicaraguan Jews have been so intimidated by anti-Semitic actions including death threats, confiscation of property and businesses, and the torching and eventual confiscation of the only synagogue in Nicaragua, that most have fled the country.

The campaign to destroy the Pentecostals is well testified to by one miraculous survivor, campesino and Pentecostal preacher Prudensio de Jesus Baltodano Silva. In Washington this past May to testify before Congress and the Organization of American States (OAS), he told a nightmare story of torture at the hands of a specialized army unit made up of Sandinistas and Cubans. Exclaiming "You still don't know what we do to the evangelical pastors," the soldiers severely beat Baltodano, cut off his ears, slit his throat and left him to bleed to death, taunting him to pray to God to save him. Not so fortunate was 80-year-old fellow Pentecostal pastor Miguel Flores, who was grotesquely tortured and murdered by the Sandinistas (Washington Times, May 4, 1984).

According to journalist Kate Rafferty of the Open Doors News Service, "Campus Crusade for Christ has suffered a great deal of harassment, including office break-ins and the beating of leaders." When questioned by the Institute on Religion and Democracy about a National Council of Churches report which alleges that five Nazarene churches were "lost" because of contra attacks, Miss Rafferty responded:

I've travelled throughout Nicaragua and spoken with hundreds of pastors and church members, and I've never heard of such an incident. Moreover, according to the National Council of Evangelical Pastors (a Nicaraguan Protestant body of over 520 pastors from 65 denominations), none of their churches have been attacked by the contras. Actually the Sandinistas tend to think that evangelical churches near the border might help the anti-Sandinista guerillas. The government has ordered a numbered of these churches closed. (emphasis added)

The greatest tragedy, however, is the Sandinista persecution of the Miskito, Sumo and Rama Indians on Nicaragua's desolate Atlantic coast. The Sandinistas have never acknowledged the Miskitos' local system of government and started immediately in 1979 (long before any contra activity in the area) to replace Indian councils with Sandinista Defense Committees. When the Indians resisted, the Sandinistas initiated a brutal cultural levelling campaign. According to testimony from the Indians' Council of Elders, in January and February 1982 alone:

The FSLN with the pretext of 'spreading national sovereignty' destroyed 49 communities, burning more than 4,000 houses, and then, so that no one could return to their land of origin, cut down the fruit trees, shot all the domestic animals . . . and forced the persons that lived there to begin a forced march that took 11 to 15 days in order to arrive at the different concentration camps . . .

As inhuman as these policies are, however, the Miskitos most resent the religious oppression. More than 55 churches (mostly Moravian) were destroyed by 1982 with many ministers either killed or forced into exile. Berkely professor Bernard Nietschmann reported to the OAS that churches were used as jails and army barracks; Bibles and hymn books were destroyed; Sandinista soldiers desecrated churches by such methods as defecating and urinating in them and burnt many as well. He summarized the grave Sandinista oppression: "The Miskitos are a very religious people, and they have suffered greatly from the denial of their freedom of religion. In almost all of my discussions with hundreds of Miskito men and women, this was a principal grievance they reported to me."

The partially covert persecution of the Catholic Church, while not yet as violent as that experienced by minority denominations, is in the long-run more destructive of all religious freedom. The alliance of revolutionary Christians who preach a radical liberation theology, with the Sandinistas, works to politicize the Gospel and divide the Church. They teach that to be a true Christian one must be committed to the Revolution. The political implication of this view is that those Christians who are not members of the FSLN are not really Christian. Therefore, anyone who is not a party member is an enemy of the people and of Christ as well. Following this reasoning, it has been easy for both the Sandinistas and the radical Christians to deny any charges of religious persecution: those non-Sandinista Christians who are oppressed are not, after all, Christians but only reactionaries masquerading as religious men and women.

Ex-Sandinista Humberto Belli, in his extraordinarily well-documented book Nicaragua: Christians Under Fire, notes with great insight: "In practice the revolutionary Christians do not preach to Marxists in order to attract them to Jesus Christ, but to Christians in order to attract them to Marx." Much of this preaching occurs in the parallel Sandinista church, the "People's Church."

Modeled after similar parallel churches in Communist countries such as China, Marxist theologians preach the existence of two churches: the church of the "poor," the People's Church of pro-Sandinista Christians, and the church of the "rich," the institutional Church of the Catholic hierarchy. The Sandinistas have joined in this campaign with Barricada, the official Sandinista newspaper, promoting a pro-Sandinista priest, Fr. Arias Caldera, as "the Archbishop of the Poor." Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo, the actual Archbishop of Managua, explained to the National Catholic Register (July 29, 1984) that the People's Church (or Popular Church) and the Sandinistas are "the same thing."

Attacks on Archbishop Obando y Bravo have reached the point of labeling him "the anti-Christ," while a recent cartoon in "Barricada shows the archbishop with a hammer and boards as he converts a cross into a swastika" (National Catholic Reporter, Sept. 7, 1984). These smears conveniently ignore the fact that Somoza in his turn attacked Obando as a "communist".

Obando, usually accused of holding reactionary aristocratic sentiments, in fact is of humble Indian and mulatto ancestry and is immensely popular with the poor Nicaraguans for his practical sharing of their sufferings. A country pastor before his unexpected promotion to archbishop in 1970, he rode a donkey throughout his rural mountain pastorate living as his peasant parishioners did. He organized the first peasant union in Nicaragua and strongly denounced Somoza's human rights violations, which resulted in one attempt on his life.

Open persecution of the Catholic Church accompanies the insidious covert persecution. In 1981 the Sandinistas suspended the Church's only remaining access to television, the televised Mass celebrated by the Archbishop of Managua. Next the Catholic radio was forbidden to broadcast for a month and finally, in March 1982, a State of Emergency which included full censorship of all media was declared (Belli). Agents from the ministry of interior now read all the material to be broadcast over the radio 24 hours in advance (National Catholic Reporter, Ibid.).

Even Pope John Paul II is not exempt from this censorship. In June 1982 he sent a pastoral letter to the people of Nicaragua condemning the Marxist People's Church, but the government banned its publication. Only after vigorous protests and three closings of La Prensa, the opposition newspaper, was the ban finally lifted.

The "Turbas Divinas," or Divine Mobs—FSLN militants from the neighborhood Sandinista Defense Committees—began in late 1981 to physically attack Catholic priests and bishops. Miguel Bolanos Hunter, defector from the Sandinista State Security apparatus, explains that Tomas Borge, FSLN founder and current minister of interior, created the divine mobs and organized them so that "State Security controls them" (interview with Institute on Religion and Democracy, Dec. 1983).

The first mob incident was against the then-bishop of Juigalpa, Pablo A. Vega and was followed in a few weeks by an attack on Archbishop Obando's jeep (Belli). The turbas continue their harrassment of orthodox priests. The National Catholic Reporter (Sept. 7, 1984) notes that on June 17, 1984, in the town of El Sauce, "nearly 300 turbas tried to break up a Mass officiated by Nicaragua's nine bishops. Several fist fights broke out between the turba members and nearly 3,000 people attending the Mass."

A June 20, 1984 communique of the Bishops Conference of Nicaragua decries the escalating persecution and recalls eight major examples including:

The Sandinista sacrilege of the Pope's March 1983 Mass in Managua. (Bolanos Hunter has revealed in great detail how Sandinista security disrupted the Mass.)

The Christmas exodus to Honduras in December 1983 of Bishop Salvador Schlaefer and over one thousand Miskitos. During this exodus, the Sandinistas falsely broadcast the supposed kidnapping and assasination of the bishop by the contras, to cover-up their own attempts to kill him.

The expulsion for unproven accusations of six priests and three nuns over the last few years. (The July 1984 expulsion of ten priests raises the total number to 19).

The many times that trained mobs have profaned liturgical celebrations with slogans and shouting.

The crudely fabricated attempt to publicly humiliate Father Bismark Carballo, director of public relations for Archbishop Obando, with a supposed love-tryst. (Bolanos Hunter explains "the husband wasn't the husband; they weren't making love, they were just having lunch. I mean, everything was fabricated. The girl was an agent of Security. Everyone was part of the plan.")

The Episcopal conference issued the above-mentioned June 20 communique to denounce the Sandinistas when they framed Father Luis Amado Pena, a priest well-known for his truly Christian work in the poor slums, and claimed that he was carrying explosives to a contra group. After the bishops defended Fr. Pena, the turbas stormed his Mass, threatened the congregation and, according to Archbishop Obando, climbed up to the top of the Church and began to rip off the roof.

Finally, in July, the archbishop led a protest march of over 300 people as "a pilgrimage of solidarity and support for Father Pena." The Sandinistas' shocking retaliation caused an international outcry when on the same day Tomas Borge expelled ten key foreign priests for "carrying out labors against the government." The Pope called the action "openly harmful to the Church" and "a painful, particularly grave event" (July 12, 1984 New York Times, Washington Times). He was joined by the Archbishop of San Jose, Costa Rica, the Episcopal conferences of Bolivia, Colombia, Chile, Mexico, and Guatemala, and the government of Spain—all of whom made strong protests to the Nicaraguan Government.

In the United States, Bishop James W. Malone of Youngstown, President of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, criticized the expulsions as "unjustified and detrimental to the cause of justice and peace." Both he and Cardinal Joseph Bernardin of Chicago cited the Pope's condemnation of Borge's action.

This serious violation of the Church's freedom caused Archbiship Obando y Bravo to affirm publicly that the situation of the Church now is "worse" than it was under Somoza (Diario Las Americas, July 12, 1984). Obando also told the National Catholic Register (July 29, 1984) that "this government is totalitarian . . . an enemy of the Church . . . they are hurting the poor."

These are damning words, for the archbishop at one time supported the Sandinistas. Beginning in 1971 the Bishops Conference, under Obando, issued pastoral letters repeatedly calling for a genuine Christian response to abuses from Somoza. These letters culminated on June 2, 1979, when the bishops proclaimed the right of the people to engage in revolutionary insurrection. Archbishop Obando actually celebrated a Mass of Thanksgiving when the FSLN entered Managua a few weeks later.

In November 1979 another pastoral letter fully endorsed the revolutionary process but added that it must follow guidelines such as: freedom of expression, political parties, religious practice and education. The bishops kept to these guidelines; the Revolution did not. By Easter 1984, the Episcopal Conference issued a Pastoral Letter of Reconciliation which condemned the People's Church for abandoning ecclesiastical unity, surrendering to the tenets of materialism and sowing confusion through a disinformation campaign within and without Nicaragua. It also called for peace through a sincere dialogue which would have to include the contra groups.

With the massive evidence of serious religious persecution in Nicaragua, why is there still such confusion in the United States about the reality of this persecution?

This confusion is a testimony to the great success of the Sandinistas' new tactic of religious subversion: co-option through the establishment of parallel institutions. Archbishop Obando warned the N.C. Register in his July 29, 1984 interview:

The first thing that the North American Church needs is good information. They receive a lot of information from the Popular Church and the Sandinistas—which is the same thing. The government here manipulates all the groups that come. And any letter that we send to the bishops never arrives there.

As an example, liberal Catholic "peace and justice" groups such as the Jesuit founded Center of Concern send fact-finding trips to Nicaragua, talk with Sandinistas Daniel Ortega and Fr. Fernando Cardenal, S.J., and conclude "I don't understand why John Paul II looks at it as persecution" (Fr. Philip Land in Washington Post, July 23, 1984).

Congressional testimony from Catholic bishops and staff members of the U.S. Catholic Conference (USCC)—which does not represent the teaching authority of the Church, nor even the majority opinion of the U.S. bishops—has minimally criticized a "pattern of harassment," especially the Marxist indoctrination required in the educational system, while also opposing U.S. aid to the contras and supporting U.S. economic assistance to Nicaragua. Elliott Abrams, assistant secretary of state for human rights and humanitarian affairs, noted in an interview with the Catholic newspaper the Wanderer, that the bishops haven't spoken out more strongly against the religious persecution because "the information the bishops are getting from the Church is coming from a very small group of people at the USCC who are sending biased collections of facts reflecting their own political views" (Feb. 9, 1984).

The Protestant churches seem to suffer from the same problem of disinformation. In September 1983 a World Council of Churches delegation visited Nicaragua, met with no members of the local Catholic hierarchy, and reported that "there is complete freedom of worship" in Nicaragua (Religious News Service, Sept. 30, 1983). The National Council of Churches (NCC) states that it is an "error" to infer "that the Nicaraguan Government has mounted an 'attack upon the Christian churches of Nicaragua.' Protestant and evangelical churches in this country have received no evidence to substantiate such a claim" (statement of July 20, 1984).

Apparently the NCC does not consult the National Association of Evangelicals. The NAE, according to one of its spokesmen, "hasn't spoken out in clear fashion" about religious persecution in Nicaragua because they are "trying to protect" their member churches there from the repercussion of increased persecution. This fear is well-founded as leaders of the National Council of Evangelical Pastors (CNPEN) currently are being harassed by the Regional Sandinista Defense Committee because of the Institute on Religion and Democracy's interview with Kate Rafferty (see above, p.2).

A final example of the success of Sandinista disinformation is the controversy over CEPAD, the Nicaraguan Evangelical Committee for Aid to Development. CEPAD was established as relief and development group to receive overseas financial support after the 1972 earthquake. It now is accepted in the U.S. as speaking for Nicaraguan Protestants, and the NCC proudly admits it provides "substantial financial and material resources for CEPAD's programs." Yet CEPAD is but another religious institution co-opted by the Sandinistas, which, according to Kate Rafferty, withholds funds from pastors who are "viewed as insufficiently supportive of the Sandinistas," and recently even "donated eleven four-wheel drive vehicles for use by the Sandinista police." CNPEN split from CEPAD two years ago because of such compliance with Marxist manipulation. Sandinista disinformation, institutional co-option, and covert/overt persecution reveals the new face of totalitarian technique.

Mr. KASICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, several weeks ago I stood on this floor and argued that America is a good, decent, just nation. I said we ought to, as Americans, shed the guilt that too many Members of Congress carry on this floor. I said the "Blame America First" crowd is wrong. I said that we are a good, just, and decent people and stood on the high-moral ground and argued that the tradition of this country has been to go to the ends of the Earth to help people in need. Whether they are hungry. whether they are sick, or whether they are victims of natural or manmade disasters, our legacy is to help.

Why do we do it? We do it because we are good. We do it to provide a decent way of life for human beings, to give them a chance to control their own lives, to control their own destiny, to secure them from the jaws of death and, yes, ladies and gentleman, to secure them from the jaws of repression.

Yes, I made this statement, if you will recall, as this House voted $1 billion in aid to Africa, including aid to Communist Ethiopia, whose leaders have aggravated the problems in their nation, whose leaders are more interested in relocation and more interested in resettlement and in consolidating their power than in feeding starving people. In fact, Communist leaders have used trucks that could have carried grain to starving people to relocate resisters to their regime in northern Ethiopia. These are the same Communist leaders who spent $10 million celebrating the Marxist revolution while America watched with horror the tragedy of starving millions who desperately needed that $10 million in foodstuffs.

This body has approved aid to Communist Angola. This body has approved aid to Communist China. This body has approved aid to Communist Mozambique and, of course, this body, believe it or not, has approved in the past $118 million in aid to the Sandinistas, until even Jimmy Carter, America's leading Democrat ostrich, recognized the repression and called for a halt.

Is it too much to provide $14 million in humanitarian aid to freedom fighers, people who want to determine their own destiny, people who want freedom of the press, people who want freedom of speech and freedom of religion, like the Moskito Indians, who are willing to fight and die for freedom? Does it not make sense to provide aid to these kinds of people at the same time we provide aid to Communist Ethiopia and Communist Angola and Communist Mozambique and Communist Red China, yet we do not want to give $14 million in humanitarian aid to freedom fighters in Nicaragua who desire nothing more than the freedom of press and freedom of speech and to have a pluralistic society?

I am at a loss to understand how anyone can vote humanitarian aid to a Communist government, whose tactics in delivering that aid are highly questionable, while at the same time voting to deny humanitarian aid to people who have as their goal a free, pluralistic society that guarantees human dignity to its citizens.

In light of this, ladies and gentlemen, why should we not support humanitarian aid to freedom fighters against the government that we all agree censors the press, subverts its neighbors, hosts Cuban, Soviet, and East German advisers, and clearly promotes Communist doctrine and simply denies basic rights to its citizens?

We are now not debating military assistance, but with the Michel amendment we are saying to those forces in Nicaragua who oppose communism and support human rights and freedoms that the United States stands ready and willing to give you basic human relief and human assistance, and to single you out as a group who deserves America's support.

Let us take the moral high ground once again. Let us shed the guilt too many carry. Let us recognize America's basic decency and be consistent in our support of needy people throughout the world.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, the tragedy of the Michel substitute is that it does nothing to end the killing and to end the violence that is taking place in Nicaragua. It does nothing to change the activities and the actions of the Contras that has come to light over the past several months in terms of the atrocities that have been committed by those individuals.

What it does is to continue us on the same road that we have been on for some time now, a road that was started in 1981, and now we are out of control. It continues the effort by the CIA to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua and inflict punishment on the people of Nicaragua by engaging the Contras to conduct warfare inside of the borders of that sovereign country.

This amendment simply says that we will provide all of the logistical support for the Contras, direct aid to the Contras by the United States of America, and then I suspect what we will find out is the same private organizations that have been raising money to support the Contras will provide the guns and the munitions.

I think we ought to be concerned about that. We have heard an awful lot of people in this Chamber over the last couple of days talk about keeping pressure on the Sandinistas. Let me suggest to you that very few of the Sandinista leaders, if any, will feel the pressure you are talking about, but scores more of Nicaraguan citizens will feel that pressure, will feel that violence, will feel the murder that has engaged their country for the past 3 years because they are the ones who are feeling the pressure.

That is a nice euphemism because what you are talking about doing is continuing the killing, the taking of lives, the violence against these citizens, so that somehow that may be translated to the Sandinista government and they will cry "uncle." How many more women, how many more children, how many more men, how many more civilians will you have the Contras kill before you have reached the threshold that you would desire the Sandinista government to say "uncle," because that is who is paying the price for the war that we are conducting.

What this is is a declaration by the Congress that we will go back from the time when we cut off aid over the last several votes in the House of Representatives. We are now saying we will go forth and we will provide something called humanitarian aid, but what we are really providing is the logistical support for the prosecution of this war against Nicaraguan citizens.

There is no question that many Nicaraguan, Sandinista soldiers have been killed, but the toll of civilians has run into the thousands, and as we have seen time and again as the footage has come back into our living rooms, as the news magazines have come back into our living rooms, time and again we have seen the victims of the Contras who have been members of the private sector who were trying to harvest coffee, coffee pickers who were trying to help them harvest their coffee who were killed for that act and that act alone, people who have tried to harvest cotton to keep the economy going have been killed for that act and for that act alone. People who went out and recruited workers to come onto their plantations and to harvest cotton have been killed for that reason and that reason alone.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, if those facts are as the gentleman says, if those are facts, why are hundreds of thousands of people fleeing Nicaragua and why are people fleeing the Army down there and joining the Contras voluntarily?

□ 1720

Mr. MILLER. of California. Hundreds of thousands of people are fleeing Nicaragua for the same reason they have fled El Salvador and for the same reason they have fled Guatemala, because they are fleeing the violence, because what we have now created is almost free-fire zones in whole sectors of the area. And the war knows little difference at this point, because we now have the Sandinista leaders and the Contra leaders both saying there is no difference between military and civilian targets, there is no difference between the farm co-op and the military garrison. As they said when they killed the four little children, they said the Sandinistas put guns in those children's hands and they were military targets.

That is the ugly side of war. I have talked with these people as they fled the violence in El Salvador. I have met with them in Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I have met with them in Mexico as they have fled the violence of Guatemala, and the fact of the matter is, as in every war, the civilians pay a much higher price.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, when I was in Nicaragua, I heard it said that they were chasing young people down the street to force them into the military, and my question or the second part of my question is: If it was so good with the Sandinistas and so bad with the Contras, why are people fleeing the military and joining the Contras?

Mr. MILLER of California. That is not the question. The reality is that of war. It is not a question of whether it is so good to be with the Sandinistas or so good to be with the Contras. The fact of the matter is that thousands of citizens have been caught in between them and they have been killed by the bullets and they have been killed by the knives. It makes little difference to them and to their families who has killed them.

But the fact of the matter is that the violence we are now being asked to underwrite with taxpayers' dollars is taking its toll. We sit in this Chamber and we kid ourselves that this is pressure. That is a fantastic euphemism. But the fact of the matter is, what "pressure" is translated into is death and violence in Nicaragua against the citizens of that country. We ought not to be part of that. We have been told by our Latin neighbors that we ought not to be part of that. We have been told that they would rather pursue the diplomatic path.

They are the ones who are supposed to be threatened by the Sandinistas. Yet, those very nations, the leaders of those nations are saying, "Don't do this. Don't provide this kind of assistance to the Contras." And you know what? When I visited Nicaragua better than a year and a half ago, we asked them what was going to happen with this war, and our own Embassy people and staff sat there in the room and they said, "It is going to be counterproductive. It is going to allow all the things you and others have said you don't like about the Sandinistas. It will allow them to be able to consolidate their base."

And interestingly enough, somebody talked about the hungry children. We asked the Embassy what the Sandinistas have done best. They talked about health care, they talked about literacy, and they talked about feeding them. That does not make them a perfect government. But what I am saying is, if you think you can win the hearts and minds of the Nicaraguan people by killing them, you are making a dramatic mistake, and as they go to choose their partners, as we have seen in other Latin nations, I think they will stick with the Sandinistas and continue to be against the United States because this is the kind of violence we are perpetrating on their nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Chairman, the issue we are debating today will impact on U.S. policy responses to events in Latin America for some years to come. The issue is what is the proper U.S. policy response which holds true to our founding principles of freedom and democracy, is effective and is not so belligerent as to alienate or threaten our allies in Latin America.

Does the United States have the right to militarily interfere in another country's internal affairs? In certain cases it does, when there is a clear threat to the United States and its allies. In this instance thus far, Congress has decided that such a threat does not yet exist and that we do not have the right to work for another government's overthrow with whom we have diplomatic and economic relations.

But, the United States does have the right to expect the governments in the world, and especially in this hemisphere, to act responsibly, to respect the rights of its citizens, and to respect the sovereignty of its neighbors.

A responsible neighbor does not threaten other countries with a military buildup, with menacing Marxist-oriented language and with a growing dependence on Cuba and the Soviet Union.

When a nation acts irresponsibly, the world community has the right to apply the necessary pressure to change its behavior. We are a great nation. We do not need to use military force or covert operations to pressure other nations. There are many other means which are both acceptable and effective.

The Michel substitute provides just such a program. It does not abandon the Contra forces, whom I believe, are sincere in their fight to establish a democracy and to provide a better life for the Nicaraguan people. In addition to humanitarian aid, it also provides incentives to the Sandinista government to negotiate with the democratic opposition with the use of economic sanctions.

Specifically it reads as follows, "The President is strongly urged and encouraged to take the steps necessary to impose an embargo on trade between the United States and Nicaragua if the Government of Nicaragua does not enter into good faith negotiations with the Nicaraguan democratic opposition."

The Nicaraguan economy is in shambles. The people are suffering severe deprivation as a result of the Sandinista's emphasis on military expenditures. We can and should use economic leverages, as well as political and diplomatic ones, to pressure the Sandinistas into behavior that will benefit their people. Equally important, we should by example urge the Soviets to provide humanitarian aid instead of military. I support the Michel substitute and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The previous speaker,the gentleman from California, made some misstatements that I would like to correct real quickly.

No. 1, the people of Nicaragua are fleeing because of the repression of the Sandinista government, and, No. 2, the young people down there are fleeing the military and joining the Contras in order to get their freedom back or get their country back.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Let me just say to my friend, the gentleman from California, who just spoke, that in his statments I see some tremendous misstatements that are belied by history. Really it was said by one of the gentlemen who preceded us that the Hamilton amendment, with its passage, is a success and a great thing, and that it follows the tradition of courage in this House. I think it follows the tradition of abandonment, because we encouraged the Cuban freedom fighters and abandoned them at the Bay of Pigs, and we encouraged the Cambodian resistance and we abandoned them.

And let me remind my friend, the gentleman from California, that the skulls of all the people who were killed by the Communists after we abandoned them in Cambodia following speeches very similar to those of very good will like that of the gentleman who just spoke, would not fill this Chamber.

Mr. MILLER of California. I would remind the gentleman that——

Mr. HUNTER. I am not going to yield. I have just a couple of minutes.

Mr. MILLER of California. Think about the scores of people who have died after speeches like yours, young man.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, let me just say that in Cambodia the policy of the U.S. Congress resulted in millions of people being killed by the Communists, not because we stayed out but because we abandoned them, and we are basically on the threshold, I think, with the Hamilton amendment, of doing that right now.

Let me just ask some of my friends—and maybe they can answer it on their own time because my time is drawing short—if you do not try to make the decision about who is good and who is bad in this war—and lots of statements have been made concerning that—and let us talk about the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union is building a 10,000-foot airfield in Punta Huete. It has got jet revetments, it has blast retention walls, it is a military airfield, and it is built to accommodate every single military aircraft that the Soviet Union builds. That puts the Backfire bomber, a nuclear-capable bomber, within a thousand miles of the United States.

This Congress must do something about that, and I would ask my friend, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES], if he could comment very briefly. What does he intend to do about the Soviet airfield that is going into Nicaragua right now, the 10,000-foot airfield that will accommodate military aircraft, including nuclear-capable, swept-wing bombers?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER] has expired.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that I be given an additional 30 seconds so the gentleman can answer that question.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, they have plenty of time over there.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address my remarks to those Members who voted yesterday to continue the policy which this House has had for the last 2½ years of not providing funding for the war which was started by the CIA under the direction of the Reagan administration.

No matter what the guise of the Michel amendment, it is really intended as a legitimization of the Contras, the counterrevolutionaries, who are fighting against the legitimate Government of Nicaragua, legitimate no matter how much any of us may dislike any number of things which they may have done. The reason this House has voted continuously, and yesterday by a margin of 68 votes, against continued funding of that war, no matter the guise of "humanitarian" assistance, is because the American people have made it clear in every single poll and survey that has been taken that they are opposed to American involvement in that war.

Two weeks ago the Gallup organization released the results of a survey that they had taken concerning the President's conduct of his office. Sixty-one percent of those questioned felt that Ronald Reagan did the kind of job as President that they approved of, but when those same people were asked whether they approved of the President's job performance in Nicaragua, only 26 percent of the American people said "Yes."

So again I urge the Members to keep faith with the American people and to keep faith with the vote that was taken yesterday and the three or four votes that were taken over the course of the past 2½ years in opposition to that war.

The amazing thing is that we are right now on the verge of having a diplomatic settlement of the Nicaraguan war.

□ 1730

The Contadora countries painstakingly over the course of the past 2 years have brought us to a position where there has not only been agreement on general principles, but they are now discussing the final stages of an agreement providing for the verification of the removal of outside military forces from Central America, the removal of military advisers and the reduction of armaments.

On April 11, the first day of the Contadora resumption meeting, a resolution that was drafted by the Contadora countries, with the assistance and involvement of the Canadian Government, was accepted in toto by the Nicaraguan representative.

The people who are looking for fine tuning at this point are Costa Rica, El Salvador, and Honduras. We are that close at this point to having a regional settlement.

Why in heaven's name would we want to be undermining that kind of regional effort which most of our friends in Latin America are supporting?

It will not do, it seems to me, to lump together every evil thing that anybody who has ever been a Marxist-Leninist committed and say that that is a reason to continue a war against 2½ million poverty stricken people who live in Nicaragua.

I must say as one who supported the United States boycott of the 1980 Olympics, and the suspension of grain sales to the Soviet Union because of its invasion of Afghanistan, to equate the people of Afghanistan who are fighting for their very existence with the counterrevolutionary forces led by Somoza's national guardsmen, debases the language and makes us party to an unholy act.

Let us uphold yesterday's action. Vote "no" on the Michel amendment.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX].

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I miss those days of bipartisan support on sensitive foreign affairs involving our country. In the last election Americans told this Congress that they had a fear that we had lost our will to even defend our legitimate interests around the world. Congress should listen to that message.

The majority of all our constituents believe that we have a legitimate interest in what happens in Nicaragua. A majority of all our constituents do not want American troops in Nicaragua. They do not want another Vietnam. Nicaragua's fight is for Nicaraguans; but a majority of this body wants financial assistance going to Nicaragua. We all agree on that. We even agree on the amount, $14 million on both sides of the issue.

The question really is who delivers the package and whether it can even be spent in the country in which it is intended to help, or do we want to force the people who we are trying to help to have to leave their own countries in order to be helped? What kind of help is that? I think the answer is very clear.

The money should now go for humanitarian purposes. The money if it is going to be American taxpayers' money should be handled by Americans. It should not be handled by the United Nations. It should not be handled by the Red Cross. It is our money.

It is our legitimate interest and we should handle it.

I support the Michel amendment.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield, will the gentleman from Louisiana yield?

Mr. BREAUX. If I have got 20 seconds, I will yield.

Mr. BARNES. Perhaps the gentleman is not aware that this is the way we normally provide money in humanitarian assistance, through AID, through the Red Cross, or through UNHCR or other such organizations.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Chairman, I support the Michel amendment.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Chairman, did you read the superb Washington Times lead editorial of April 22? Here it is:

HISTORY'S VICTIM, OR MASTER?

There is nothing inevitable about history, as the Soviets would have us believe. History is neutral, to be shaped by political and military leaders, not media stars and public opinion pollsters, which seems to be our new way of government. The "contra" games being played on Capitol Hill may seem like good clean democratic fun. However, the French Fourth Republic was brought to its knees with similar games. But what was tolerable for a medium-sized power like France in the throes of decolonization in the mid-1950s is a recipe for disaster for the world's only countervailing power in the mid-80s.

Whether an American president can still make history remains to be seen. The War Powers Act of 1973, like the Neutrality Act of the 1930s, has seriously undercut the executive in the exercise of its principal constitutional responsibility—national and international security.

History is not being made in Geneva at the arms limitation talks. It is being made in Central America—right now and not by the U.S., but by its enemies.

Whatever happened to President Kennedy's pledge, following the Cuban missile crisis, when he said, "The U.S. is determined to prevent by whatever means may be necessary, including the use of arms, the Marxist-Leninist regime of Cuba from extending, by force or the threat of force, its aggressive or subversive activities to any part of the hemisphere, and to prevent in Cuba the creation or use of an externally supported military capability endangering the security of the United States"? Analysts in Moscow or Havana watching recent congressional actions would be tempted to conclude that JFK's pledge is at this point so much rhetoric.

President Reagan has told us—correctly, in our judgment—that Central America is just as important to our strategic interests as NATO Europe or the Persian Gulf. With all due respect, Mr. President, you have not used the full powers of your office to prove your case.

Next to Alexander Solzhenitsyn and Vladimir Bukovsky, the Soviet writer Vladimir Maximov is doubtless the Russian exile who has most contributed to the Western awakening in the intellectual battle against totalitarianism. At a recent Paris conference, Mr. Maximov said that "today the fate of democratic civilization is being decided in Nicaragua and Afghanistan. If the West retreats in these two countries, it will simply be a question of time before the Western democracies perish." When people are no longer willing to fight and die to preserve their freedoms, when congressmen are not willing to authorize $14 million for people who are willing to fight and die to preserve our freedoms, then the totalitarian temptation cannot be far behind.

The "compromise" being fashioned to provide $14 million in "humanitarian" aid for the Nicaraguan resistance is no compromise: It is a resounding defeat for the president and a grotesque message to those who fight totalitarianism anywhere in the world.

We urge each member of Congress to read and ponder the letter Michael Novak wrote to Rep. Henry Hyde.

And, please, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, read this report from Diana Wilson at Rus Rus Refugee Camp, Honduras on March 20, 1985.

The Nicaraguan Sandinista government, supported by many church groups and liberal members of Congress, has another story to tell, say Nicaraguans living in the Rus Rus refugee camp in Honduras. These refugees tell of villages being bombed without warning, leaders killed and decapitated, and children forced to either join the Sandinista army or be taken away for education in Cuban run Marxist schools.

The refugee camp is located on the Ocho Rios river near the Nicaraguan border and is inhabited by members of the MISURA organization. MISURA is the abbreviation for Miskoto, Sumo, and Rama, the three Indian tribes that lived in the Northeast corner of Nicaragua prior to the revilution.

The MISURA report that more than 50,000 Indians have been killed and many more put in concentration camps in the last five years.

Gary Bennett and I went to Honduras and Nicaragua to see for ourselves if the shocking genocidal reports coming from the MISURA refuges were true. Bennett represented Civilian Military Assistance, a private group seeking to support Nicaraguans opposed to the Sandinista regime.

Prior to the Sandinista revolution, the MISURA were largely left alone, neither conscripted into the army nor forced politically to support Somosa. They lived as they had for centuries, hunting, fishing, and growing small crops in the jungles and forests, according to their deeply held ethnic and family traditions.

During the Sandinista revolution, however, the Black Creoles, who were more urbanized, fought against Somosa's forces. The Black Creoles are a mixture of Indian, French, English, and African ancestry. They lived in the eastern area of Nicaragua around Bluefields. They speak a native language as well as English and Spanish. Many have English names because the English controlled the area during the 1880's.

Efrim Smith fought as a Lieutenant in the Sandinista Army. He rejoiced at the fall of the dictator Somosa. After seven months under Sandinista leadership, he said, the political climate went sour.

A professional before the revolution, and the father of four children, Smith became alarmed when his children were forced to attend a Marxist indoctrinational school run by Cuban teachers. Although he continued to serve in the Army, he made his objections widely known. After four months of challenging the government to reinstate the normal school curriculum, he was arrested and imprisoned. Smith said, "I was treated well in prison because I had been considered a hero in the revolution." His captors felt that his daily "reeducation seminars" would eventually make him support the Marxist policies being forced on the country.

Smith wasn't allowed to see his family during this nine months imprisonment, but heard that they had been denied food coupons and were starving. He decided it would be necessary to appear to cooperate with the Sandinistas. He was released and given his Lieutenant commission back, but immediately escaped to Honduras when the the Sandinistas found out he was forming a group to fight the regime.

Smith has not communicated with his family for 2½ years because the Sandinistas are known to take the families of Contras hostage and kill them or torture them for information.

A literate and educated man, Smith reads American newspapers when he can get them. He says he is appalled and dismayed at the favorable world opinion of the Sandinistas. While in prison, he saw many men, women, and children tortured and killed because they would not support the Marxists or tell where the Contras were located.

Another Black Creole leader, Theofilo Archibald Willson, also suffered at the hands of the Sandinista torturers. Willson, in his fifties, was a farmer when he was elected leader of a small farming village in Nicaragua. He did not fight in the revolution or take sides, but protested when Cuban teachers came to his village in Nicaragua, rounded up the children at gun-point, and took them to Marxist learning camps. His protests earned him a prison sentence of 1½ years. While in prison, his fingernails were torn out with special pliers used for that purpose. He was also beaten repeatedly across the stomach and kidneys until unconscious.

Like Smith, he too after a time told his Sandinista captors he would cooperate and escaped. When freed he immediately escaped to a Costa Rican refugee camp. Willson said, he was then put aboard a small boat with 24 other refugees and set adrift with little food or water. Willson recounts that all but six people died on the way to the Honduran refugee camps.

Today Willson wears his hair in a ponytail and says he will never cut it again until his country and family are free. His fingernails have not grown back and he bears the disfigurement as a badge of what the Sandinistas are capable of doing. He too, does not understand the American church's infatuation with the Sandinista government. Daily refugees enter the Rus Rus refugee camp with little more than the clothes on their backs. Living in small hastily built huts to protect them from the elements, they live on a bare and sometimes starving existence. Many of the children have swollen bellies because of long term malnutrition and parasitic infections. Very few of the children have clothes and most are naked.

The Miskito and Sumo Indians seem to suffer the most, because of the upheaval of their traditional lifestyle. The Rama Indians were used to a completely independent existence in the jungles.

Old shrapnel wounds inflicted when villages were bombed without warning by the Sandinistas are as old as 4 or 5 years and festering in many of the refugees. Many have never received any medical attention and before escaping to Honduras were forced from camp to camp by the Sandinistas.

Because Rus Rus is not close to a major town and no highways exist to transport aide, it is the most impoverished of all the refugee camps in Honduras. Only recently a small generator donated by the Civilian Military Assistance group from Alabama runs six electric lights used for three hours at night.

A clinic and a hospital made from an abandoned army tent, houses untreated civilians and homeless orphaned children. Many of the children escaped, they say because they were playing in the jungles when the attack occurred. Diahrrhea is prevalent in all the children and many have died of it.

The camps day starts one hour before daylight at 4:30 a.m. The Indians are devout Christians and meet to sing hymns in their native language and Spanish. Afterwards they pray outloud individual prayers and listen to words of encouragement from their elders. The Indians say, that under the Sandinista regime, they would break up their predawn meetings at gun-point and Ministers were taken away and some were never heard again.

Although tribal by nature, the camp is a model of Democracy. Many cannot read or write, but have a tradition of electing their leaders. Women are given special status and their needs are listened to carefully before decisions are made.

The day our group arrived, a discussion was underway regarding a pregnant womans whose husband had died. She wanted to return to Nicaragua in order to have her baby with some of her family left there. Although she wanted to go back into an area controlled and protected by the Contras, the leaders of the camp felt it was a dangerous trip. However, they arranged for precious food and protection for the woman's return.

"Our group crossed into Nicaragua by dugout canoe where we went to see bombed and burned out villages. It had been reported in one bombed out village that more than 200 men, women and children had been killed there. Evidence of more than thirty huts burned to the ground could be seen. They had since been overgrown by bamboo and jungle undergrowth.

"Skulls showing evidence of having been shot in the back of the head were seen by our group. It was explained by Efrim Smith, that the leaders of the small village had been shot and decapitated then the heads stuck on stakes to warn the villagers not to come back into the area. The bodies of the victims had then been thrown into the river. Those who had escaped the bombing and attacks of the Sandinistas escaped across the river into the refugee camps of Honduras.

"At an undisclosed camp in Nicaragua, the Contras boasted that with the United States help they were able to protect a "nine-days-walk" area of Miskitos left in the area. And although they point out they have had no funding for almost a year, they are still able to protect a sizable area by capturing Sandinista convoys.

"Sandinistas, the Contras report still take patrols into the area and cross into Honduras where they fire upon contras and civilians alike. The Contras say they have wide support and when both groups are in an area, the civilians feed and protect them.

"Captured Sandinistas are taken into the Contra camps and treated well, it appears. Our group counted approximately thirtysix prisoners kept in an open compound. They were fed the same food as the rest of the camp and did not seem mistreated in any manner. Their primary duties were to clean the compound each morning.

"The prisoners were required to attend daily lectures on Christianity and the evils of Marxism. When asked why they were so lenient with the captured Sandinistas, the MISURA Contras say their religion forbids bad treatment of prisoners. They also reminded us that they too were Sandinistas at one time.

"One Contra camp leader said, that out of 110 captured Sandinista soldiers thirty-six had defected and were now a part of the main stream of "freedom fighters." One the leader said, had recently risen to the rank of captain. He added, that of those freed, none have returned to the Sandinistas.

"Most alarming to the Contras and the MISURA refuges along the border is news of a coming confrontation which is scheduled to occur after the rainy season is over in June. More alarming and not understood by them, is why they were abandoned nine months ago, by the United States. They do not understand how the American people can elect a President who is against Marxism, but cannot help them.

"Besides cutting off their only means of self-defense, food, clothing and medical care, they feel they will not be able to face the coming "holocaust." The Sandinistas have been trying to clear a large area of civilians twenty miles from its borders in order to launch a large offensive mopping up campaign.

"Soviet rocket-bearing helicopters with impenitrable defense shields have been seen in Managua and the Contras intelligence gatherers have said they will be used specifically against them. At this time, they do not have any kind of weapon to fight this type of terrible instrument of war, they say.

"Although the MISURA cooperate with the FDN, the do not want to be lumped with them, as the FDN receive public support from wealthy Nicaraguans living abroad, Cubans and other interested parties. The MISURA traditionally poor do not have any supporters or backers outside of their own refuge camps. Being resourceful and having a tradition of living from the land, they have been able to survive on a subsistance level without any outside help.

"However, extreme poverty, starvation and lack of medical attention has taken a great toll.

"The Honduran government already strapped by its own people and political problems and 40,000 documented refugees, cannot offer much help. The Hondurans although kind and sympathetic to the Miskitos plight, discourage them from growing crops because they are not legal residents of the land.

"Church and missionary help is rare and it was told to our group that the missionaries feel that if they help the refugees they well be branded as Contra sympathizers. Also many of their American congregations support the Marxist Sandinista government.

"And although Honduras has the largest number of Peace Corp volunteers in the American hemisphere, they too are politically strapped and cannot help the refugees.

"Alarming to the MISURA is a new church missionary group which has recently set up near the camp called the "Friends of the Americas." The "Friends" tell the refugees that the Sandinistas have "forgiven" them and want them to come back into Nicaragua. The MISURA are shocked by these statements of the "Friends" because of daily accounts of the horrors of civilians being forced from their homes and the continual influx of refugees.

"It is estimated by the MISURA office located in Tegucigalpa that before the revolution, there were more than 125,000 Miskito, 25,000 Suma and Rama Indians and 22,000 Black Creoles living peacefully in Nicaragua. An offical count by the MISURA estimate that more than 50,000 of their number have been killed and many more unaccounted for, possibly forced into concentration camps somewhere inside Nicaragua. Over 40,000 refugees have chosen to live in Nicaragua they say. Because the Sandinista government will not disclose even to relief and amnesty organizations how many are in the camps or imprisoned that number is not known, but it is estimated to be between 20,000 to 50,000 people.

"Willson and Smith say that the genocide of the MISURA and the Black Creoles have been going on for more than five years now and want to know why the American people and its press organizations have not addressed their plight. They also want to know why church groups support a government that suppresses and discourages religion of all kinds. They point out, that Americans seem to be more concerned with the plight of Africans more than 5,000 miles away, while their next door neighbors are being slaughtered and starved.

"While a Lieutenant in the Sandinista army and considered a hero, Smith said after the revolution and the takeover by Ortega he was made acutely aware that Ortegas Marxist government had full intention of destroying the peace of the rest of Central America and Mexico.

"The MISURA office in Tegucigalpa is highly aware of the fight for the 14-million dollar package proposed by President Reagan. They say that if the funding is not forthcoming, that the refugees along the border and the Contras left inside Nicaragua will not be able to withstand the next Soviet and Cuban backed onslaught. Castro's Cuba now under a full and far reaching dictatorship they say will be the model for Nicaragua and any other country scheduled to be the next target, and many millions more will flood to the United States to escape to freedom.

"Smith's goal, is to be put on the United Nations agenda and try to reach out to the rest of the world. He wants to speak as a Citizen of Nicaragua, an ex-Sandinista hero and now as a "freedom fighter" against a cruel and inhumane dictatorship not seen since the genocidal acts of Hitler's regime during World War Two."

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I spoke to you about my meeting last year in Nicaragua with Archbishop Obando y Bravo and how impressed I was with this leader of the Catholic Church who has called for a national reconciliation in his country and who is trying against mounting odds to bring justice to the citizens of Nicaragua.

His statements to me take on even more significance today as we learned that Archbishop Bravo was among a group of Catholic prelates, including Archbishop Bernard Law of Boston and Archbishop John J. O'Connor of New York, to be elevated to Cardinal by Pope John Paul II. This announcement indicates the Pope's confidence in Archbishop Bravo and underscores the outstanding humanitarian work of this Nicaraguan patriot.

It is important to remember that the Cardinal-elect is the same person who negotiated the release of Daniel Ortega during the revolution.

He is the person against whom Somoza fills his memoirs with invective and who Somoza once called Comandante Obando.

As we consider whether or not to provide $14 million in aid for food, clothing, medicine, and other humanitarian assistance for Nicaragua's democratic opposition, to be provided through the Agency for International Development, I believe it is important to heed the message of this soon-to-be cardinal in the Catholic Church for he speaks the truth about conditions in his country today: Cardinal-elect Bravo has said:

Marxism is trying to eliminate the Church in Nicaragua because Marxism is the enemy of the Church.

The Sandinista government intends to eliminate the Catholic Church in order to implant the so-called Popular Church.

We want to state clearly that this government is totalitarian * * *. We are dealing with a government that is an enemy of the Church.

The major part of the (Nicaraguan) people are unhappy but they are also afraid * * * we are fighting a monster that includes the Soviet Union, Bulgaria and Cuba * * * and this revolution could spread to Mexico or other parts of the hemisphere.

In the face of censorship of sermons and harassment of priests and churchgoers, Cardinal-elect Bravo still continues to pursue basic human rights and freedoms which the people of Nicaragua were promised after the 1979 revolution. He continues to be the true voice of the people, not the Popular Church which has been set up by the Sandinistas as a propaganda piece, and his faith is reflected in this statement:

We believe the Church will continue to exist, and history, which is the mother of life, teaches us that the Church has always witnessed the burial of those who persecute her.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this humanitarian aid package to keep the pressure on the Sandinista government to enter into good-faith negotiations with the democratic opposition and provide the people of Nicaragua with some hope for a future free from oppression.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia, my friend [Mr. WOLF], just referred to the elevation of some members of the church to the position of archbishop. One of those who was just announced by the Pope yesterday is the Most Reverend John J. O'Connor, archbishop, just elevated to the position of cardinal. He just returned with a delegation of representatives of the church in the United States from Nicaragua where they had extensive meetings with their colleagues in the church in Nicaragua. Upon their return after those meetings with their colleagues they issued a statement which was presented as testimony before my subcommittee, the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs. I will just read a couple sentences from Archbishop O'Connor, now Cardinal O'Connor's testimony before our committee. He said:

Direct military aid to any force attempting to overthrow a government with which we are not at war and with which we maintain diplomatic relations is illegal and in our judgment immoral and therefore cannot merit our support. We are convinced that such military aid undercuts the possibilities of a political solution within Nicaragua and jeopardizes the political process elsewhere in the region. We believe that it violates existing treaty obligations and undermines the moral standing of the United States within the international community.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNES. I am happy to yield.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the statement there by the cardinal now that he opposes military aid.

Is there anything before this Chamber presently that would include military aid?

Mr. BARNES. Yes; the Michel proposal is for direct assistance to the armed insurgents who are fighting in Nicaragua. It would provide them with logistical support to continue the war. There is no question as to what it is we are discussing this afternoon.

Mr. McEWEN. That is not what Cardinal O'Connor objected to and that is not what this does. The President has assured us that it would not go for military purposes. It is a question as to whether or not we believe the commitments that were made by Daniel Ortega or whether or not we believe in the commitments that were made by the President of the United States.

□ 1740

The President said this will not go for military purposes and we can trust that.

Those appearing for the last 15 minutes seem to be saying trust the committee and trust Mr. Ortega.

Mr. BARNES. I will reclaim my time. I reclaim my time.

They have reiterated that they are opposed to the Michel approach.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, I have not voted for military assistance for the Contras in the past. I do not think it is appropriate for our Government to make those kind of direct contributions that can in effect say we are going to overthrow the government of another nation in this hemisphere

That does not mean that I approve of the government of the Sandinistas. Far from it. Just the opposite.

It would seem to me though, we ought to keep two things in mind at this juncture. No. 1, we ought not to just abruptly cut off any kind of assistance, particularly humanitarian assistance to the Contra group. We have worked with them for 3 or 4 years now. We have not supported them militarily, but at least they are there and they are a group trying to find a better form of government, particularly a democratic form of goverment.

Therefore it seems to me that we ought not to abruptly cut them off and just leave those 10,000 to 12,000 people there without any U.S. support at all.

Second, it would seem to me that we ought to try to keep the pressure on the Sandinista government. I do not believe that Mr. Ortega and the Sandinistas are going to bargain just out of the clear sky because they want to see if they can work something out. I believe we have got to keep the pressure on them. Therefore it seems to me that we are better served if we have the Michel amendment at this point.

Now, I supported a few minutes ago the Hamilton substitute because I think it is a sincere expression on his part to do something of assistance for noncombatants in a humanitarian way. I therefore can vote for either one, and I voted for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] because he is a very strong and sincere leader of this Congress.

But the best interests of the United States would be served, I believe, by our support for the Michel amendment; to give some form of assistance to these forces, to keep them there. We can best be sure it will not be military assistance, and in this way we can best keep the pressure on the Sandinistas to negotiate with the United States.

So therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would urge that we vote for the Michel amendment. I think a lot of people who have voted for the Hamilton amendment should consider also that they can vote for the Michel amendment. It is certainly in the best interests of the United States.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARKEY].

Mr. MARKEY. I would ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] if he would engage in a colloquy that would perhaps clarify some the ambiguities that exist in this amendment.

Under the Michel amendment only "arms, munitions or other weapons of war" are prohibited. This implies, but does not state, that items covered by the Arms Export Control Act, the U.S. munitions list and the international traffic in arms regulations may not be provided with the $14 million.

Now, under the Michel amendment then it would appear that certain items not covered by these controls, with possible "humanitarian justification," but also with military utility, could be provided.

I would ask the manager of the Michel amendment to answer a few questions. All the aircraft that have been reported in the Contra air force, the C-47 cargo plane, the Cessna light fixed-wing aircraft, and the Hughes 500 helicopter, could they be provided to the Contras under this amendment?

Mr. HYDE. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARKEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I would say the spirit of the legislation is as important as the wording, and since we are pledging humanitarian aid it would be humanitarian.

The gentleman is very suspicious and cynical. I would suggest that that would not happen. The President of the United States will live up to his commitment, and this aid will be humanitarian within the spirit as well as within the letter of this legislation.

Mr. MARKEY. You do not anticipate that under this amendment you could provide to the Contras the C-47 cargo plane, the Cessna light fixed-wing aircraft, or the Hughes 500 helicopter?

Mr. HYDE. I would say not unless we have to evacuate some people to hospitals perhaps. I would not insist that they walk or ride a bicycle.

Mr. MARKEY. But I am saying the point is that you would not support their conversion into military use by adding guns, rockets, and bomb racks?

Mr. HYDE. No, sir; not under this legislation. I think that would be a breach of the letter of the legislation, and certainly the spirit.

Mr. MARKEY. And uniforms and parachutes for dropping humanitarian supplies, perhaps these could easily become a part of the military operation.

Mr. HYDE. The gentleman would not object to dropping food into remote areas by parachute or dropping medical supplies, would he?

Mr. MARKEY. I would if the intention was to divert these materials to military uses.

Mr. HYDE. That intention would not obtain. I do not think that intention is permissible under this legislation.

Mr. MARKEY. Military helmets and bayonets have just been taken off the U.S. munitions list. They could be justified for purposes of self defense in the Contra camps. Would the gentleman think that these military helmets and bayonets would potentially be covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HUNTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARKEY. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I see in the representation of the amendment that is offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], signed by the gentleman in his letter, the notice of the amendment signed by Mr. MICHEL, and I think his word is good, and I think the President's word is good. He says that the Agency for International Development, for food, clothing, medicine, and other humanitarian assistance for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, provided that none of the funds made available by this resolution may be used to provide arms, munitions, or other weapons of war.

I think that that is the spirit of that letter which is something that should be honored by the gentleman who is talking right now.

Our minority leader has so represented that.

Mr. MARKEY. I will reclaim my time.

The point is that we are trying to clarify what is, in fact, humanitarian and what is military.

For example, construction equipment for building roads, bridges, and runways to assist in the delivery of aid could also be used as an improved infrastructure for the fighting capacity of the Contras. And it is clearly the intention of anyone who is going to be voting here tonight to know what in fact is the use to which this construction equipment would be put.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we can trust the leadership on both sides of the House to do what they say they are going to do.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. ROWLAND].

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Michel amendment. Yesterday I was one of the Republicans that voted against the $14 million in military aid, and I agree with the previous speakers who have been talking about staying away from military involvement.

But I think this proposal is quite clear. It is not for military aid in any way, shape, or form.

And we have talked about the Contras and we have got to agree, I agree that they have gotten some bad reviews. But we also have to agree that the Sandinista puppet show should have been closed down a long time ago.

Communism is alive and well in Central America, and wearing the face of Daniel Ortega. Opposition to communism in this hemisphere has been the policy of every administration in this country, Republican and Democrat, dating back to Harry Truman. For us as Americans to just ignore the situation in Nicaragua and hope it goes away by itself, is just plain foolish. Communism is not like the measles, it just does not attack once and then go away. It is a bad, reoccurring rash.

It can be controlled, but it has to be treated carefully and it has to be treated properly.

What do we really think the Sandinistas are doing down there? Does anyone honestly believe that they have some secret plan to transform themselves into a democracy?

Does anyone truly believe that Daniel Ortega plans to be something other than a Soviet puppet? Even the critics of aid to the Contras concede that the Sandinistas are avowed Marxist-Leninists.

I believe we have to face the facts. The only hope of preventing a complete entrenched Soviet satellite is by giving the Sandinistas the incentive to sit down and negotiate. We should not be willing to sit on our hands in the hopes that that spread of communism will somehow go away.

Yes, I have concerns about the Contras and I expressed those yesterday in my no vote. But the Sandinistas are the known quantity we are dealing with. They are sworn enemies of our country by nature of their Marxist doctrine. And they have a poor 6-year record that the Contras do not have.

If we defeat humanitarian aid today we will be pulling the rug out from under the Contras and defeating any effort to check the entrenchment of communism in Nicaragua. If we defeat aid today there will be absolutely no reason for Ortega and the Sandinistas to engage in meaningful negotiations or any dialog.

□ 1750

The result I suspect will be more meddling by the Sandinistas in El Salvador, more meddling along the borders of those nations, an expanded relationship with Cuba, an expanded relationship with the Soviet Union and the wholesale institution of communism in Nicaragua.

A vote against humanitarian assistance is a clear signal to the Sandinistas that they have got a free ride in Central America to spread communism and terror.

Ladies and gentleman, the proposal before us is not the beginning of gunboat diplomacy, as some would have us believe; it is merely lifeboat diplomacy, a way of providing humanitarian assistance to the only people who can force the Sandinistas to negotiate. To abandon them completely would be nothing short of a copout on our part.

The minority leader's proposal provides humanitarian assistance to the group that should receive it, the Contras, while the other proposal will result in such aid being channeled to the Sandinistas.

I urge all my colleagues today to support the Michel amendment.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I think many have spoken about what the intent and the spirit of this legislation is. Let me say at the outset that I had a meeting with the President and I am convinced of his sincerity and his commitment towards peace, and the same with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], the author of this amendment.

However, I think that there is quite a bit of difference between what we are voting on right now and the Hamilton/Barnes provision and, remarkably, similar provisions and intent between the vote yesterday, which was on military aid, and what could happen under the Michel amendment.

I respect what the gentlemen are saying about the spirit of this resolution and I respect the commitment of the President. However, the record is not very good in terms of the bureaucracy.

Let me recite that the CIA proceeded without consulting Congress to mine the harbors of Nicaragua; the CIA proceeded to do a manual and then circumvented Congress when it explained that manual; the CIA is involved in training many of the rebels.

In my judgment this is what could happen legally under the Michel amendment: First, it would permit the Contras to continue the war by providing them direct logistic support; second, it automatically permits military assistance from the CIA's contingency reserve to the Contras after October 1 without any Congressional action; third, it would mean that the Contras are well provided for in fiscal 1985 and could supplement U.S. humanitarian assistance with arms purchased with private donations.

This proposal differs from the original Presidential proposal of April 4 in only three respects.

I think the original proposal is basically a good plan and well intentioned.

It differs in these three respects: First, aid is all direct humanitarian assistance; second, additional economic sanctions against Nicaragua are urged; and third, military assistance could resume after 5 months, not 2 months.

Third, the Michel amendment permits assistance only for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, but not for other refugees and victims of the conflict going on in Nicaragua or in the region. What about the independent peasant or the person that has no political affiliation? Most of these refugees do not know who they are for or who is even fighting.

Fourth, this provision allows for the entire military infrastructure of the Contras to remain intact and be strengthened. Funds could be used for improving infrastructure including presumably nonlethal military items and logistical support such as trucks, uniforms, since only "arms, munitions, or other weapons of war" are prohibited by the Michel amendment.

Section 2 gives AID wide powers: "such powers as may be necessary and proper to carry out section 1."

This could enable AID to administer humanitarian aid through even the CIA and there would be incentives, if this amendment passes, to do that because the CIA has an infrastructure in the field, the CIA is the only agency that has the infrastructure to do this.

It is unworkable because there are no incentives here to move the situation from war to peace. There is no incentive for a cease-fire whatsoever. There is no incentive for the Contras to negotiate.

I think I stated very clearly that there are human rights violations of the Sandinistas and the Contras, that both the Sandinistas and the Contras should come to the bargaining table under the Contra plan. I have no problems with that.

In addition to that, this provision tries to put unequal pressure on the parties to the conflict: If the Contras do not negotiate, they get aid anyway, under this provision; if the Sandinistas do not negotiate, they get economic sanctions and resumption of war effort.

This offers no policy, no sense of direction, and provides only a stopgap approach and does not encourage or strengthen Contadora or OSA action.

Last, it does not address the fiscal year 1986 funding or policy issues. The Intelligence Committee has to mark up the authorizing legislation soon and Congress may have to focus on it within a few weeks. There is no useful purpose to be served by having another round on this issue.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to allay the fears of the gentleman from New Mexico about any of these funds being used for military purposes. The language in the continuing resolution, section 8066, section 801 of the Intelligence Authorization Act for fiscal year 1985 is still the law. It was drafted by Mr. BOLAND and it forbids the use of any funds for military purposes in Nicaragua. That is still the law.

The Michel amendment does not amend that. So the gentleman's fears and those of Mr. MARKEY are really groundless. And I am sure Mr. O'NEILL and other competent staff over there from the bipartisan Intelligence Committee will fill the gentleman in on that, that the law prohibits that and that is not amended by the Michel amendment.

I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Once again I would like to stress to my colleagues that I am not impugning the motives of anybody here. I respect the sincerity of the President and Mr. MICHEL. But this looks like an administration-drafted amendment that permits a lot of trucks to go through.

Now, all I am doing is saying that under this amendment, and legal counsel has been drafting some of these possibilities, what I just mentioned could happen. That is all I am pointing out to my colleague.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HYDE].

Mr. HYDE. I thank the gentleman for yielding further.

This legislation, Mr. Chairman, cannot operate in a vacuum It is within the context of existing law. It would not permit violating existing law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask my colleague if he is aware of the recent decision of the Supreme Court, a 7 to 2 vote, that gave the CIA wide powers to keep classified information from being disseminated either to Congress or to reporters. Is my colleague aware of that? It is called the Morrison decision.

Mr. HYDE. Yes; I am well aware. I think it is a good decision. But that has nothing to do with the statutes which forbid the use of funds for military or paramilitary use in Nicaragua. That is the law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is exactly the meaning of this language, and let me read the language: "The Administrator of the Agency for International Development shall have such powers as may be necessary and proper to carry out section 1 of this joint resolution"?

Mr. HYDE. Within the framework of existing law. It does not amend existing law. It merely gives the AID whatever powers it needs to fulfill the mandate of this humanitarian assistance to these people in Nicaragua.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So, using the CIA contingency reserve, no CIA personnel can be used to carry this out; is that what my colleague is saying?

Mr. HYDE. It would seem apparent that that is so.

The gentleman [Mr. RICHARDSON] is more suspicious than any John Bircher that ever lived.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM].

□ 1800

Mr. McCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. HYDE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOLLUM. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I thank my friend for yielding, and I have tried to be brief, but you know, a sense of deja vu overcomes me. Five years ago, June 5, 1980, we heard these same arguments made on the floor by many of the same people.

The majority leader now, then just an influential Member of the House, had an amendment which required the then President to report every 90 days to this House on the condition of human rights in Nicaragua. That was very great concern, and he assured us that they did not want to be dominated by Cuba or by the Soviet Union.

Then he asked this House to give him the tools on a trip down there where he could say, "We do expect you to establish free political institutions, to have regular, free, and orderly elections. We want you to respect private property and want you to respect human rights. So long as you do these things, we want to work with you and we want to help you in such ways as we may to solve the gnawing economic problems that beset your country."

Then furthermore the gentleman said, let us extend the hand of helpfulness; not a handout. If you will abide by those human rights recognized by enlightened humankind, if you respect private property as you say you will, if you will continue to respect the right of free expression as you have demonstrated recently that you are willing to do with regard to television and with regard to La Prensa, and if you will hold those free elections you have promised, we will be your friend.

Now, that is 5 years ago, and we gave them the money, and they went the other way.

Now, there are two kinds of ignorance: invincible and vincible. I do not know what you call people who, after 5 years of watching them go into the Communist orbit, and we gave them the money, now you still have not learned.

Mr. McCOLLUM. I want to reclaim my time. I am pleased to have yielded to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point. Following his statement I think is the appropriate time to do this. There are two primary reasons why the Michel amendment should be adopted today. One of them was very clearly articulated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE] a few minutes ago when he pointed out the fact that there is only one way that we can realistically expect to achieve the kind of pressure necessary to bring about fundamental changes in the way the Sandinistas do business that will assure us of having freedom of democracy in that hemisphere just below us, and to assure that they will quit meddling in their neighbors' businesses.

That kind of pressure can only be brought about if the Contras continue to be able to at least exist on the burner. And they are not going to be able to continue to exist unless we provide the direct kind of humanitarian aid and assistance that is the Michel amendment.

The fact of the matter is that anything else that we are talking about in the way of providing some incentive for them to negotiate is a version of the tooth fairy fairy tale, as I heard some of my colleagues say earlier this afternoon.

They have to be viewed as people who think differently from the way we think. They are Marxist-Leninists. They are Communists. They are of the Soviet mold. They are of the same mold as the Soviets that looked upon the issue of the Korean Air Line incident the way they did.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I will be glad to yield an additional minute and a half to the gentleman.

Mr. McCOLLUM. The fact of the matter is that we have got to bring this kind of pressure to bear on them and the existence of the Contras in one form or another during the next 2 months and next year, perhaps, or whatever it takes is absolutely essential.

Now there is a second reason. That is basically the humanitarian reason that is involved. The fact is that we have an obligation to these people that is paramount in our consideration, both from the standpoint of the history of our relationship with them and the fact that they stand for freedom and democracy and from a self-interest standpoint.

For after 1969 when the Sandinistas took over, I want you to know that more refugees, more Nicaraguans fled Nicaragua in the 4 years after that, immediately after that than in the 45 years of Somoza rule; more than 60,000 of them.

I have spoken with a lot of them in the U.N. operated refugee camps, and I can tell you they left because the Sandinista oppression. That is what they say; that is why they left; and I believe them.

The fact is that if we do not provide this assistance, many more are going to leave. Our embassy in Honduras estimates between 150,000 and 200,000 more are going to come across after the Contras, if they collapse, and those people are going to come, frankly, to the United States very quickly; not to mention the thousands and possibly millions more who will follow if consolidation of a Communist regime takes place at that point in time.

So I beseech you: Two reasons, vote to keep up the pressure and vote for humanitarian reasons for the Michel version.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The problem with the assessment of my friend and colleague from Illinois is that the last 4 years have not made the kind of improvements in the situation in Nicaragua that we would all like to see; that funding a military force on Nicaragua's northern border has not given the moderate voices in Nicaragua more strength; that funding a military unit that has been savaging many of the citizens of northern Nicaragua has not created a country that is more moderate or less indebted to the Soviets or the Cubans.

To the contrary, anyone in Nicaragua who would like to develop the kind of totalitarian government that he speaks of has been given aid and comfort by the Reagan administration by this feeble effort that simply terrorizes the citizens of Nicaragua.

What they have done is provided the ammunition.

Mr. HYDE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEJDENSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HYDE. For the life of me, and I say this with all the sincerity I can muster, how can someone stand and defend a regime that drove every Jewish family out of Nicaragua? How can you do it?

Mr. GEJDENSON. Reclaiming my time, the gentleman obviously was not listening to my statement. I was not defending the regime; what I was saying is that the Reagan administration provides assistance—and I will get to the rest of your question—provides assistance to those forces within Nicaragua that want nondemocratic institutions.

In Nicaragua today I met with the Jewish community, and that seems to be a major area—there were six when I was there; I am not sure how many were there—there were about 200 Jewish families or individuals, 200 to 400 during the Somoza days. Many of them left when the Sandinistas took over, for a number of reasons.

Whether or not we provide assistance to the Contras, it will not improve that situation, it will not change it. What we need to do is address what is in the best interests of the U.S. Government. Not what is the most impressive act, not what will look good in a fight against communism, but what will really make some progress for the people of Central America and the people of Nicaragua.

I know this gentleman knows, my parents fled the Soviet Union in the late 1940's. To understand what we are up against is to understand that what the President proposes is simply the most ineffective, it is the most counterproductive, it is the most dangerous of approaches to the crisis in Central America.

What we should have learned a long time ago in this great democracy is that the people of this country need to be consulted when we engage in a policy. That this administration started this policy by arguing to the Congress and to the American people that this was simply a process to interdict arms to El Salvador.

That cover has long since been blown. The history and the development of the Contras, how the administration picked the political leadership to try to give it a decent cover over the Somocista guardsmen that run the military is now clear and history.

What we have today is a choice whether we will take a new path, with no guarantees for success. The mistakes in Nicaragua go back too far. American marines at the beginning of this century, and returning to Nicaragua for a dozen years at a time, have created a history with that country that gives us considerable problem, considerable challenges.

Aiding the Contras will not turn the situation around in Nicaragua. It may make you feel better when you leave here that you bought some bullets and maybe some bread for people who were going in and savaging northern Nicaragua.

You may dream that you are chasing out communism, but what you are doing is you are pulling the Soviets and the Cubans in even deeper. What you are doing is taking away every opportunity to use the countries of the region for a peaceful development, and let me tell you, this same debate must have existed in the 1960's as the failed effort of the Bay of Pigs.

If this Government continues to engage in programs like this one that failed, we undercut our position in the world. We ought to be using the policies—in pulling the countries of the region together, we ought to be using the levers that are effective, and not the ones that are ineffective.

This is a failed policy. It is a policy that will cost the United States dearly in Central America. There is no easy road out of the problems we face, but if there is a sure road to disaster, it is support of the Michel amendment here today.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCEWEN].

□ 1810

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McEWEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I just want to respond very briefly to the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The fact is, the historical record is, we tried the other way. We tried the non-Reagan way, if you will; we tried the Carter way. Send millions of dollars down to the Sandinista government and pray. We did that. I did that. I joined in that hope and in that expectation. And the result that we got was a Marxist-Leninist revolutionary government. We tried their way and it failed. But it keeps coming back on that side of the aisle. They just never learn. The cost of their not learning, however, is a lot of lives and a lot of freedom.

I thank my friend for yielding.

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McEWEN. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Michel substitute. This body has a moral obligation to give humanitarian aid to those fighting to liberate their country from an increasingly repressive government of broken promises.

At the time the Contra forces were organized 3 years ago, it was an accurate statement that a large measure of their training and leadership came from the Government of the United States. Most of us would acknowledge that the resistance was, at that time, composed mainly of former national guardsmen—Somocistas. But that is not true today. The forces of democracy are increasingly attracting a large number of Nicaraguans disenfranchised from the policies of the Marxist-Leninist—and that is their own term—regime in power.

The Nicaraguan democratic forces—the FDN—is now composed mainly of those who opposed and fought Somoza's rule in Nicaragua. Signatories of the San Jose Declaration, the Manifesto of the FDN, included Arturo Cruz, former Sandinista Ambassador to the United States; Fernando Chamorro, who personally attempted the assassination of Somoza; Adolfo Calero, a life-long opponent of the Somoza regime and Alfonso Robelo, a former member of the original revolutionary junta. The list goes on and on; it is a matter of public record, if my colleagues care to look.

So why are we aiding the Contras? Why have we chosen to give aid to those fighting against a regime in our hemisphere? There can be no doubt that the Sandinista government is aiding guerrilla forces in Central America that are intent on overthrowing democratically elected allies of the United States. The Contras have proven themselves to be a legitimate political force dedicated to freedom. The Sandinista regime must negotiate not with the United States, not with the Reagan administration, but with the Nicaraguan democratic front. We asked—we pressured—President Duarte into negotiating with smaller guerrilla forces with less popular support than the Contras enjoy today. In a cynical gesture last weekend, the Sandinistas offered to negotiate with the United States and offered a ceasefire with FDN, but only if the United States would agree to withdraw aid from the FDN. In other words, abandon more than 15,000 Nicaraguans bent on bringing democracy to their country, and the Sandinistas will negotiate with Washington.

It is not appropriate for the United States to negotiate on behalf of 15,000 men and women fighting for democracy. If the Sandinistas truly wished to bring peace to their country, they would negotiate with those men and women disenfranchised by the Sandinista regime—the FDN. They would permit free elections, they would allow political parties to flourish, they would permit freedom of the press, and they would cease the intimidation, torture and murder of their political opponents. If we cease aid to the Contras, we will be responsible for terminating the only effective democratic resistance to the increasingly repressive policies of the Sandinistas.

This morning, in response to our vote last night against militry aid to the Contras, the Sandinista government said, in part:

> The Nicaraguan Government wishes to reiterate its firm, irreversible position that it will never accept any kind of a dialogue with mercenary forces directed and financed by the U.S. Government regardless of the pretext used to stage this dialogue.

This is a demand for unconditional surrender. We cannot and we will not accept such a demand. We must support those who fight for democracy in every corner of the world.

In an editorial published in the New York Times last December, Arturo Cruz, the former Sandinista Ambassador to the United States, wrote:

> Congress is sadly wrong if it imagines that it can obtain peace by cutting off aid to the Nicaraguan insurgents. The insurgency is no longer a product of United States intervention: it is the revolt of Nicaraguans against oppression by other Nicaraguans. Those who oppose support to the insurgents have a moral obligation to insist that the Sandinistas restore Nicaragua's liberties and that the Communist world take its hands off our country.

I challenge opponents of the Michel substitute to come up with a realistic, alternative that would restore civil liberties in Nicaragua, and remove Soviet influence from that country. With the Michel substitute, we are given the opportunity to vote for nonlethal aid to the Contras. I will vote for the Michel substitute, in the belief that such aid is consistent both with the principles on which this Nation was founded, and with the efforts of Nicaraguan freedom fighters to restore democracy to their country. I fought in one war as a naval officer. As a Congressman, I do not intend to lead this country down the path to another war by abandoning Central America to Sandinista expansionism. I urge my colleagues to vote for the Michel substitute.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, it has come to my attention that tomorrow's edition of the New York Times will report that Daniel Ortega's trip to Moscow is for the purpose of signing an agreement for further financial support to make up the gap caused by the recent loss of World Bank and other loans.

My question to this body now over the next 40 minutes as we make this decision: Does anyone truly believe that our refusal to send the Peace Corps to Nicaragua next year will make a permanent impact on their aggressive Marxist revolution and its desire to overrun all of Central America?

The Archbishop that was just appointed today to cardinalship has said that Marxism is attempting as a goal to eliminate the church in Nicaragua. The Sandinista government intends to eliminate all of the Catholic Church. It has been pointed out that the Jewish community has been totally destroyed in all of Nicaragua. The question that I have deals with human rights, and in just 120 seconds I want to say these two points:

I met recently with the head of the Human Rights Commission in Nicaragua. The chairman pointed out that under the Somoza regime whenever there was a human rights violation the international press paid full attention. He pointed out that after the Marxist revolution there was no longer attention to human rights violations even though they had exploded in number. He sent a delegation to one of his major supporters in Geneva and asked why they had discontinued funding to the Human Rights Commission in Nicaragua. The answer that came back was this: They said, "We are no longer concerned with human rights violations in Nicaragua. El Salvador is now our next target." No. 1.

Point No. 2: This Congress has discovered and those Marxists in El Salvador have discovered that a way to get a Congressman's attention on this floor is if the Marxist guerrillas in El Salvador will murder anyone at will, thrust their body in the town square, call the international press, the Washington Post and American newspapers will print the picture and the story, and this front row will line up with 1-minute speeches in opposition to the El Salvadoran Government.

They have also learned very effectively that Nicaragua need only go into a village and have an atrocity and attribute it to the Contras. Many well meaning individuals in this body will then become very concerned about policy.

Let me tell you: We have learned that the Sandinista army has developed Contra squads that have the single purpose of going into villages to murder those people. They then identify themselves as Contras, they murder the males or anyone in support of the effort, and leave, call the international media that comes in, interviews the orphans or the widows, and then they come and portray it here before us today.

I believe that the conflict we are facing is international in scope. It is clear. The question is whether or not we will deal in tactics or whether or not we will deal in strategy and recognize what is at stake in this vote now.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, it is certainly not in the best interests of the United States, or consistent with the historic principles of the Monroe Doctrine, to have another military surrogate of the Soviet Union in Central America. That is the bottom line.

A vote for nonmilitary aid to those opposing the Sandinista regime is a calculated yet cautious message that the United States deems it in its own best interests, and those of its neighbors, to encourage a course of moderation through negotiation in Nicaragua. The United States actively supports the Contadora process aimed at achieving a political solution to the situation in Central America.

Remember, it was the United States that tried to foster good relations when the Sandinistas replaced the oppressive Somoza regime. I served in Congress and supported the U.S. cosponsorship, in June 1979, of an Organization of American States resolution calling for replacement of the Somoza regime. I also supported authorization of $118 million in bilateral aid to the new Sandinista government, far more than the United States supplied to any other country in the region.

In turn, the Sandinista National Liberation Front [FSLN] pledged that it would promote political pluralism, a mixed economy and a nonaligned foreign policy.

What happened? Within a week of the Sandinista victory in 1979, Cuba placed about 100 military advisers and security personnel in Nicaragua. That number has now grown to 2,500-3,000, along with another 4,500 Cuban specialists, some 200 Soviet and East German military advisers, and another 50 from Libya and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Hardly an ideal supporting cast for a country whose government is intent upon living peacefully with its neighbors.

Long before any armed opposition arose, Nicaraguan active duty forces grew to more than 60,000, some five times the size of Somoza's national guard even at its peak. The Nicaraguan Army is supported by at least 340 Soviet-made tanks and armored vehicles, scores of artillery pieces, rocket launchers and dozens of helicopters, including several MI-24's, the Soviets' top-of-the-line attack gunship.

In short, the evidence belies claims of nonbelligerence and friendship.

Facts? Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega made regular trips to Havana and Moscow. He hosted Iranian Prime Minister Mii Husein Masari.

In November 1980, Sandinista security forces gunned down Jorge Salazar, the vice-president of the private sector umbrella group, Supreme Council of Private Enterprise. In November 1980 and again in March 1981 the Sandinistas blocked the Nicaraguan Democratic Movement Party headed by former Sandinista junta member, Alfonso Robelo, from holding peaceful rallies.

Early in 1981, the Sandinistas arrested the president of the Permanent Commission on Human Rights, Jose Estebon Gonzalez. He now lives in exile.

Member after member of the original Sandinista junta as well as thousands of other Nicaraguans, mostly poor peasants, have become disillusioned by broken promises and denials of liberty.

All of this, combined with evidence that the Sandinistas were materially aiding the Communist guerrillas in El Salvador, hardly depicts the FSLN government of Nicaragua as promoting political pluralism, a mixed economy, and a nonaligned foreign policy.

There are many well-meaning Americans who have visited Nicaragua and met with representatives of the Sandinista government. They have been shown examples of progress in Nicaragua—and there have been improvements in education and medical care.

These well-meaning Americans cite atrocities committed by the Contras. There have indeed been excesses on both sides. Yet, to paint one side as white and the other black is to ignore the realities of Central American politics and governments.

The truth in Central America is elusive and hard to find. But there is enough truth to show that people suffer from government oppression and brutalities—whether committed by the left or the right.

Somewhere between the repression of the Somocistas and the oppression of the Sandinistas lies the answer to reasonable government for Nicaragua.

The choices for the United States in Nicaragua are difficult. I voted to limit aid to the Contras to humanitarian assistance, and to embargo trade between the United States and Nicaragua if negotiations do not begin. We are still Nicaragua's largest trading partner.

That seems the best solution to keeping the pressure on the Nicaraguan Government to achieve the bottom line—a less militant and nonaligned Nicaragua. The next step now is up to the Ortega regime.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COUGHLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am in receipt of a letter addressed to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] from the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, and he advises:

This is to advise you that the Agency for International Development fully supports your amendment House Joint Resolution 239 to permit humanitarian assistance to the democratic opposition in Nicaragua. If your amendment is enacted, we will move expeditiously to assure that the funds authorized for the above purpose are effectively and properly applied for humanitarian needs in accordance with the intent of Congress.

That letter is signed by M. Peter McPherson, Administrator, Agency for International Development.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN].

Mr. O'BRIEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, just to get a bipartisan or two-side-of-the-street view of this thing, the Michel amendment seeks to provide food, clothing and medicine, and it provides no arms. It is no match for 8,000 Cubans, Russians, Bulgarians, PLO, and Libyans. It has no helicopters, it has no tanks, it has no rockets, it has no missiles. It has no antipersonnel devices.

With respect to a statement made by my friend, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOLF], I was down in that country some 6 or 7 years ago. I had lunch with the dictator. I have never felt the pressure of military hardware more closely. An hour later I had a chance to visit with the then Bishop Bravo, Bishop of Nicaragua, now His Eminence, Archdiocese of Central America. And he had no stomach for Somoza any more than he does for the Sandinistas now.

And let me comment also that if I am concerned about the conditions in the Diocese of New York, I do not go to Nicaragua and ask that bishop. So O'Connor ought to stay out of that.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LUKEN].

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Chairman, the Michel substitute does nothing to promote the peace process in Central America. Instead, it merely continues aid to the Contras in the name of the "democratic opposition."

The substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] contains no assurances that the money will be used to end the killing and the violence, as the Hamilton substitute did. The Michel plan represents nothing more than a continuation of the flawed administration policy.

Now, initially, a little while ago, Congress and the American people were told by this administration that American aid was needed to cut off the flow, to interdict the flow of arms from Nicaragua into Honduras and El Salvador. Later we learned from the same administration that these Contras that we were to aid were actively seeking to overthrow the Sandinista government.

Now, earlier we were asked to trust the word of the President. It is not a question of trusting the word of the President, because we do know the aims of this President. This President is the one who has indicated that he wants to overthrow that government. He has asked for arms aid time and time again for that purpose. Although we may respect these aims, we disagree and we disagree strongly.

By contrast, the Hamilton proposal which we adopted earlier offers the Sandinistas the incentive to participate in the process leading to peace negotiations by withholding aid. The Michel amendment contains none of these assurances, contains none of these caveats. It does not contain the carrot and the stick approach, the approach of diplomacy, the carrot and the stick which shows the clear congressional concern in the Hamilton substitute about the Sandinistas' links to Cuba and would penalize any violation of human rights.

I suggest we stick with the Hamilton substitute.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

□ 1820

Mr. RITTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, let us be clear about what the impact of a loss of this Michel resolution means. It means betrayal. It means that we betray men whom we supported; put in the field to fight, perhaps to die, for ideals which we hold dear ourselves.

We also betray freedom fighters everywhere who are watching this vote carefully; we betray those fighting in Afghanistan, under Son Sann in Cambodia, and in Africa. The whole world is watching this vote, and in particular they are watching this vote in Moscow and in Castro's Cuba.

A central fact of our time is that men and women have taken up arms against Communist totalitarian regimes. It is our obligation to be on their side. Pulling the rug out from just such people in Nicaragua, those people who hold the same ideals, defeats the purpose of freedom fighters everywhere.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we have the stomach for these kinds of decisions in the House. I am proud to be a Member of the House. I have enjoyed my 4 years and 3 or 4 months here; I know I have got a lot to learn, but it seems that these are the most difficult kinds of decisions for us when the choices are not clear to some of our colleagues.

Now, to me, maybe it is because I am of different or maybe a more simple mind, but the choices are clear here today. If we leave our work down with only the Hamilton amendment, we have done nothing. If we end our day leaving passed only the Hamilton amendment, we have done nothing. Oh, we have created a new welfare program. We have created a new Amtrak program; we pay people to leave Nicaragua.

It is fluff and huff and puff and there is no teeth to it. Hamilton is without gums; forget the teeth. If we stick with Barnes-Hamilton, we do nothing for the freedom fighters, not even medicine. It prohibits aid inside Nicaragua to those who believe in freedom.

It is not right, it is not right. If we leave our work done with that, we have taken a step backward. I think that JAKE PICKLE said it as well as anyone: We must keep the pressure on the Sandinistas. We decided to send no weapons, no bullets, no guns, no bombs; but if we want to keep the pressure, allow through the Michel amendment, the money to be spent to help those who are willing to give their lives and fight for freedom.

We had a speaker here early today on my side of the aisle say that there is no comparison with the men of the Contras and what is happening in Afghanistan. There is a direct comparison, a direct comparison. In Afghanistan, the Soviet Union has directly invaded a nation, directly. The response there by those who believe in freedom more important than their lives was to fight.

In Nicaragua, the same thing happened. The Soviet Union with their slave and captive states, circumvented and thwarted their own revolution. It is the people of Nicaragua who are asking for this help. You know, the problems in Nicaragua are not the fault of America. I stand here and reject the notion that Nicaragua is America's fault; it is not unless today we leave here only doing Hamilton.

Because if we do that, we have done nothing at all.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I have recently returned from Nicaragua; my second trip down there. I can assure my colleagues that there are no people down there with white hats. Neither the Contras nor the Sandinistas are repositories of virtue. Neither one are the reincarnation of the Franciscan Order as sometimes depicted by their supporters or others.

But to call the Contras freedom fighters and to equate them to the Founding Fathers or the French Resistance fighters is going too far. I refer to a Newsweek article of April 29, 1985, which many of you have seen. If you have not, I urge you to. It shows firsthand an eyewitness account photograph of a cold-blooded murder by the Contras of a totally unarmed civilian who is lying passively. His throat is cut on camera. That is a freedom fighter. I am afraid that we have to admit that the people we are supporting down there are committing some very serious atrocities.

Now, the question is do we keep on supporting them logically, militarily or any other way? We have put ourselves in a terrible box as a nation because we have created them. Now do we walk away from them or do we keep them going?

We have made some mistakes, but I think it is better to cut those mistakes, face the facts, as General Gorman says, we cannot win with this group militarily. We are losing a lot of ground politically in the region, and we had better cut our losses, as painful as that is going to be.

Finally I would make the point that we have not done nothing with the Hamilton-Barnes measure. One of the points the Kissinger Commission made again and again, and I would urge my colleagues on that side that read the Kissinger Commission report and support the conclusions, the Kissinger Commission said that unilateralism is extremely dangerous in Central America. The danger is unilateralism in Central America, the most dangerous pitfall to avoid at all costs.

The Hamilton-Barnes measure gives the explicit stamp of approval of this Congress to multilateralism. It signals that we want the Contadoras to work on the problem. Almost unheard of in Latin America is four democracies getting together to try to solve a regional problem. Here is a golden opportunity; I urge you not to walk away from that measure.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, this latest debate on aid to Nicaraguan Contras is perhaps the most frustrating so far. We have run out of good alternatives. We are left only with ones which do not seem to offer promise of effectiveness.

I fear that Nicaragua will continue to be a bad influence in the region and pursue objectionable internal policies. After listening to the debate yesterday, my guess is that a resolution condemning the Sandinista government, and calling for major changes in their policies, would pass by a wide margin.

Our problem is that none of the proposals offers hope for the people of Nicaragua. They will bear the suffering and the repression no matter what we do.

Congressman EDWARD BOLAND, the former chairman of the House Intelligence Committee and author of the Boland amendment cutting off Contra aid last year, made the point clearly in yesterday's debate. While he opposes military aid to Contras, as do I at this point, he too believes the Sandinistas are not a positive influence. Speaking of events in Nicaragua during his tenure as Intelligence chairman, he said:

> The facts were that the Government of Nicaragua was providing arms, ammunition, communications, logistics, training and safe haven to insurgents attempting to topple the Government of El Salvador. The facts were that the Government of Nicaragua was on a Marxist-Leninist drift. The facts were that the Cubans had a large presence in Nicaragua and a great deal of influence within the Nicaraguan Government. The facts were that there was a military buildup in Nicaragua.

The problem is that governments like Nicaragua's tend not to be changed by congressional resolutions. The Sandinistas have made it clear that they will not negotiate with Contras. They will not even negotiate with former members of their own government, who happen to disagree with them.

At the same time, the alternatives look equally bad. The Contadora nations and their objectives are laudable. But they have no teeth nor enforcement procedures. The United States cannot force Nicaragua to negotiate in good faith. Neither can the Contadora nations, or the OAS.

I don't think the Contras have succeeded, nor can they succeed, either in offering a viable alternative to the Sandinistas, or in forcing the Sandinistas to make the minimum necessary policy changes. I am disturbed at the idea of continung to support a covert military effort against a government we still recognize, especially where the effort has not worked.

Trade sanctions usually fail. Although the United States is the largest trading partner for Nicaragua, it seems unlikely that U.S. trade sanctions alone can do the job.

Some say that if we only understood the Sandinistas, and tried to be friends with them, they would mend their ways. That, too, seems naive in view of our past experiences. From July 1979 through mid-1981, we provided Nicaragua $120 million in aid—more than that offered by any other nation. We gave more aid and credit to the Sandinistas in those 2 years than we gave Somoza in the previous 19 years. We offered Peace Corps volunteers.

All that happened was that many of the original members of the Government, those not a part of the hardest line Sandinista view, were forced out of the Government. The Sandinistas, during that period, built their armed forces to be the largest in Central America. They built political block groups to exert control over jobs, markets, and opportunity. They nationalized industry.

Congress is left with no good alternatives. Congress isn't in a position to develop and implement policy. Only the President can do so. All Congress can do is to frame some options. It can rule out some options. It can endorse others, but cannot make them policy.

The President's proposal is simply a continuation of military support for Contras. That's why I voted against it. The Barnes/Hamilton amendment, I feel, is all carrot and no stick. It does offer the possibility of trade sanctions, but here the Michel amendment is a little better. I also don't want to distribute aid through the United Nations. The United Nations has some useful functions, but it is the world's worst distributor of aid moneys.

My judgment is that the Michel amendment is the least bad of the series of imperfect alternatives. It says that negotiations should be pursued. Though I have no great hopes for negotiations success, we ought to try as best we can.

The Michel amendment says we should consider trade sanctions if the Sandinistas do not consider negotiations. Though I dislike trade sanctions as a rule, they are a last resort to be used when other means fail. That is where we are now. Moreover, they seem to be about the only unused tool Congress can use to encourage Nicaraguan seriousness in negotiations.

The amendment recognizes that we were largely responsible for the formation and contribution of the Contras. We have an obligation not to cut them off abruptly. We ought to help them end military activities. The Michel amendment is not a means to keep them alive. To me, it is a means to phase them out. Though we cannot outlaw the Contras, we can and should withdraw military support.

In the end, this vote says that the President's alternative is not good enough. His suggestions, and those made by Congress, in my judgment, are inadequate to change Nicaraguan intransigence.

The United States cannot ignore Nicaragua. Likewise, we ought not continue support for a military effort that offers us nothing better. We need a new course. Only the President can provide that new direction.●

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Chairman, the difference between the two proposals before us today is simple: The first makes the United States a power for peace in the region. The substitute will make us the quartermaster corps of the Nicaraguan Contras.

The first resolution, just passed, provides true refugees with true humanitarian assistance. The substitute gives the Contras boots, rations, and other military assistance—everything an army needs save for weapons. They can get those elsewhere with the money they save.

The argument that somehow our Nation will have "clean hands" by giving Contras only the so-called humanitarian aid just won't wash. The bottom line is still military support—whether you are the quartermaster corps or the ordnance corps.

What sort of humanitarian aid can we expect from this administration? With its track record, you will see humanitarian aid that includes helicopters outfitted for the medical evacuation of soldiers. Never mind that the helicopters may be outfitted with rocket pods purchased from another source. When the press reports on such actions appear, you can be sure that the administration will shrug its shoulders and say, "We have no control over what they do."

Today, my colleagues, we can control what happens. Reject this substitute as last night we rejected the measure that spawned it.●

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Chairman, today's debate has once again highlighted the problems endemic to this body's exploratory process—a process which often leads us to be too preoccupied with the "how," "where," and "what" rather than the "why." This is understandable. It is easy to focus attention on Contra human rights abuses. It is far more difficult to dwell on the systemic oppression which has come to permeate Nicaraguan society—an oppression which has provided the fertile ground from which the Contras have spawned.

The Sandinistas have betrayed their own revolution. They have betrayed their supporters at home. They have betrayed their supporters abroad. Most of all, they have betrayed themselves.

The Sandinista dictatorship is a totalitarian state, and it has done what all totalitarian states do: it has stifled both democracy and those who so ably uphold its values—the press, the church, and ultimately the voters.

There are those who say this isn't America's problem. Why should it matter if Nicaragua is a totalitarian state? Well, this seems to beg the question. Free elections, I've been told, are a rare commodity in totalitarian states. Dissent is a precarious occupation. Ask Mr. Castro's political opponents what they think about Cuban political debate.

Mr. Chairman, democratic states do not attack their neighbors. Democratic states do not readily carry out war. Democratic states, as we well know, are reluctant to spend a great deal of money on arms. In short, democratic states are not, nor will they ever be a threat to the free world.

The Contras are not angels. There are certainly objectionable elements among their ranks. But as Winston Churchill once said: "Democracy is the worst system in the world except for all of the others." For all of their faults, the Contras are far preferable to the alternative—the alternative of millions of "foot people" fleeing possible totalitarian states in Central America, the alternative of our borders being overrun by millions of hungry refugees who only desire to live in peace, and the alternative of Soviets satellite governments sitting astride the Rio Grande.

Closing our eyes and wishing the threat away may temporarily work in Afghanistan, but to abrogate our duty here in our own backyard does not bode well for the future of a nation such as ours.

Vote to aid the Contras.●

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, although I initially voted for the Hamilton substitute amendment to House Joint Resolution 247, I cannot in good faith support the final passage of this resolution. I agree with the principles offered by Representative Hamilton's substitute amendment prohibiting aid to the Contras, yet providing both humanitarian aid and support for the regional peace negotiations. However, last night, the Senate passed its own version of this resolution, and agreed to the Reagan administration's request to give the Contras $14 million in aid to continue the covert war in Nicaragua. Our two resolutions are at opposite ends, and I am not convinced that a compromise can be reached between the House and the Senate versions that will provide the necessary safeguards to end terrorism and violence in Nicaragua and achieve our common goals of peace, internal reconciliation, regional security, and democracy. I am, therefore, voting against this resolution.

Our decision whether to provide funds to the Contras will have a profound influence on the shape and direction of our foreign policy not only in Nicaragua and Central America but throughout the world. I strongly believe that only through diplomatic channels and regional negotiations involving the Sandinistas, the Contadora countries and the United States, can a peaceful solution be found to end the raging conflict in Nicaragua that has destroyed thousands of innocent men, women, and children.

Last night, I voted against House Joint Resolution 239, which would fund the Contras, encourage covert activity aimed at overthrowing the Sandinista government and undermine American foreign policy in the region. I also voted against the substitute amendment offered by Representative MICHEL that provides $14 million in assistance to the Contras, to be distributed by the U.S. Agency for International Development. We should have learned from our painful experiences in Vietnam—American expansionism will not bring peace or an end to the undeclared war in Nicaragua.

Even if the United States could overthrow the Sandinistas by funding the Contras, America's credibility and resolve for democratic principles would be forever compromised in the eyes of our allies throughout the world.

Even if the Reagan administration could convince the American people that the Contras were, indeed, freedom fighters who are risking their lives to defeat communism and install democracy in Nicaragua, rather than a band of terrorists and international criminals, still the United States would set a dangerous precedent. The administration is fomenting political instability, rather than seeking peaceful means to the end of respect for human rights, democracy, and cooperation in the region.

Even if the administration demonstrated that Nicaragua and the Managua regime is a threat to the United States, it would not justify these actions which are clearly seen as illegal and immoral in the world community and the World Court.

The Reagan administration claims not to interfere in the internal affairs of other countries, but seeks an involvement which is neither justifiable or realistic in promoting the cause of freedom and democracy. If we truly wish to promote the cause of justice and freedom, we must use the weapons of diplomacy, dialog, and political determination, not the hired guns of the Contras.

I agree with my colleagues—and hundreds of constituents who have written to me in recent months—that resuming aid to the Contras will sabotage any chance of peacefully resolving the conflict in Nicaragua; will prolong suffering and bloodshed; and will serve to strengthen, rather than weaken the worst elements of the Sandinista regime.

● Mrs. LLOYD, Mr. Chairman, I want to rise and say a few words in support of the Michel amendment.

After lengthy deliberation, I have concluded that adoption of Representative MICHEL's proposal to provide $14 million in humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic opposition during the remainder of fiscal year 1985 is the best action for this House to take today.

In view of the alarming trend in Nicaragua toward a centrally controlled one party state dominated by the avowedly Marxist-Leninist Sandinista National Directorate; and in light of the heavy and expanding Soviet-Cuban military presence in Nicaragua; and considering the documented aid being provided to Marxist guerrillas in neighboring states by the Sandinista government; we must take action to maintain pressure on FSLN leadership.

The Sandinista National Directorate has betrayed the promise of a democratic revolution in Nicaragua. The FSLN has refused to honor the promises to institute free elections, political pluralism, a mixed economy and nonaligned foreign policy which were made in 1979 in return for OAS recognition. Many of the former Sandinista leaders have gone into exile to join the Contra forces. Over 120,000 people have fled the country, driven by the totalitarian turn the Sandinistas have taken. Many sectors of the population are discontent and object to the methods and goals of the present FSLN leadership. The Nicaraguan democratic opposition is fighting for the original democratic goals of the Nicaraguan revolution. The Nicaraguan democratic opposition is the only force actively opposing a complete consolidation of FSLN control over Nicaragua.

I submit that the United States has strategic, military, political and economic interests in assuring a stable, democratic Central America. These vital interests would be in jeopardy if a Soviet base of operations is established in Nicaragua. By combating a regime that moves ever closer to Cuba and to the U.S.S.R., the Nicaraguan democratic opposition has furthered American interests in the region.

The Michel amendment is a compromise proposal. It provides for direct humanitarian aid to the opposition forces, demonstrating our continued support for their efforts to force the Sandinistas to honor their original democratic promises. Yet, the amendment prohibits the use of these funds for arms, munitions or weapons of war, thus alerting the Contras to our reservation about the questionable methods which certain of their members have used in pursuing their laudable aims. The Michel amendment is a balanced proposal which indicates both our willingness to pursue any Sandinista proposals for good faith negotiations with the Nicaraguan democratic opposition, and our determination to take steps, including a possible embargo on trade between the United States and Nicaragua, if the Sandinistas continue on their present alarming course.●

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] how many speakers he has left: we are getting toward the end.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left, please?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 7 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] has 6¼ minutes remaining.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, we have three very brief speakers.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. If the gentleman would go ahead with those, we will wind up with one, our final speaker, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I want to urge my colleagues to reject Michel just as we accepted the Hamilton amendment. In my judgment, it is a prelude to our own direct military involvement. We have indirectly funded these individuals which is, in a sense, against the spirit of American law. This is a prelude. I find it interesting that many in this body who are among the most vocal about our military involvement have never served in the military. Not all, but many who are among the most vocal, to get us involved in the military situations of Nicaragua have never served.

I necessarily do not believe that the Michel amendment is the solution.

□ 1830

I want to say this as well. I have found it very disparaging concerning the very negative remarks made about the American religious clergy who are opposed to the Michel amendment and who are trying to set the tone of our own moral involvement throughout the world. I, for one, am very grateful to the ministers and rabbis and priests and nuns and lay people who have thought enough of their moral responsiblity to take a bold stand on this. I, for one, am glad for their instruction.

I hope that we solidly reject the Michel amendment, which is a prelude to direct military involvement, just as our beginnings in Vietnam were a prelude to losing more than 50,000 American men and women in that terrible war.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues in the House, at the end of this debate I just want to say that I am more optimistic than many of the speakers that we have heard in this 2 days.

We see some flourishing of capitalism in Communist China. Mr. Gorbachev in the Soviet Union today opened some doors to capitalistic development. Albania, a former enemy, is now dealing with the White House. Algeria, a former enemy, is now dealing with the White House. Somalia, a former enemy, is now dealing with the White House and we are offering to send arms.

I ask you to consider just one thing, and that is that one of the mistakes that many of us on both sides of the aisle believe that has been made by our country is to use the CIA in a political role in Central America. Whether or not it is ultimately a success or not remains to be seen. We all hope it will be, regardless of how we vote. But we have seen that the politicalization of the CIA in a war role has hurt our clandestine collection activity and made its activity suspicious.

I ask you only one thing: The Michel substitute would call into question the role of the Agency for International Development, which has never before in this country been politicized. It has never been questioned as an instrument of covert activity or wartime policy of the United States of America, and regardless of how you feel about the ultimate outcome of our Nation's goals in Central America, to compromise another institution of our Government that has never been subject to compromise before is not in the best interest of the foreign policy of the United States of America.

Give the Hamilton approach the 6 months to see if we can succeed. If we do not, then strong measures can be taken and strong measures will be taken.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, let me make very quickly some, I think, key points that have already been discussed in this debate before we go to the vote.

First of all, the argument is made that what we are voting on is humanitarian aid. That is a misnomer. We are voting on logistical support for an army. In any other circumstances, this would be called military assistance. When we vote our defense budget, we do not call part of it humanitarian aid to our army and the other part of it military. It is all military, and that is what we are voting on here.

If you voted last night against military aid to the Contras, the consistent, clear vote would be now to vote against this military aid, and we do not even know what it is, because earlier during the discussion one of our colleagues asked the authors of this proposal, "What is the military aid? Does it include airplanes, helicopters, uniforms, construction equipment, trucks, helmets, dynamite?" And we were told they did not know what it included.

Mr. MICHEL. Will the gentleman yield? Is the gentleman asking me that question?

Mr. BARNES. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MICHEL. You know that is just absolutely a falsehood and trying to characterize my amendment as the same language as yesterday's, which admittedly was for military and paramilitary equipment, is not the case today, and it is a bald-faced lie to characterize it this way.

Mr. BARNES. The leader accuses me of lying. Let me say to the leader, the leader was not on the floor when the gentleman from Massachusetts asked the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] whether or not these items were included in the gentleman's amendment, and we were told that we had to accept the word of various people, but the amendment did not specifically prohibit these actions. That was the response that we were given during the debate.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNES. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. I suggested that the continuing resolution and the Intelligence Authorization Act of last year contains language drafted by Mr. BOLAND that still is operative, is not amended by the Michel resolution.

Mr. BARNES. But that will expire at the end of this fiscal year; is that correct?

Mr. HYDE. Sir, it is the law, and this does not amend that, and it forbids any military or paramilitary aid going into Nicaragua.

Mr. BARNES. It prohibits everything but logistical support to the Contras. We did have a discussion on this earlier. We do not have time for it now.

But I say to the distinguished leader that there was no desire to misrepresent. What I stated was what was stated earlier during the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the Michel-Broomfield approach will be a step toward peace.

The proposal before us permits the U.S. Agency for International Development to provide $14 million in humanitarian assistance to the Nicaraguan democratic opposition. This proposal also urges the President to impose an embargo on trade with Nicaragua as one sanction which could be used if Managua continues on its current path. This would be done if the Government of Nicaragua fails to negotiate in good faith with the democratic opposition.

This amendment gives humanitarian support to the democratic forces in Nicaragua. This is the least we can do for a group of men who relied on American constancy in this struggle. No arms would be provided under this program. This amendment provides a real incentive for the Sandinistas to seriously search for peace in the region.

America must press the Sandinistas to modify their behavior. Democracy doesn't need a congressionally imposed setback in that nearby region. I ask my colleagues to join me in this responsible approach to solving the problems in our backyard, and help democracy in the region.

As the President indicated in his letter today to Mr. MICHEL, the Michel amendment would give peace a chance. Let's support the Michel amendment.

I would also like to take this opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to compliment you on your fair and evenhandedness in handling the Committee of the Whole on what I think has been a very excellent debate, and I can assure you we on this side appreciate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appreciates all the compliments he can get.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like at this time now to yield the balance of our time to the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

If the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] would like to have a minute to make a point, I would be happy to yield him a minute of my time.

Mr. BARNES. I thank the distinguished minority leader, and I regret that the leader was not on the floor during the earlier discussion and felt that I was somehow representing his amendment.

What I was trying to do was to describe the discussion that had taken place earlier in the leader's absence, during which it was pointed out that the items that I just listed could, in fact, be provided under the gentleman's amendment. That was the discussion that was had earlier. I was not trying to represent the gentleman's amendment. I was simply trying to represent the discussion that had taken place earlier. As we have just been reminded by staff, this is new money through AID, and the other restrictions that applied to the funds that went through the intelligence process would not apply to this funding. So only those items on the munitions list, bullets, and so on, would be restricted.

So we would be able to provide, under the gentleman's amendment, as it has been explained to me and as was discussed earlier during the debate, anything in the nature of logistical support that is nonlethal.

Mr. MICHEL. It all depends on the characterization of what humanitarian assistance is. But let me say to our membership that the language of the amendment which is pending was not written by anybody other than those of us in the office, without administration assistance.

You all know yesterday we had a completely different tenor of amendment that was before us, and I outlined to the membership of this House under the restrictions which were imposed upon me to write that language in that form, which was military and paramilitary. I recognize, as you all know through public statements I have made, that the administration, that that, as such, would not fly in this House, and recognizing that we needed some give, this is the kind of language we came up with, which is talking about humanitarian assistance.

If I might refer to several paragraphs of the President's letter to both the Speaker and to the gentleman from Illinois under today's date:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 24, 1985.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I announced on April 4 a proposal to promote peace in Central America by fostering a dialogue between the Government of Nicaragua and the democratic resistance, accompanied by a ceasefire in the conflict between them. My proposal was intended, in the words of the Contadora Document of Objectives agreed to by Nicaragua and its neighbors, "to promote national reconciliation efforts . . ., with a view to fostering participation in democratic political processes in accordance with the law."

Since April 4, I have had the benefit of many fruitful exchanges with Latin American leaders and with members of the Congress. I have been encouraged by these discussions, which have shown that a broad consensus exists on the need for reconciliation in Nicaragua, based on democratic principles, as an essential aspect of achieving peace in Central America.

Today the House will vote on competing proposals on how to proceed with our policy in Central America. The choice to be made is a fundamental one that will have a lasting effect on the prospects for democracy, economic opportunity, and peace in this vital region.

The proposal to be offered by Mr. Barnes and Mr. Hamilton would divert funds from existing economic assistance and refugee accounts for humanitarian assistance to refugees outside Nicaragua and for the expenses of implementing an eventual Contadora agreement. Members of Congress should be under no illusion about this proposal. Its adoption would damage our national security and foreign policy interests. By providing a financial inducement for members of the resistance to leave Nicaragua and become refugees in other countries, it relieves pressure on the Sandinistas while, at the same time, it increases the burdens imposed on the neighboring democracies. As a result, fragile democracies would be weakened, their economic recovery would be stalled, their security would be diminished—and the civil war in Nicaragua would go on.

The other proposal before the House, to be offered by Mr. Michel, would appropriate $14 million in new funds to enable the Agency for International Development to provide humanitarian aid for the Nicaraguan democratic opposition. This alternative meets most of the objectives in my effort to promote a dialogue within Nicaragua which regional leaders have recognized is essential for peace in Central America. Rather than abandon the opposition, the Michel proposal would help to sustain it, giving peace a chance.

If Congress approves $14 million for assistance during the current fiscal year, no other U.S. Government funds would be spent for such material assistance to the armed democratic resistance. I will personally establish thorough procedures for the detailed management and accountability of the program in order to assure that these limitations on both the nature and amount of U.S. assistance are scrupulously observed.

I recognize the importance some members have attached to bilateral talks with the Government of Nicaragua. I am instructing my representatives to meet with representatives of the Government of Nicaragua. In their talks, the U.S. representative will press for a ceasefire as well as a church-mediated dialogue between the Sandinistas and the united democratic opposition. I must emphasize, however, that such bilateral talks must be in support of the Contadora process and cannot become a substitute for these efforts to achieve a comprehensive, verifiable agreement among all the nations of Central America. Also, as I said on April 4, peace negotiations must not become a cover for deception and delay. If the Sandinista government shows bad faith by seeking to gain unilateral advantage, for example, through a further arms buildup during a ceasefire or intransigence in negotiations, I would feel constrained to respond accordingly in our diplomatic efforts and would not expect the democratic resistance to continue to observe a ceasefire which was unfairly working to their disadvantage.

While economic sanctions are unlikely by themselves to create sufficient pressure to change Nicaragua's behavior, the Sandinistas should not benefit from their present access to the U.S. market while continuing their intransigence on issues affecting our national security. The Administration will favorably consider economic sanctions against the Government of Nicaragua and will undertake multilateral consultations with other Central American states in this regard.

The U.S. condemns atrocities by either side in the strongest possible terms. We will use our assistance to help ensure against wrongful acts by those who seek our help and we will urge them to take steps to investigate allegations of such acts and take appropriate actions against those found to be guilty.

The United States now stands at a moment of judgment. Experience has shown that a policy of support for democracy, economic opportunity, and security will best serve the people of Central America and the national interests of the United States. If we show consistency of purpose, if we are firm in our conviction that the promising developments over the past year in El Salvador, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Guatemala also show the way for a better future for Nicaragua, then over time we can help see the democratic center prevail over tyrants of the left or the right. But if we abandon democracy in Nicaragua, if we tolerate the consolidation of a surrogate state in Central America responsive to Cuba and the Soviet Union, we will see the progress that has been achieved begin to unravel under the strain of continuing conflict, attempts at subversion, and loss of confidence in our support.

There can be a more democratic, more prosperous, and more peaceful Central America. I am prepared to devote my energies toward that end. But, I also need the support of the Congress. Yesterday, the Senate in a bipartisan vote for peace and democracy confirmed the commitment of the United States to those who struggle for liberty. I urge that the House of Representatives support such a measure today.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman that if it was his President, of whatever stripe, when a President of the United States elected by all the people of this country, and certainly by the big majority of this President, gives me that kind of commitment in writing, be I Democrat, Republican, liberal, or conservative, I am going to believe my President. His credibility is on the line out there.

I say that you remove one part of the fragile but growing consensus for democracy in Central America and you weaken all the rest. This is why it is important for our Government to provide direct humanitarian aid to democratic forces within Nicaragua. We are not only demonstrating our personal concern for them, we are also telling the border States that we will not abandon our commitment to the democratic process in Nicaragua. If the democratic forces in Nicaragua are seen as a cohesive unit with a part to play in the future of their country, then, believe me, the Sandinistas are going to take them seriously, but if we force the democratic forces to abandon their own country in order to receive humanitarian aid, we will break their will and their unity. And then what possible incentive will there be for the Sandinistas to negotiate with those forces?

I have some other things to say, but there is one thing I would like to say in conclusion. I see that the Speaker is on the floor, and I hope I am not violating any confidence. The President called the Speaker this afternoon and asked the Speaker's assistance in support of my amendment versus the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland. The Speaker, I think quite appropriately, told the President that he and the President had a difference of opinion on this issue, and that frankly Members on the Democratic side were free to vote their conscience.

I doubled back with the Speaker because I wanted to know the gist of the conversation that took place. I know how strongly the Speaker feels on this issue, and I respect that feeling, just as I respect the feelings of those that have been expressed by other Members here today on both sides of the aisle. This is not the first time I have made an appeal on your side, because we frankly do not have sufficient votes on our side to pass anything in this House when we are 70 votes behind.

So keeping that one expression on the part of the Speaker in mind that my Democratic friends here are free to vote their conscience, I know that some of you have talked to me in private about what your deep-seated feelings are on this issue, how strongly you feel, and what you know is right, and I would say for this occasion, "Damn the politics, let's do what is right for the country." We will appreciate your vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL] has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

NOT VOTING—5

Badham	Lipinski	Traficant
Daniel	Rodino

□ 1900

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Badham for, with Mr. Rodino against.

Mr. GUARINI changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, no additional amendments are in order, and the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BROWN of California, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 247) to provide U.S. assistance to foster peace and nurture democratic institutions throughout Central America, pursuant to House Resolution 136, he reported the joint resolution back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 123, nays 303, not voting 7, as follows:

NOT VOTING—7

Badham	Lipinski	Traficant
Daniel	Rodino
Davis	Schulze

□ 1920

Messrs. BREAUX, ROSTENKOWSKI, TAUKE, and VOLKMER and Mrs. LONG changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. COYNE and Mr. VOLKMER changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the joint resolution was not passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and include extraneous matter, on House Joint Resolution 247, the joint resolution just defeated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 1555, INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AND DEVELOPMENT COOPERATION ACT OF 1985

Mr. MOAKLEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-57) on the resolution (H. Res. 140) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 1555) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the Arms Export Control Act, and the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, to authorize development and security assistance programs for fiscal year 1986, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 1869, REPEAL OF CONTEMPORANEOUS RECORDKEEPING REQUIREMENTS ADDED BY THE TAX REFORM ACT OF 1984

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 1869) to repeal the contemporaneous recordkeeping requirements added by the Tax Reform Act of 1984, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. ROSTENKOWSKI, GIBBONS, PICKLE, RANGEL, STARK, DUNCAN, ARCHER, and VANDER JAGT.

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring of the distinguished majority leader the program for the balance of this evening, tomorrow, the rest of the week, next week or whatever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. If my distinguished friend the minority leader would yield.

Mr. MICHEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. This concludes the business for today. Initially we had planned, as the gentleman may be aware, to have a pro forma session tomorrow.

It came to our attention in whisps of rumor and other diverse and somewhat surreptitious ways that votes were going to be demanded tomorrow by individuals asserting their rights under the rule to get votes of one kind or another, and based upon that understanding or that supposition, we will meet at 11 as originally planned, and will take up only the rule and general debate on the State Department and related agencies authorizations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

The thought behind this is that if Members are intent on causing some votes, let us get them out of the way early and do some good with them, at least by achieving some progress in the legislative schedule, and then hope that they will permit their colleagues to pursue other plans that their colleagues have made, by being able to get away at a reasonable hour.

There will be no session Friday, and we have no plan at this moment to announce the schedule for next week; we would announce that tomorrow.

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 192

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ROBERT F. SMITH] be removed from the list of cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 192.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL CHILD SAFETY WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 33) designating the week of April 29 through May 5, 1985, as "National Child Safety Week," with Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the month of May 1985, as "National Child Safety Awareness Month", and to call upon Federal, State, and local government agencies, and the people of the United States to observe the month with appropriate programs, activities and ceremonies for the better protection, security, and safety of all children.

Amend the preamble so as to read:

Whereas more than 1,500,000 children have been reported missing in the United States;

Whereas many of these children are never found;

Whereas missing children are often innocent victims of physical and sexual abuse;

Whereas many local volunteer groups already are working enthusiastically to promote child safety;

Whereas the Missing Children Act and the Missing Children's Assistance Act have facilitated the investigation and prosecution of crimes involving missing and exploited children;

Whereas there is now a national clearinghouse, The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, and a toll-free hotline to centralize the efforts to locate missing children;

Whereas The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children provides educational child safety materials and information about identification procedures, such as voluntary fingerprinting, dental charting and photographing of children;

Whereas information received through the toll-free hotline is disseminated to appropriate law enforcement agencies;

Whereas the protection, safety, and security of all children should be one of our highest priorities; and

Whereas it is essential that we continue to increase public awareness and provide information and assistance to combat and prevent the increasing problem of missing and exploited children: Now, therefore, be it.

Amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution designating the month of May 1985, as 'National Child Safety Awareness Month' ".

Mr. GARCIA (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but I would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 33 is identical to the bill passed by this body on April 4, 1985, which designated the week of April 29 through May 5, 1985, as National Child Safety Week. The other body amended the bill, and it now designates the entire month of May as National Child Safety Awareness Month.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. LEWIS], who is the key sponsor of House Joint Resolution 33.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I only want to clarify for the Members of this body that this is the same legislation which passed the House on April 4.

However, the other body has made a minor change; that is, this resolution now designates a month, rather than a week, in honor of child safety.

As the chief sponsor of this bill, I lend my support to this modification and encourage my colleagues to join me in passing this worthwhile legislation.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the legislation just considered and adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

REMARKS OF SPEAKER THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR., ALFRED M. LANDON LECTURE ON PUBLIC ISSUES, KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

(Mr. SLATTERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 22, the Honorable THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR., Speaker of the House, delivered the Landon lecture at Kansas State University. His remarks were received enthusiastically by a standing room only crowd. The Speaker's comments are a tremendous testament to 50 years of progress in our Nation and the Government's role in helping to create a better society for all Americans. His remarks are an excellent addition to this distinguished lecture series, and I wish to share them with my colleagues. I commend the Speaker's comments to you because they carry a message of optimism for each of us.

REMARKS OF SPEAKER THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.

President Acker, Governor Carlin, Congressman Jim Slattery, members of the board of regents, faculty, students and friends.

Forty nine years ago, the name of Governor Alf Landon appeared on the ballot as the Republican candidate for President of the United States. In the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, there appeared on some of the same ballots the name of a young Democratic candidate for State Legislature—Tip O'Neill.

That was my first successful campaign for public office. And I appreciate the opportunity to come out here today, to the home state of Alf Landon, to honor the man who headed the other political team back in 1936.

I am glad to be here for another reason. As you know, President Reagan often invokes the words of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. I think it is only fair that if a conservative Republican President can bring himself to honor a great liberal, Democratic President, the least I can do is come out here and honor the Republican who ran against him.

I would like to take this opportunity to say something complimentary about our President. When President Reagan was first elected, I, like many others, made the mistake of underestimating his unique abilities. When I first met him I kidded him by saying "Welcome to the big leagues, Mr. President."

After five years of dealing in close combat with the President, I can now attest to the fact that when it comes to communicating with the American people, when it comes to stating his philosophy clearly and plainly, when it comes to making the strongest possible public case for what he believes in, Ronald Reagan, our President, is in a league by himself.

In the few minutes I have this morning, I want to offer you my own view of our country's history, my own philosophy of our American democracy and of our American government. I want to put today's headlines in perspective, to review what our country has achieved in the past, what challenges it faces today, and what role it can play in the future.

First, I want to report to you on two matters that have been very much in the headlines: my recent visit to Russia and tomorrow's vote in the Congress on Nicaragua.

A week ago today, I returned from an important and dramatic visit to Moscow and Leningrad. Our delegation was bi-partisan and I carried with me a letter from the President to Mr. Gorbachev, the new General Secretary of the Communist Party.

I have returned with a strong determination that relations between our countries be improved. It is clear to me that the new Soviet chairman is a tough, vigorous and shrewd leader. He proved to us in a meeting lasting almost four hours that he is a skilled advocate of his government's positions and could be a tough negotiator.

The key question for the United States is whether this change in leadership will lead to a change in relations between our two countries. Beginning with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, Soviet-American relations have declined steadily. We are experiencing what one historian has called a "period of peril" in our relations, similar to the one just after World War II.

These periods of high tension between the United States and the Soviet Union are a cause of enormous concern. Our two nations are nuclear superpowers. We have the capability of destroying not only each other but all of civilization.

For forty years, we have been locked in an economic, ideological, technological, and strategic competition with the Soviet Union, a competition that spanned every corner of the globe. The invasion of Afghanistan, the suppression of Solidarity in Poland and suppression of human rights in their own country, the shooting down of the Korean Airliner, and the recent shooting of an American military officer in Germany have worsened our view of Soviet policies and intentions.

Yet, fortunately for the world, the intense feelings between our two countries has not led to a direct military conflict. One of the reasons is that our two governments have maintained full diplomatic relations, consulted regularly and concluded several important arms control treaties.

I have returned from my trip to Russia convinced that, at the very least we need to maintain these vital lines of communication.

I have come to appreciate something more—

Too often in the past, we have reacted to Soviet behavior with sanctions, such as a grain embargo, that have hurt us almost as much as they have hurt the Soviets. We have to be tough in our dealings with them, but we also have to be smart.

Recent Soviet behavior in Afghanistan, Poland and internally has created major obstacles on the road to normal relations between our two countries. The road to smoother relations is a long and difficult one, but this much is clear: the farther we advance down that road the easier it will be to avoid war and to guard the peace.

My visit to the Soviet Union reminded me of the difference between a democratic and communist country. Here in the United States we have the opportunity to freely discuss our differences. We have the right to speak openly, to question national policy and to propose alternatives.

Let me say a word about an area of national policy that is the source of major controversy at the present time. I refer to the Administration's policy in Central America.

The Congress, as you know, has voted to give massive amounts of military and economic aid to the government of El Salvador. The purpose of this aid is to help that country build a united, democratic nation that is secure against aggression.

It is one thing to help a country like El Salvador that we support. It is another to aid in the overthrow of a government like Nicaragua that we do not support. Too many times in this century, the United States has tried to solve Latin American problems with the use of force. So-called "gunboat diplomacy" has gotten us nowhere; it has only earned us enemies in the region.

Instead of acting to overthrow governments, we should be working with those Latin nations attempting to build peace in the region. Our best bet in Central America is not gunboat diplomacy but smart diplomacy. We need to ally ourselves with the process that began at Contadora and base our policy on a firm foundation of regional cooperation.

I came here today to discuss a broader, philosophical debate on our country's future. It deals with the role of government in American life, what we can and should do together to improve the chances of every citizen for "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

I want to begin by doing what President Reagan does so often, quoting Franklin Roosevelt.

The year was 1942, in the dark early days of World War II. The Nazis controlled almost all of Europe. In Asia, the Japanese Empire was at its zenith. Our country, having just entered the war, faced the terrible challenge of mobilizing a peacetime economy, still staggering from the Great Depression, into a war machine capable of stopping and beating the worst menace to mankind in history. Franklin Roosevelt never doubted what a united American people could accomplish.

"The most significant fact in recent American history," he said, "is the ability of the American people to face a tough situation and to take orderly and united action in their own behalf—and in behalf of the things in which they believe."

Those are not merely the stirring words of a great leader. I testify, as an eye-wintess, to what our American democracy can accomplish. I know, because I have witnessd it myself, in my own lifetime, what America can achieve.

There are those who come to young people today and preach to them gloom and doom. They tell everything that is wrong with our political system and with our government. They tell you how great things were way back when, and how bad things are today.

Don't believe the message. People who talk about the "good old days" have either forgotten about the past or never lived through it in the first place.

Let me take a moment to describe a country to you—

This country is a desperate place. Half the people live in poverty. Twenty five percent of the workforce are unemployed. Life is little better for those who are working. The policeman works 12 hours a day—84 hours a week. The fireman is on duty even longer—108 hours a week. The postman delivers mail even on Christmas day. For most, the work week is six days long. The only time workers have for themselves and their families is on Sunday. If you become sick, your world collapses. For most people, health insurance is out of the question.

Life for the elderly is filled with uncertainty, dependency and horror. When you get old, you are without income, without hope. Only the lucky few have pensions. Social Security does not exist.

In the country I describe there is only the very rich at the top and millions of poor at the bottom—with huge and terrible distance in between. There is no middle class whatever: only a small elite, just three percent, go to college.

This land I describe is not some third-world nation in Africa. It is the United States of America, the America of the 1930s, the America I knew when I first entered public life.

When I look at the problems we face today, I never forget how far we have come in a half century. By the 1970's, we had cut poverty in this country from 50 percent, where it was in the 1930's, to just over 11 percent.

The America of the 1980's is no longer a nation with a small upper class and giant lower class. There is a broad middle class of Americans. 65 percent of our young men and women are able to go on to college. 99 percent of our workers have some form of health insurance. Social Security has made it possible for people to retire with a minimal, steady income, not to have to live in fear and dependency. Without such protection, half of those people now living on Social Security would be living in poverty.

This massive improvement in American life did not come about by accident. It happened because, in F.D.R.'s words, our people faced up to a tough situation and took united action in behalf of the things they believed in. It resulted from national policies that stimulated development in energy, housing, transportation and every other sector of the economy. Economic growth came about, most of all, because government at every level was willing to invest in the most vital of all national resources, the individual human mind.

These achievements in economic and social progress were not the work of just one political party.

America survived the dust bowl of the 1930's because of the grace of God and because the American farmer developed the know-how to take agriculture to the level of a science in this country.

Our agriculture is the wonder and salvation of the world because of universities like Kansas State, established more than a century ago through the inspiration of the greatest of all Republican Presidents, Abraham Lincoln.

It was Franklin Roosevelt who saw the calamity that old age could be and founded Social Security. It was FDR again who signed the GI Bill of Rights that gave so many of your parents and grandparents the chance to go to college and that helped create the great American middle class we have today.

It was President Dwight Eisenhower of Abilene, Kansas who oversaw construction of our great interstate highway system that has helped to open up the heartland of America to economic progress and development. It was this same Republican President who signed the National Defense Education Act, which offered so many deserving young Americans the opportunity to go to college and which established education as a vital element in our nation's strength and security.

The social progress of the past fifty years has improved working conditions, provided health protection through Medicare and provided secure retirements through Social Security. At the same time, our society has accepted a strong role in caring for those who cannot take care of themselves: the sick, the handicapped, the elderly. We have provided a safety net for those who need protection, who cannot, for whatever reason, fend for themselves.

Such achievements are rarely recognized today. Whenever I meet with a group of successful business people, someone always stands up and says we would be better off without government. For such persons, I have a very simple question: Who paid for your college education? Was it a state government that helped pay for a state university? Was it a community college or a city university? Or was it the GI bill that financed your education—or a government-sponsored loan?

Then, I have another question for them: If they, the "success stories" of this country, needed a helping hand up the ladder of success, why should we not try and give the same help to those young people who are trying to get ahead today? If government could offer opportunities to young people back in the 1950's and 1960's, why should we deny that same help to young people in the 1980's?

I believe it is wrong for someone who has found his way up the economic and social ladder to pull that ladder up behind him, to deny those at the bottom the chance to pull themselves up. No society can exist on a public philosophy of I Got Mine; Forget the Others.

We Americans believe in fair play. As citizens of this country we accept the duties as well as the privileges of a democratic society. Just as parents must take care of their children when the children are young, so must children ensure the livelihood of their parents when they grow old. That is the basis of modern society and of civilization itself.

Too often we hear politicians and journalists demean the role of government enterprise and tell us what we cannot accomplish. But those who argue that government cannot perform valuable services go against the grain of our history.

America has worked, America has progressed, because we have combined our enterprise, both public and private, for the good of all. That is how we pulled our nation from the Great Depression, won the Second World War, released the power of the atom and put Americans on the moon. That is how we built the fairest, free-est, most progressive society in the world.

Much of our progress has been based not on the work of one party acting alone but through the building of a consensus between our two great political parties.

In the days after World War II, President Harry Truman launched the Marshall Plan which saved Europe and laid the foundation for the Western Alliance. He could not have done so without the aid of such Republicans as Senator Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan.

In the 1950's, President Eisenhower did not dismantle the New Deal, but accepted such advances as Social Security.

President Lyndon Johnson could never have signed the great civil rights legislation of the 1960's without the bipartisan support of Republican leaders like Senator Everett Dirksen of Illinois.

Many times in our history, one party has managed to learn from the other party.

For years, Democrats argued we should end the isolation of China and open up ties with the People's Republic. When a Republican President finally took this historic step, we Democrats applauded him.

For years, we Democrats have argued for a reform of the tax system, for the need to make the system fairer. If President Reagan presents such a measure, we Democrats will be there to help.

For years, Republicans argued against the evils of big deficits. They convinced many Americans, including many Democrats, of the need for greater fiscal responsibility. Unfortunately for the country, some Republicans seem to have forgotten their own lesson along the way.

Today, we face serious challenges.

Despite the economic recovery of the past two years, there are serious pockets of economic despair.

The poverty rate, which had declined dramatically by the 1970's, has risen to 15 percent of our population. It is particularly high among young Americans. A disturbing twenty five percent of our children of preschool age are living below the poverty line.

Across much of America's industrial belt there is a rust bowl to rival the dust bowl of the 1980's. We need to rebuild American industry and to establish fair trade laws that give our industry a fair chance to compete in world markets.

Hundreds of thousands of American farm families face a terrible dilemma. They are caught in a tightening vice of high interest rates that drive up the cost of doing business and a high-priced dollar that cuts into their markets both here and abroad. While the Administration remains opposed to our legislation to extend farm credits, I am hopeful that it will take some steps to cut interest rates and restore a reasonable price for the dollar.

Most of our problems relate to the budget. Our national debt has doubled since 1981. It will triple again by the end of this Administration unless we take the tough steps that are needed. If President Reagan accepts tough reductions in Pentagon waste, we will be ready and prepared to find savings on the domestic side. Just as we reached agreement on revenue policy in 1982, and Social Security reform in 1983, we can achieve agreement on budget and tax reform in 1985.

I cite these challenges not because they are insurmountable but because they can and will be overcome.

I began my public life in 1936 on a slogan of "Work and wages." I remain convinced that our greatest goal is to give the average family the opportunity to earn an income, to own a home, to educate their children and to have some security in their later years. That is still the American dream and it is still worth fighting for.

Today, there are those who argue that the way to achieve this dream is to go it alone, to forget about those less fortunate. This new morality says that the young should forget about the old, the healthy should ignore the sick, the wealthy should forget the poor.

That is an alien philosophy to our country. We Americans believe in hard work, in getting ahead, but we also believe in looking out for the other guy. That is our tradition, from the early days when settlers got together for barn-raisers. It continues today, as Americans, down to the youngest school child, chip in to help the starving in Africa. Thanks to the know-how of the American farmer and the generosity of our country itself, you here in the breadbasket of America are pursuing the work not only of man, but of God.

I have just come from a country, the Soviet Union, that recognizes neither the existence of God nor the rights of man. I have returned to a nation that has insisted from its earliest beginnings that the individual human being is of fundamental value; that the humblest, meekest person has the right to be treated with dignity and with respect.

Our whole history has been a two hundred year struggle to strengthen and enlarge the benefits of democratic freedom; to include women and minorities and young people in our electoral process; to protect the individual rights and welfare of all our citizens, to build social and economic opportunity for everyone. Looking back on a half century of public life, I have seen the greatness of this struggle and I have seen truth in the optimism of my friend John F. Kennedy—

"Our problems are manmade—therefore, they can be solved by man. Man's reason and spirit have often solved the seemingly unsolvable and we believe they can do it again."

With American ingenuity and American generosity, this, our one nation under God will not only survive our current challenges; it will prevail and flourish.

VANISHING AMERICANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call attention to a group of vanishing Americans, the American Indian and the American farmer.

Yes, the American farmer, Mr. Speaker, is decreasing in great numbers. Only 1.4 percent of all of the Americans in this great land produce the food and the fiber which we take for granted.

Mr. Speaker, America has traditionally been called the melting pot of the world, for no where else do you find people from so many backgrounds and philosophies living and working together.

It is the diversity of the people of this country that makes us so strong—and it is the unity that we have that makes us successful.

But, there are times, Mr. Speaker, when the diversity of this country works against the common good. Such is the case now with the problems facing our agricultural system.

American agriculture is not limited to just a few commodities or to a single area of the country. Instead, our agriculture system grows almost every type of food imaginable, and there are farmers in almost every section of the country.

We have a complex and extensive agribusiness community in this country and most of the food our Nation consumes is grown, marketed, and sold right here.

So, when you talk about American agriculture, you're talking about farmers and ranchers of every type. The companies who buy and market the products have an interest in how agriculture is run in this country. Retailers who sell the food are a part of this system. And, of course, the consumer who buys groceries at the supermarket is a part of this network.

In between, there are thousands of other people who are involved in American agriculture. In short, Mr. Speaker, there are estimates that 25 percent of our population is in some way directly or indirectly employed because of the success of America's farmers.

But, right now, America's farmers are facing tremendous financial difficulties, and their problems are causing repercussions throughout the agricultural network.

High interest rates, the strong American dollar, and increases in production costs have made it almost impossible for farmers to make a profit. As their debts mount up, many of them are losing their farms, and the banks that loaned them money aren't getting it back selling the farms in today's depleted farm real estate market.

As farmers go out of business and find it harder to borrow money, many agribusiness companies are affected. For example, the market for farm equipment declines, and both the manufacturer and the retailer suffer.

Our farm problems have caused repercussions this far along the chain, Mr. Speaker, and the negative effects will continue to be passed along. Inevitably, the problems our farmers are having will affect you and me, the American consumer. If our farms continue to close and it continues to be difficult to make a profit farming, then eventually, our food supply in this country will begin to drop. Once it does, we will have to turn to imports or invest considerable Government capital to provide food for our citizens. And, if we let it reach this point, then the low-priced food products we enjoy now will be only a memory.

There is also tremendous danger for our Nation's security if we allow ourselves to become dependent on other countries for our food. Not only can this be used as a method of political blackmail, but it is impossible to make solid defense plans when you cannot guarantee a stable food supply for your troops and populace.

The greatest difficulty we now face in finding a solution to the agricultural problems is that the various and diverse people that are involved in this chain can't seem to get together. There is no unity within the agricultural community of this country—only fighting to save individual products, commodities, or regions.

We have never been able to solve problems in this country by infighting. Workable, effective solutions have only come about when all the different factions stopped protecting their own interests long enough to seek a comprehensive solution.

I will be introducing a sense of the Congress resolution on Thursday that will encourage a vehicle for uniting our agricultural community. This resolution urges the administration to form a blue-ribbon agricultural commission, made up of the best minds from all the various segments of agriculture.

This task force would be called together to look at the overall picture of American agriculture. It would not replace current agricultural committees we now have, since they have been very effective in examining the individual aspects of agriculture. Instead, it would be a mechanism for pulling together the now divided farm community.

So far, 59 of my colleagues, from both sides of the aisle, have joined me in sponsoring this bill, and the administration has already indicated its interest in forming such a task force. I am inserting a list of those cosponsors for the RECORD, Mr. Speaker.

I want to urge my colleagues who are concerned about the future of agriculture in this country to join me Thursday as I introduce this bill. The problems of America's farmers affect us all. Those of us who represent heavily rural districts are feeling the effects now. But let me assure you, if we don't find an answer soon, our entire Nation will feel the repercussions.

VERTICAL RESTRAINTS GUIDELINES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the antitrust enforcement policy guidelines entitled "Vertical Restraints Guidelines," published by the Department of Justice on January 23, 1985, do not have the force of law, do not accurately state current antitrust law, and should not be considered by the courts of the United States as binding or persuasive.

The Justice Department issued the guidelines for the stated purpose of explaining Federal enforcement policy under the Sherman Act and the Clayton Act with regard to nonprice vertical restraints of trade and to achieve "a reduction in antitrust uncertainty." No Government cases of this nature have been filed, however, for over 4 years. Vertical restraints are imposed by a seller on others downstream in a chain of distribution and limit the conditions under which firms may purchase, sell, or resell a product or service.

Despite a disclaimer to the contrary, the vertical guidelines in fact extend well beyond nonprice restraints, such as territorial restrictions and exclusive dealing arrangements, into price-related restraints such as resale price maintenance. The Supreme Court held in 1911, in deciding Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. John D. Parke and Sons Co., 220 U.S. 373, that resale price maintenance is a per se violation of the Sherman Act, which means that its effect on competition is so destructive that it is held flatly unlawful without further analysis of its specific anticompetitive effects. That has been the settled law ever since.

Although the guidelines state that vertical price fixing is per se illegal, they actually contain an astonishing invitation to evade the per se rule. The following statement appears on page 11:

> If a supplier adopts a bona fide distribution program embodying both nonprice and price restrictions, the Department will analyze the entire program under the rule of reason if the nonprice restraints are plausibly designed to create efficiencies and if the price restraint is merely ancillary to the nonprice restraints.

In short all one has to do is add enough plausible nonprice restrictions to a vertical price-fixing scheme to make the latter merely ancillary and the entire distribution program will be analyzed by the Department under its efficiency-weighted rule of reason. This is not what current antitrust law provides or intends.

The guidelines are troubling in other ways as well. Contrary to current antitrust jurisprudence, they state that intrabrand restraints on competition are of minimal concern, and suggest that vertical price-fixing is lawful as long as such agreements do not set specific retail prices. The guidelines also ignore the common law of corporate responsibility and agency in suggesting that the Department may refuse to attribute to corporations illegal conduct by lower-level employees, although they are acting within the scope of their authority.

Mr. Ira M. Millstein, a distinguished member of the New York antitrust bar and a former chairman of the American Bar Association section on antitrust law, declared in a statement submitted to the Monopolies and Commercial Law Subcommittee this week that—

> [T]hese official yet so-called informal guidelines have the force and effect of regulation if not of law; they have the full force of government enforcement policy behind them. They impact business decision making—in a major way. In bringing cases or filing amicus briefs, the government attempts to persuade the courts to adopt the principles stated in the guidelines.

When the vertical guidelines are demonstrably in error, therefore, it is the duty of Congress to declare that such is the case. This is precisely what the resolution I am introducing today will do. It states clearly that the guidelines are not an accurate expression of the Federal antitrust laws or of congressional intent with regard to the application of such laws to resale price maintenance and other vertical price-related restraints of trade, and that they should not be accorded any force of law or be treated by the courts of the United States as binding or persuasive. They further declare that the guidelines should be recalled by the Attorney General for review and should not be reissued before providing fair procedures to allow public participation in the formulation of such policy guidelines, including public notice and hearings. Even such procedures cannot, of course, endow the guidelines with the force of law or enable them to modify or supersede the antitrust laws.

My resolution complements and is fully consistent with H.R. 1467, the Antitrust Procedural Fairness Act of 1985, which I introduced with bipartisan cosponsorship on March 7, 1985. That bill would require the antitrust enforcement agencies, the Department of Justice, and the Federal Trade Commission, to meet certain procedural due-process requirements, including providing the opportunity for public notice and comment, before guidelines are issued in final form. I am pleased to note that Mr. Millstein is fully supportive of such legislation. As he has written:

> I see no reason why these statements and guidelines should not be developed with public participation as is other government regulation or legislation. At a minimum, public participation in developing such "policy" statements would help to ease the perception that an agency is governing a field without regard for or responsibility to Congress or the public.

I am confident that H.R. 1467 will ultimately be enacted into law. My resolution regarding the vertical guidelines is the vehicle for a more immediate response by the Congress, which is urgently required as well.

Mr. Speaker, I invite cosponsorship of this resolution by those who are as concerned as I am about vigorous and effective enforcement of our antitrust laws against resale price maintenance and other vertical restraints of trade.●

H.R. 1575, EQUAL ACCESS TO COMMERCIAL CREDIT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to legislation recently introduced by our colleague the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL] which would ensure equal access to business or commercial credit for women and minorities. I have been honored to work with Mr. MITCHELL in developing the legislation and to be the original cosponsor of the bill, H.R. 1575.

The bill clarifies the application of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act of 1974 to commercial or business credit. As you are aware, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act prohibits discrimination in credit transactions on the basis of race, color, national origin, sex or marital status, or age. Despite the congressional intent that the act apply to commercial as well as consumer transactions, certain exemptions provided for in the Federal Reserve Board regulations implementing the act have been widely interpreted to mean that the provisions of the act do not have to apply to commercial credit in actual practice.

The Federal Reserve Board regulations exempt business and commercial credit from provisions of the act which provide for: First, notification of adverse action regarding a loan application, including a written statement of reasons for the adverse action; second, retention of records, including information used in evaluation of the credit application; and third, information concerning marital status. Our bill would provide for renewable 5-year exemptions after a full administrative hearing and formal written determination that the exemption would not substantially interfere with effecting the purposes of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act.

We have been made aware that access to credit has been a significant problem for women and minority entrepreneurs or would-be entrepreneurs. We must not allow discrimination against women and minority business owners to continue. Discrimination in business credit transactions not only is not in compliance with the intent of the Equal Credit Opportunity Act, but it serves to stifle the growth, development and vitality of a significant and promising portion of the small business sector.

H.R. 1575 is critically needed to insure fairness and equity for women and minorities and to permit the vitality of American entrepreneurship to flourish.

We are proud of this important legislation. I urge my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring H.R. 1575 and I hope we will see early and favorable consideration of the measure by the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.●

OUR ENDLESS SPIRIT OF VOLUNTARISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DIOGUARDI] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest facets of American culture that makes this Nation the best and most caring on Earth is our endless spirit of volunteerism. Throughout our Nation's history, millions of people have given their time, energy and individual talents to help better the lives of others.

Individuals, churches, businesses, schools and other organizations have made special contributions to this spirit. Sponsoring activities and other initiatives to promote the welfare of the whole community is to be commended. All too often, many people are unwilling to participate in philanthropic endeavors unless there exists some form of material benefit. This is unfortunate because the sense of helping others and knowing that you have made a contribution to the betterment of society is the greatest award any individual can achieve.

The spirit of volunteerism is especially important today. At a time when we see the Federal Government moving away from many social responsibilities and placing these tasks upon the private sector and the American people, we must make every effort to promote individual initiative on the behalf of others.

Each year, the Volunteer Services Bureau of Westchester, Inc., an organization which has an outstanding record of community service, honors those individuals and groups that have displayed extraordinary dedication and commitment to the volunteer spirit.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize those special winners of the 1985 Westchester Volunteer of the Year Awards. They are:

Volunteer of the year, William E. Goff;

Group award, the Lakeland Children's Center, Founders;

Student award, Frank Mastracchio;

RSVP award, Mrs. Hannah Churgin; and Corporate award, Adopt-A-School Volunteers.

I submit for inclusion in the RECORD, statements which detail the accomplishments of these groups and individuals.

1985 WESTCHESTER VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

Mr. William Goff was chosen as 1985 Westchester Volunteer of the Year because of his dedicated service at Peekskill Mental Health and in particular his efforts toward the opening of "Bargains Galore Boutique", a project of the Peekskill Community Advisory Board of Harlem Valley Psychiatric Center.

Bill is the type of volunteer every agency covets. He is dedicated, reliable, flexible and multi-talented. He joined the Retired Senior Volunteer Program (RSVP) in 1982 and has been involved in numerous volunteer activities in the Peekskill community such as the Red Cross, the Montrose Veteran's Administration Hospital and the Peekskill Presbyterian Church.

At Peekskill Mental Health he assisted in several vocational groups and in the Sheltered Workshop at the "New Beginnings Program". His flexibility and good nature endeared him to both clients and staff. Although he has no formal training in psychology, clients open up to him and he is a good listener with an empathetic ear.

Mr. Goff's commitment and indispensability grew during the thrift shop project. He prepared the store for occupancy and took part in all the tasks necessary to open the shop. Since its opening, the boutique has been a marvelous success largely due to his hard work. Bill does the maintenance, provides plant care and greats each customer with a smile.

Bill Goff's volunteer service has made a difference to everyone—to the clients and staff and to the customers at the shop. He approaches each person and task with care and dedication that make him certainly deserving of the 1985 Westchester Volunteer of the Year Award.

GROUP VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

The founders of the Lakeland Children's Center are the reward recipients in the "group" category for 1985 Westchester Volunteer of the Year. They are: Gayle Leaversuch of Mohegan Lake who is currently President of the Center; Judy Shepard, also of Mohegan Lake, Vice President responsible for fundraising; Barbara Knapp of Yorktown Heights, Assistant Treasurer of Lakeland; Lea Seiden of Yorktown Heights who serves as Chairperson of Public Relations; and Carolyn Sweet of Peekskill, who is Chairperson of Personnel for the Center.

These women joined together in September 1981 out of their common concerns over the needs of "latch-key" children and the lack of suitable after-school day care in their area. The common sense solution to their problem was to utilize existing facilities, i.e., school buildings. With the support of the school board, district staff, and other community volunteers, the group was able to open three in-school centers simultaneously, named the Lakeland Children's Center which provide after-school supervised care for children aged 5–12.

The Center currently provides child care services to over 120 children who might otherwise return to an empty home following school dismissal. The paid staff consists of an Executive Director (part-time), three teachers and three adult aides. There are also 14 student volunteers. The children can select from a variety of enrichment programs, relax in a quiet place, or just play with other children.

The founders of the Lakeland Children's Center are to be commended for identifying a problem, finding a solution and seeing it through. Over the past three years they have donated their own special talents and have been responsible for finding other volunteers to provide accounting, legal, marketing, public relations, and fund raising services to the Center. Their involvement has not only made a difference in the lives of the families served by the Center but also enriched the lives of all who have participated in development of a Community Project.

STUDENT VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

The 1985 Student Volunteer of the Year is Frank Mastracchio, a senior at White Plains High School. His volunteer activities cover a broad spectrum of interests ranging from American Red Cross to the Civil Air Patrol to regular service with the Valhalla Ambulance Corps. His first volunteer experience was as a fifth grader when he served for two years with the Westchester Association for Retarded Citizens (W.A.R.C.)

Mastracchio's three year interest in the Westchester County Red Cross started with his participation in the 1982 Swimathon and has continued to this day.

His service with the Ambulance Corps has come as a result of the First Aid and Safety course offered by the Red Cross. He became interested in the Civil Air Patrol through his experience as an Explorer Scout and the opportunity to participate in disaster relief and air search programs.

Although he has been teased somewhat by his peers for "wasting his time and not getting paid", he counters by saying, "to volunteer and extend one's hand and heart to others is the ultimate feeling."

Next year, Frank plans to begin pre-med courses at the City University of New York.

RSVP VOLUNTEER OF THE YEAR

The Retired Senior Volunteer Program's (RSVP) Volunteer of the Year is Hannah Churgin of White Plains. R.S.V.P. is part of a nationwide network designed for persons 60 years of age and older who wish to use their skills, life experiences, time and energy in serving community needs. Mrs. Churgin who retired in 1976 from a manufacturing firm, moved from the Bronx four years ago and immediately became active in the Tower Club, whose members carry out many programs of volunteer service. As she says, "what I'm doing now keeps me going. I enjoy it—I've got to do something."

One of Mrs. Churgin's primary interests is the Westchester Association for Retarded Citizens (W.A.R.C.) where she contributes over three days a week to the Red Balloon Gift Shop. She serves as a stock and price analyzer, sales representative and is a member of the Gift Shop Advisory Committee. The gift shop provides specially selected clients with a therapeutic work experience.

As a member of the WARC staff explains, "Hannah's pleasant disposition plays a vital role in initiating positive interrelationships between our clients and other customers. She exhibits patience, warmth, and flexibility while serving our mentally disabled clients."

Another of Mrs. Churgin's interests is the Women's American Organization for Rehabilitation Training (O.R.T.) where she has been a member for 19 years, the past 11 as secretary and treasurer of her chapter in the Bronx, which includes a large Westchester membership. She also takes on projects for the American Cancer Society and the County Office for the Aging.

CORPORATE—ADOPT-A-SCHOOL VOLUNTEERS

Represented by Rosemarie Siragusa, Chairman of the Youth Committee of the Westchester Private Industry Council (WPIC) and Joan Gilbert of Texaco, Chairman of the (WPIC) Adopt-A-School Committee.

The Adopt-A-School program is a partnership between business and education which entails a mutual commitment to improving the educational experience for students in a local school district. Upon "adoption," school and business partners plan and conduct activities which enhance the learning opportunities for students. Adopt-A-School is based on a true volunteer concept since the corporations and schools are giving of themselves by sharing staff and resources on a direct basis other than just corporate funding of grants.

A unique aspect of the program is that it can be taken on by either small or large companies. Thirteen companies of various sizes who are currently involved are: Avon, Chemical Bank, Citibank, N.A., General Electric Conference Center, Houlihan/Lawrence Realty, MONY, Planned Expansion Group, Rye Town Hilton, Seidman and Seidman, Stouffers, Tarrytown Hilton, Texaco and Westchester Rockland Newspapers.

Ms. Rosemarie Siragusa, Chairman of the WPIC Youth Committee and Ms. Joan Gilbert of Texaco, Chairman of the WPIC Adopt-A-School Committee introduced the program to Westchester in 1984 and continue to give their time coordinating the efforts of the participants and influencing other corporations to join. Ms. Gilbert, catalyst for the program, says that the matching process is very successful and more corporations and schools are showing interest.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, I would like to say that it gives me great pleasure to know that the spirit of volunteerism is still thriving in America today. The American people are truly this Nation's most valuable asset and I am proud to present the Westchester Volunteer Award winners to my colleagues in this great body.

RESTITUTION AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUCHER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Speaker, 2½ years ago the Congress unanimously enacted the Victim and Witness Protection Act of 1982 (Public Law No. 97-291) in order to make the Federal criminal justice system more responsive to the needs of victims. One of the important changes made by the act was to make restitution to the victim a separate punishment for most Federal crimes. The act creates a presumption in favor of restitution and requires a Federal judge who decides not to order restitution, or to order only partial restitution, to state on the record the reasons for his decision. The act identifies the losses for which restitution can be ordered and spells out in detail the procedure to be followed in ordering restitution (Public Law No. 97-291, § 5(a), 96 Stat. 1253-55).

The Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 enacted last Congress (Public Law No. 98-473, title II, chapter II, 98 Stat. 1987-2040) made significant changes in Federal sentencing practices and procedures, most of which are scheduled to take effect on November 1, 1986. There are some minor differences between provisions of the Sentencing Reform Act and the provisions of current law enacted by the Victim and Witness Protection Act of 1982.

I am today introducing legislation that makes technical and conforming changes to harmonize current law with the provisions scheduled to take effect on November 1, 1986. I do not believe that these changes will be controversial. The legislation also makes a substantive change that should not prove to be controversial.

One of the significant changes made in Federal sentencing practice and procedure by the Sentencing Reform Act is to set forth the purposes to be served by criminal penalties. That act set forth several purposes, such as deterring criminal conduct and protecting the public (Public Law No. 98-473, § 212(a)(2), 98 Stat. 1989-90 (enacting 18 U.S.C. 3553(a))). Unfortunately, the act omits what should be one of the principal purposes of our criminal law—restoration of the victims of the crime. My bill corrects that oversight by requiring that a Federal judge, when imposing sentence, consider the restitution needs of the victims of the offense.●

SCHOOL PRAYER: A VOICE OF REASON AND LAW

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, Wade McCree, the former Solicitor General of the United States, was asked in 1982 to address the American Bar Association's annual prayer breakfast. Mr. McCree, now a distinguished professor of law at the University of Michigan, used the occasion to question the propriety of the very event at which he was speaking.

In spite of that fact, his remarks drew the somewhat surprised speaker a standing ovation from those present.

I think my colleagues would benefit from the eloquent comments Mr. McCree made on that occasion, and insert them into the RECORD for their review:

Lucy is the name of a popular philosopher who appears in the comic strip Peanuts, authored and drawn by Charles Schulz. Her accustomed foil is a juvenile Everyman named Charlie Brown. In a recent episode, Lucy told Charlie that on the ship of life, some passengers have their deck chairs facing the bow to permit them to see where they are going. Others face the stern so that they can see whence they came. "On the ship of life, Charlie," she asked, "which way is your chair facing?"

He replied, "I can't seem to get my deck chair unfolded."

After having accepted President Brink's invitation to speak on this occasion, I shared Charlie Brown's frustration when I addressed the chore of preparing remarks appropriate to this prayer breakfast. The fact that I had spoken at an earlier prayer breakfast in 1970 when we held our annual meeting in St. Louis did not make my preparation for this talk any easier. I wanted to say something different yet pertinent to the occasion; and I ultimately decided to speak briefly about the recently proposed constitutional amendment which, in the words of the president of the United States, ". . . will restore the right to pray." The published transcript of his remarks when he announced his support of the proposed amendment quotes the president as saying, "The law of this land has effectively removed prayer from our classrooms. How can we hope to retain our freedom through the generations if we fail to teach our young that our liberty springs from an abiding faith in our Creator?"

The proposed amendment reads:

"Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit individual or group prayer in public schools or other public institutions. No person shall be required by the United States or by any state to participate in prayer."

A straightforward reading of the proposed amendment in the light of current undisputed constitutional doctrine makes it evident that nothing currently prohibits individual prayer in public schools or other public institutions, and that no person is required by the United States or any state to participate in prayer. With the elimination of these two propositions as recitals of existing law, there remains in the proposed amendment only the restriction against prohibiting group prayer in public schools or other public institutions.

It is not clear at all what is meant by "group prayer," but it suggests the practice that the Supreme Court found offensive to the Establishment of Religion Clause of the First Amendment twenty years ago in Engel v. Vitale, the New York Regents' prayer case.

There can be no doubt about the power of the people to amend the Constitution, including the Bill of Rights, but serious questions about the wisdom of such a course confronts us. The religious clauses of the First Amendment were a considered response to the religious diversity of our young nation. Calvinists in New England, Friends in Pennsylvania, Catholics in Maryland, Anglicans in Virginia and a small dispersed Jewish community are not an exhaustive list of the several religious and denominational differences that characterized the fledgling country. Recognition of the divisiveness that religious differences can produce persuaded the proponents of the First Amendment that religious minorities should be protected from the possible tyranny of religious majorities.

In recent years, our nation has become even more pluralistic in its religious demography. Buddhism, Islam, Shintoism and Taoism are faiths that were not present in the original states but are embraced today by ever increasing numbers of new residents from Asia and the Middle East.

If in years past, a "common ground," as some would have it, could be found in a "Judeo-Christian" heritage, some of our recent arrivals would find themselves excluded from that umbrella and their children would experience the trauma of rejection or the stigmata of being "different."

Justice Frankfurter, concurring in a 1948 case invalidating an Illinois "released time" program which gave a dissenting pupil the right to leave the classroom during "group prayer," observed,

"That a child if offered an alternative may reduce the constraint; it does not eliminate the operation of influence by the school in matters sacred to conscience and outside the school's domain. The law of imitation operates, and non-conformity is not an outstanding characteristic of children."

The wisdom of the proposed amendment has been questioned by the broadest spectrum of commentators. I need not characterize James J. Kilpatrick's usual perspective, but in writing on this subject, he said,

"One problem with institutional prayer parallels the problem often found with institutional food. The group prayers that would be sanctioned by this amendment would be canned peas—bland, innocuous, inoffensive recitations, perfunctory rituals devoid of spiritual meaning. Heartfelt prayer demands something more."

I do not gainsay the need for moral precepts to guide our young people and to try to save them from the self-destruction of drug abuse or the arbitrary rejection of parental lifestyles for sometimes bizarre and frequently harmful nihilism. But group prayer in schools is unlikely to help in this respect.

My colleague, Yale Kamisar, in a recent opinion piece in the New York Times, cited two incidents that he attributed to Leo Pfeffer. A young boy asked someone to identify the "good Mrs. Murphy" who would follow him all the days of his life. It developed, of course, that he was referring to the "surely goodness and mercy" of the 23rd Psalm. Equally confused was the child of the suburban commuter who daily recited, "Lead us not into Penn Station."

Moral precepts are available to teachers in abundant secular works of all ages. For example, Ralph Waldo Emerson's writings contain all the guidance a pupil requires to teach him to be a person of good character. That religious scriptures also contain guides for right conduct is beyond the point. Religious writings also contain more: creeds, religious doctrine, and beliefs about the validity of which there is often fundamental disagreement. At this very moment, Iranian Shiite Moslems are engaged in a bloody war with Iraqui Sunnite Moslems, in part, over doctrinal differences despite the fact that they both worship God and claim the same prophet.

We Americans have given the world an example of the peaceful coexistence of a wide variety of people from Europe, Asia, Africa, and South America in a nation where individual freedoms surpass those enjoyed by any other people anywhere else. This accomplishment is too precious to permit it to founder on the rock of group prayer, which demonstrably will do very little to promote genuine devotion and likely will accomplish nothing more than to prove the political power of its proponents.

If I am correct in my assessment of the limited benefits to be gained by the adoption of the prayer amendment, you must agree that its cost in terms of the discordance that it will produce is unacceptable.

We as lawyers and citizens should go forth from this prayer breakfast resolved to save our nation from the consequences of forced piety. As Tennyson wrote, "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of."●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, do to a death in the family, I was unable to be present for the vote on the Hamilton substitute, as well as the Michel substitute. Had I been present, I would have voted "yes" on the Hamilton substitute, and voted "no" on the Michel substitute.●

THE FREE POSTAGE ELECTION PARTICIPATION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will assist election agencies with absentee voting and voting registration procedures. The Free Postage Election Participation Act proposes that any election agency may send, free of postage, absentee ballots for any Federal election, and voting instructions pertaining to such ballots. In addition, the election agency may send, free of postage, voter registration forms and instructions pertaining to such forms, enabling individuals to register to vote in a Federal election.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 expanded the opportunity for millions of Americans to participate in the process of voting. Still, there are a great many people in this country who have failed to exercise their franchise under our election registration laws. Statistics show that in the 1984 general election, only 68.3 percent of the total eligible population registered to vote. A substantial and growing number of people are now using absentee ballots to participate in the election process. Indeed, the Federal Government already provides special assistance to those American civilian and military citizens residing overseas. I believe this measure will help ensure that our domestic voters are also able to participate in the political process.

The cost to State and local election agencies is considerable. The Nation's 13,000 election administrators oversee elections to fill 500,000 Federal, State, and local offices. State governments provide 18 percent and local governments provide 82 percent of the $350 million cost of administering a Presidential election. This measure would ease some of this burden. Clearly, it is the Federal Government's responsibility to share some of the financial burden with election agencies during Federal elections.

I am proud to point out that this legislation has received strong support from State and local elections officials throughout the United States. It has also been endorsed by the National Association of Secretaries of State; the International Association of Clerks, Recorders, Election Officials, and Treasurers; the National Association of County Recorders and Clerks; and the International Institute of Municipal Clerks.

Last session, this legislation was cosponsored by over 45 of my colleagues. I strongly believe that this bill will encourage greater voter registration and participation. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor it.●

SPACE TAX INVESTMENT EQUITY ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleague, the gentleman from New York, in introducing the Space Tax Investment Equity Act of 1985.

This bill illustrates the foresight necessary if we are to be prepared for this next economic frontier for America. Current law does not allow equipment that is used in outer space to apply the investment tax credit, accelerated depreciation, or the research and development tax credit to its value. Companies like Grumman, Fairchild, McDonnell Douglas, and 3M, who plan to begin manufacturing in space, are facing obvious extra expense because of this tax differential. This barrier is unintentional and will prove to be counterproductive.

Our bill would extend the investment tax credit, the accelerated depreciation tax benefits, and the R&D tax credit to those companies whose place of business is in outer space rather than here on Earth in the United States. When we first began the early flights into space, we did not anticipate that space would become a place of business. We must remove this unintended tax before these businesses are lost to the American economy. Investments in space activities already must compete with those here on Earth in the United States—as well as with those investments internationally, and it is clear that we will be facing stiff competition, particularly from the French, the Germans, and the Japanese.

This legislation will assure that space ventures are treated essentially the same as Earth ventures under our tax code. Clearly, the age of space commerce has dawned. Space will be the arena for expanding commercial activity including communications satellites, upper stage systems, industrial and scientific experiments, and manufacturing. Private investment in these commercial enterprises is able to take advantage of the unique characteristics of space, such as vacuum, microgravity, and radiation.

We can produce rare medicines with the potential of saving thousands of lives and hundreds of millions of dollars; we can manufacture superchips that can build space observatories enabling scientists to see out to the edge of the universe; and we can produce special alloys and biological materials that benefit greatly from zero gravity environment.

To foster these exciting embryonic industries, we must pave the way by eliminating obstructions and allowing these industries to compete at least on an equal footing with those already here on Earth. I would urge the early passage of this legislation.●

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have an agreement with the gentleman from California, who I understand is next in order for a special order, and he has agreed if by unanimous consent we could reverse order on our special orders. I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

STE. GENEVIEVE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, all of us who are privileged to serve in this House represent districts that include special points of historical interest, and each of us is rightfully proud of these widely varied "treasures." And in a nation whose history is as rich—and as fresh—as is ours, it is not surprising that our countryside is dotted with scores of historical markers, museums, and places with names that "ring bells" to those of us who care about the heritage we share.

However, among these many treasures, there are a handful of small, unassuming communities which, by their very existence, preserve those key moments in history when a small step was taken that would, in the wisdom of hindsight, be recognized as a tremendous stride. And when these special places have been maintained and cared for properly, they provide us with a resource we can never afford to lose. They give us—the heirs of history—living reminders that what we have today has not always been here. They prove to us that the events, the beginnings, and the "great moments" we all learn about from the pages of books really happened.

Here in the Nation's Capital, we have many such places. We can take our children to Ford's Theater, for example, and point to the spot where President Lincoln was mortally wounded—and in doing so, we give our children an opportunity to really understand, to really feel that a great moment in history truly happened.

With that experience, our children's history books and the references they hear to events of the past come alive. They become tangibly related to what we are witnessing and doing today. And that, Mr. Speaker, is something to which we can never affix a finite value.

In the Eighth Congressional District of Missouri, which I am honored to represent, there is a small, quiet community where just such an invaluable experience is today possible—and possible in a truly remarkable way.

The name of this community is Ste. Genevieve—and if that name is familiar to you, it is because Ste. Genevieve, MO, is the "Mother City of the West," the first permanent settlement on the west bank of the Mississippi River.

To those of us in Congress who spend most of our days working with the problems and challenges of our Nation's continuing progress, the "moment in history" that Ste. Genevieve represents is one of obvious importance. On that day in the 1730's when a small group of French colonists established a settlement across the river from "Old Kaskaskia," they probably didn't realize that their decision would later be cited as the beginning of the great westward expansion. No, these first settlers were undoubtedly lured across the river by the area's incredibly rich farm land, not by a desire to make history or open the door to the vast upper Louisiana Territory and the rich lands beyond.

But that is exactly what they did, and we can now understand the tremendous significance of that small step. It is no exaggeration to say that: without the westward expansion that began right there in Ste. Genevieve, this Nation would not be the greatest nation on earth.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am not here today to simply remind my colleagues of a single "historical moment." Ste. Genevieve represents far more than that. Indeed, this small community on the west bank of the Mississippi is today one of the most valuable examples of living history we have—and that is no accident.

This year, 1985, is a year of celebration for Ste. Genevieve, and it is a celebration worth noting by all Americans.

What is being celebrated by this community this year is a birthday—and what a birthday it is.

Yes, this year marks the 250th year that Ste. Genevieve—the Mother City of the West—has existed.

Just think about that; 250 years ago, the land on which those first settlers established Ste. Genevieve was still owned by France. And for 30 years, this tiny settlement, whose population was recorded in 1752 as consisting of "20 whites and 3 negroes, with only 8 owners of land," stood as the only permanent settlement in the vast upper Louisiana Territory.

And thus it remained until 1762, when the territory west of the Mississippi was secretly transferred to Spain, and the land on the east side of the river was turned over to England. At that time, the hardy residents of Ste. Genevieve saw their small settlement become an outpost of the Spanish Empire, and watched as their destiny came to be influenced heavily by the colonial ambitions and fears of that distant and foreign nation. In fact, some scholars contend that Ste. Genevieve's first real period of growth was a direct result of this global shift in power. When the land across the river from Ste. Genevieve came under protestant British rule, the Creole residents there soon became very discontent—and Spain moved quickly to take advantage of that discontent. When the British ordered the withdrawal of all priests from their colony on the east bank of the river, the Spanish responded by sending, for the first time, a resident priest to Ste. Genevieve. And in a unique gesture, the Pope gave this priest, Father Louis Meurin, a dispensation with which to marry unbaptized Roman Catholics. Likewise, the Spanish rulers appointed local men to administrative positions and offered large grants of land to the settlers.

Soon, a steady stream of immigrants began to cross the Mississippi, looking for the Creole way of living that was surviving undisturbed in Ste. Genevieve. And in the years that followed, this immigration came to include not only those from the east bank of the river, but also many from Canada and lower Louisiana, and eventually came to include substantial numbers of French royalist refugees, Americans, and Germans. Thus, by 1772, the population of Ste. Genevieve consisted of "264 males, 140 females, and 287 slaves."

From that point on, with the exception of the perennial problems of flooding, Ste. Genevieve prospered. For many years, Ste. Genevieve was virtually unrivaled on the west side of the river as a trading point. A center of commerce, and yes, a center of civilization. In the early 1800's, Ste. Genevieve lured such distinguished visitors as the Duke of Wurttemberg, King Otto of Greece, and John James Audubon, whose business partner, Ferdinand Rozier, became the town's first mayor in 1827.

Despite this early prosperity—and notoriety—Ste. Genevieve was not destined to become a huge population center, as would other, younger settlements. In fact, it could be said that, by the mid-1800's, this community became the victim of the same westward expansion that it had begun. As St. Louis, a few miles to the north, grew, the village of Ste. Genevieve dwindled as a center of commerce. The fur trade moved further westward, new methods of refining salt, which had been a major product of the area, brought an end to that early industry, and finally, the steady flow of lead ore that had been shipped from Ste. Genevieve was diverted to St. Louis.

With this combination of developments, Ste. Genevieve returned to its initial reliance on agriculture, and began to settle into its present role as the proud mother city of a westward movement that would eventually produce the greatest Nation on Earth.

Today, visitors to Ste. Genevieve can see very clearly just how deep that pride runs. Generation after generation has carefully preserved the Creole architecture, the unique traditions born of French and Spanish influence, and the role of the church as the leader in community life. In fact, this small town is today acclaimed as the "finest surviving example of a French colonial village" in the entire Nation. There still stand some 50 homes and buildings that are 200 years old—and among these structures is, incredibly, the home of Jean Baptiste Valle—the last commandant of Ste. Genevieve under Spanish rule.

Mr. Speaker, the fact that this small Missouri town still exists today in such an impressive state of preservation is an accomplishment that all Americans should acclaim. I know of very few places in this huge country where generations of residents have taken so seriously the need to preserve history. While millions of schoolchildren have, for years, read about "Ste. Genevieve—the Mother City of the West," the people of that community have painstakingly ensured that those schoolchildren can actually visit and see this historic treasure. At great effort and cost, the descendents of those early settlers have given us an opportunity to step back in time and remember that what is now the heartland of this country was once a foreign land, and to see firsthand the beginnings of a culture that is now taken for granted.

Thus, it is with great pride that I stand before you today and ask the Members of this House to join me in paying tribute not only to a moment in history, but to a community of hard-working folks who have preserved that moment for generations to come.

□ 1950

Mr. Speaker, I include in the RECORD a message in writing from the President of the United States to the citizens of Ste. Genevieve dated April 23, 1985, and also a message that was delivered, informal remarks of the President by telephone to greet the people of Ste. Genevieve, MO, as they celebrated "Nation's Night," a feature of Ste. Genevieve's bicentennial celebration, that being on August 22, 1935, and delivered by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The documents follow:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 23, 1985.

To the Citizens of Sainte Genevieve:

I am pleased to send warm greetings to all those gathered to celebrate the 250th anniversary of Sainte Genevieve.

The spirit which has built and sustained your community reflects the energy which has forged America into a land of wonder. As a community held by fellowship and goodwill, Sainte Genevieve has become "home" to many who love it dearly. Further, it stands as an example of the blessings of liberty and freedom to those around the world.

My hearty congratulations on this proud, historic occasion and my best wishes in the years to come.

RONALD REAGAN.

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

(Informal Remarks of the President by Telephone to Greet the People of Ste. Genevieve, MO, as They Celebrate "Nation's Night" as a Feature of Ste. Genevieve's Bi-Centennial Celebration, August 22, 1935)

The history of the town of Sainte Genevieve eloquently testifies to the fortitude of those pioneers who built their homes on the western bank of the Mississippi and wrested minerals from the hills, furs from the forest, and a plentiful harvest from the plain; who merged their varied nationalities in a mighty effort to carve an American nation out of the Western wilderness.

We admire that Christian courage which refused to be daunted by Indian depredations and massacres, by a gradual change in the course of the Mississippi threatening the destruction of the settlement, or by the disastrous flood of 1785. In due course, through the rugged efforts of your predecessors, the hostile Indians were pacified; and the restless Mississippi, far from annihilating the community, provoked a providential removal of the church and other buildings to a better site where the village could expand and flourish.

These triumphs over affliction are characteristic of the spirit of our early Americans. Although the problems which confront us today are of a different sort, I am confident that you have not lost the stalwart qualities of frontier days.

It is with a full appreciation of your past that, on this occasion of your Bi-Centennial Celebration, I extend to you my hearty wishes for a happy and prosperous future.

● Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to join with my friend and colleague, BILL EMERSON, today in saluting Ste. Genevieve, MO on the occasion of that community's 250th anniversary. While my home town of Sarcoxie is considerably west of Ste. Genevieve, we, nonetheless, know of her illustrious history and her contribution to the opening up of the West.

Not only was Ste. Genevieve the first permanent settlement on the west bank of the Mississippi River, it is also the site of the first permanent church in our State.

In its early history, the community was larger than St. Louis, due to its thriving fur trade, its prosperous leadmining industry, and its production of salt which was sold to Indians, hunters, and other settlements to the East. In addition, today it produces an excellent grade of marble and limestone, and its fertile soil makes it an outstanding area for farming.

However, Ste. Genevieve's location made it susceptible to flooding which hindered its growth. In 1785, the town was inundated by 15 feet of water. Thereafter, the village moved over a period of years to higher ground.

Ste. Genevieve has painstakingly preserved its heritage for generations to come and is a highly regarded community for tourists to visit. It is a living example of the pride that rural America has in its families, its children, and its traditions. It is a pleasure to have the opportunity in this forum to congratulate her on the first 250 years and to wish for her, and her people, the best that the future can provide.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor for me to participate in the 250th birthday commemoration of one of our Nation's most historic towns, Ste. Genevieve, MO.

As one of the first permanent settlements to be established west of the Mississippi River, Ste. Genevieve residents are to be commended for their commitment to preserving the integrity and character of this significant settlement.

I've been in Ste. Genevieve and it is one of the most beautiful and scenic places in the State of Missouri. The town is rich in tradition and character, its people are among the friendliest and warmest one would meet anywhere in the Nation, and the historic monuments are truly magnificent.

The numerous sites—including the old cemetery, the Senator Lewis F. Linn House, and the Bolduc House are prime examples of American culture. It is a blessing to the people who come to visit that the town's forefathers had the vision to preserve these structures throughout the decades.●

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. EMERSON, for calling this special order today to honor the city of Ste. Genevieve, MO, on her 250th birthday.

The city of Ste. Genevieve, which lies south of St. Louis along the Mississippi River, was recreated in 1785 after a great flood destroyed the original city. Rich in French and Spanish culture, this great city became a cultural gateway to the West and is now considered by many to be an outstanding example of 18th century architecture. Many of the original homes providing a glimpse of the past are still visible today.

As English and American explorers move West, Ste. Genevieve grew because of the rich soil and abundance of natural resources located in the region. Due to her important location on the Mississippi, she rivaled St. Louis as the primary port facility in Missouri.

It is only fitting and proper that we acknowledge the city of Ste. Genevieve and the strong, independent-minded Missourians who built her, on this her 250th birthday. Again, I commend Congressman EMERSON for calling this special order.●

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, today I join my distinguished colleagues from Missouri in recognition of "Ste. Genevieve Day," commemorating its 250th birthday.

Ste. Genevieve, the oldest permanent settlement established on the west bank of the Mississippi, has played an important part in the history and development of the State of Missouri.

To this day, some parts of the town retain the French flavor that was a guideline for the establishment of surrounding towns and villages. The citizens of Ste. Genevieve have for the past 250 years maintained a delicate balance between their French/Canadian heritage and the America changing around them.

The central southeastern town of Ste. Genevieve will be celebrating this auspicious occasion throughout the year, but today is designated "Ste. Genevieve Day."

Strong communities such as this are the backbone of our State and country. The values that endure in our country, have endured in this Missouri town. I think a lot can be said for a community that has been at the forefront of Missouri history for 250 years. Its citizens are proud—proud of their heritage and proud of the legacy their forefathers left them.

I, too, am proud of Ste. Genevieve, and along with my congratulations, wish it continued success and prosperity in the future.●

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate "Ste. Genevieve Day," commemorating the 250th anniversary of the town of Ste. Genevieve, MO. I am very happy to join my distinguished colleagues from Missouri in honoring one of our State's treasures. Located on the banks of the Mississippi River, just a few hours south of St. Louis, Ste. Genevieve is one of the earliest settlements west of the Mississippi.

Ste. Genevieve is a small community of great significance. Settled by the French in the 18th century, the town boasts the site of the first permanent church in Missouri, established in 1755. Ste. Genevieve is known for its rich cultural history, and the community continues to reflect its early French influences. Ste. Genevieve is especially famous for its beautifully preserved French colonial architecture, and each summer thousands visit its sites during the community's annual arts and crafts festival.

Ste. Genevieve plays a vital role in Missouri history and is of special importance to historians, architects, and Americans of French ancestry. I am pleased to pay tribute to the little town of Ste. Genevieve and I encourage my colleagues, my friends, and all who appreciate history to visit this lovely French settlement.●

● Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] for taking this time to celebrate the 250th birthday of Missouri's oldest community, Ste. Genevieve. I am proud to join with my colleagues from Missouri in honoring one of Missouri's most valuable historical treasures.

The town of Ste. Genevieve is a splendid monument to the great westward expansion of our Nation. Founded in 1735, Ste. Genevieve was the first permanent settlement to be established on the west bank of the Mississippi River. For many years, Ste. Genevieve was the center of commerce and the hub of civilization for all settlers west of the Mississippi. Indeed, the first permanent church in Missouri was established in Ste. Genevieve about 1755. This agricultural community was the stepping stone for waves of settlers who had the courage and determination to expand America's frontier. Today, Ste. Genevieve is fondly known as the mother city of the west.

However, Ste. Genevieve was a victim of its own success. As expansion of the American frontier rapidly increased, the centers of commerce and population shifted. St. Louis, Kansas City, and then other cities became the hubs of the American frontier. Ste. Genevieve, however, still proudly stands as a monument to our westward expansion, and thankfully each generation of Ste. Genevieve residents has diligently preserved the town's unique landmarks and traditions.

Today, this small town with only 1 movie theater, 3 hotels, and a population of less that 3,000 is known as the best example of a French colonial village in the United States; 50 homes and buildings that are over 200 years old have been preserved in this community. The town's preserved buildings, its red-brick church and walled convent give reality to the French tradition that forms so much of Missouri's background. Anyone who appreciates the past can be proud of the efforts of the generations of Ste. Genevieve residents to preserve history. Thanks to their efforts, we now have the opportunity to witness the beginnings of a culture that we now take for granted.

It is with great pride that I join with my distinguished colleagues from Missouri to honor the founding of Ste. Genevieve. All Missourians can be proud that this community on the west bank of the great Mississippi River served as the starting point for the great westward expansion. Again, I want to thank my distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] for allowing us the opportunity to tell our colleagues in the House of Representatives about one of Missouri's historical treasures.●

● Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, it's indeed an honor to join my Missouri colleagues in commemorating one of our State's many historical jewels, the 250-year-old town of Ste. Genevieve.

Known as the mother city of the West, Ste. Genevieve truly represents the heritage of the earliest beginnings of civilization in this country west of the Mississippi River. Nowhere in Missouri is the influence of the French and the Spanish more evident than in Ste. Genevieve. In fact, there are few places in the United States where the blending of these two cultures and their traditions are more evident than in Ste. Genevieve.

As a resident of Hannibal, another historical Missouri town anchored to the Mississippi River, it is with great pride that I join with my colleagues from the other congressional districts of Missouri, with Congressman BILL EMERSON, who so ably represents Ste. Genevieve in this Chamber, and with all the people of Missouri in officially observing today as Ste. Genevieve Day.

Thank you.●

STEEL AGREEMENTS SERVE AS COSMETIC ANSWER TO IMPORT PENETRATION AND INDUSTRY'S FUTURE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I don't like being an "I told you so" kind of person but when it comes to steel and steel imports, I just can't hold it back.

For the past several months, I have been watching the negotiations between this country and several of the world's major steel exporters. Those negotiations, which we all know stemmed from this administration's resistance to specific quotas on steel imports, seem to be having almost no effect.

Last September, when President Reagan said the administration would seek voluntary agreements with eight steel exporters that would limit steel imports to the United States to 18½ percent of the American market, I had my doubts. I believed then, and still believe, that a firm quota would have been more effective and easier to enforce, regardless of whether the quota limit was 15 percent—my preferred percentage, 17 percent or 18½ percent.

As I watched our trade representatives try to hammer out those voluntary agreements with South Korea, Japan, Mexico, Brazil, Finland, Spain, South Africa, and Australia, I wished them well, knowing that if they were successful, our steel industry would be given a chance to get back on solid footing.

As January approached the agreements seemed less and less likely to meet the 18½-percent goal, I wondered whether we were going to really make any changes in the pattern of the last few years when imported steel cut into our domestic industry.

I became truly concerned in January when steel imports reached nearly 31 percent of apparent supply, the second consecutive month where imports broke the 30-percent level.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the February figures are available and imports represent just over 27 percent of apparent supply, a far cry from the 18½-percent goal set last September when the Congress accepted the administration proposal for voluntary agreements instead of quotas.

I am concerned that we have permanently given up a quarter of the American steel market. I wonder if ever again we will see steel imports fall below the 25-percent figure, never mind the 18½-percent administration goal or the 15-percent goal of the congressional steel caucus.

For the first 2 months of this year, Mr. Speaker, steel imports were 4.7 million tons, 29 percent of apparent supply. And that is with most of the eight voluntary agreements already signed.

And the prospects are that the situation will not get any better.

Data Resources, Inc., for example, estimates steel imports for the first quarter of 1985 will be 6.7 million tons. That means another 2 million tons of imported steel will have entered this country in the month of March.

If DRI is correct, the import penetration for the first quarter of this year will be just under 27 percent, quite a difference from the projected administration level of 18½ percent.

In fact, DRI projects steel imports for 1985 at 22.7 million tons for a 23-percent penetration of the American market.

So now come the questions. Are the voluntary agreements really working or are there elements in them that will make it easier for all or some of those eight nations to get around the agreements? Or, if the agreements are working, then where is all the steel coming from?

The answer, as best as I have been able to determine, Mr. Speaker, is both. In some of the agreements with the eight countries—just as an aside, Mr. Speaker, the Japanese have not yet signed their agreement with us—there are provisions for front loading. In other words, the agreed upon percentages are not hard and fast annual import percentages, but rather are levels that will be achieved as part of a 5-year average.

Under those terms, one or more of the eight exporting nations with whom we have agreements could ship heavily in 2 of the 5 years and less in the remaining years.

This would mean that until they were able to find or develop other markets for their excess steel production, the United States would continue to be the primary dumping ground, causing more problems for our domestic steel industry and costing more jobs.

There is also the European Economic Community Agreement, which is separate from the others recently negotiated. The EEC agreement expires on December 31, 1985. What will happen at that point is anyone's guess. Right now, steel exports from the EEC to the United States for February are up 18½ percent from February 1984, and for the first 2 months of this year as compared to the same period last year, the imports are up more than 42 percent.

In fact, for the month of February, only three EEC members—Greece, West Germany, and Italy—have decreased exports to the United States as compared to shipments in February 1984.

In terms of exports to the United States for both January and February, as compared to last year, only two countries, Greece and Italy, have shipped less.

What will happen, I don't know. Who can say what the EEC members will be seeking when the time comes to negotiate a new agreement?

The second answer is even more exasperating. Taiwan, as anyone who follows the steel industry knows, is increasing the production of steel in its state-owned plant. Taiwan is not one of the eight nations that have signed agreements with us and, based on some information I have gathered, isn't interested in signing an agreement.

Turkey is another nation we must watch. In 1974, Turkey shipped no steel to the United States. In 1983, Turkish steel manufacturers exported just 1,000 tons to the United States. Last year, however, the picture changed. Turkish steel shipments to the United States in 1984 were 44,000 tons and, even of more concern to U.S. steel manufacturers is Turkey's expectations of tripling or quadrupling steel exports to the United States for 1985. Is there anyone in the American steel industry who would have expected steel shipments from Turkey of 130,000 to 150,000 tons a year? Probably no one.

But it's not only Turkey and Taiwan. Sweden is increasing its steel exports to the United States, especially in the specialty and stainless steels. Romania, which shipped 200,000 tons of steel here last year, is not a party to any agreement and has announced plans to increase shipments.

And, if that isn't enough, semifinished steel was specifically exempted in the administration's September decision to seek voluntary restraint agreements rather than set quotas.

What does that mean? Just look at the numbers. In 1984, Brazil and Japan exported nearly 40 percent of the semifinished steel accepted here. Japan shipped 100,000 tons and Brazil shipped 875,000 tons. Is there a doubt in anyone's mind that if other steel products are restricted by voluntary agreements, that Japan, Brazil, and other nations with similar capabilities will ship those products that are not covered?

In the long run, then, my views are not changing. I don't foresee any true improvement in the steel import picture. I believe problems will arise that will continue to make it difficult for America's steel industry to modernize and compete.

A recent article in the Wall Street Journal focused on exactly that issue, the future of America's steel industry.

The article by Thomas F. O'Boyle indicates a continuing shrinkage in steel consumption, a level of imports above 20 percent of apparent supply and a modest decrease in capacity through 1986. The projections for 1985 and 1986 were developed by chase econometrics. They show U.S. capacity slightly over 120 million tons per year, consumption just below 100 million tons a year and import levels about 22 percent of apparent supply.

I am including the entire article, Mr. Speaker, because it is important for all of us to know about the troubles facing one of our basic industries, troubles which could affect some of the other industries on which we plan to depend for our futures.

There is one other point I feel compelled to make before I conclude. Just over 1 month ago, an unusual event took place on the Hill. To most people, it was just another reception to which Members of Congress were invited and, I am sure, most Members, even those well aware of the problems in the steel industry, didn't give a great deal of thought about.

In point of fact, it was unusual, as I just noted. It was a reception given by the Steel Bar Mills Association. To most of us, even the association name wouldn't exactly ring any bells.

But, had the association used the word "minimill" in its title, I am sure a number of my colleagues would have instantly recognized the group.

But, for your information, this was the first time the Steel Bar Mills Association—or if you prefer, "minimills"—had ever come to Capitol Hill, except as individuals.

The message they brought was different, too. The message was that all is not rosy in the minimill picture.

Despite the way many analysts and supposed experts on the steel industry promote the minimill concept as the savior of the steel industry, all is not perfect. Imports are having an impact in their operations. As the voluntary agreements reduce exporters' opportunities to ship certain products, those exporters will shift into other lines that are not controlled by limits.

Thus, we can expect more semifinished steel to come into the United States and the minimills can look forward to more pressure on their markets.

A report in the March 1 issue of Iron Age focused on the problems facing the minimills. According to George McManus. The author of "Minimill Report: The Honeymoon Is Over," the minimills are facing marketing and financial problems. The report suggests that only the better financed minimills that have somewhat broader product lines and stronger marketing approaches are going to survive.

In effect, we are being told that the same kind of shrinkage we are seeing in the large, integrated steel companies is going to affect the minimills as well.

The report focuses its attention on some of the most successful minimills, but it implies that many others aren't going to do quite as well, if they survive.

I am including this article also, because it will give those unfamiliar with this segment of the steel industry a broader view.

I am concerned about the steel industry and its future. Despite this administration's hopes that the recently negotiated voluntary agreements are the best answer to solving or alleviating the industry's problems, I have my doubts. Every piece of information I have seen or read, confirms my suspicions that we have just scratched the surface of the problems and unless we develop cures that will get to the real heart of those problems soon, we could be too late.

I don't like to think pessimistically, Mr. Speaker, but I haven't seen or heard of anything that would brighten the outlook. I certainly hope I do, and soon.

STEEL INDUSTRY TROUBLES DEFY EASY SOLUTIONS: RESTRUCTURING OPTIONS ARE SOUGHT TO OFFSET SHRINKING MARKET

(By Thomas F. O'Boyle)

This year the sales of one company—International Business Machines Corp.—will surpass those of the entire U.S. steel industry.

That fact alone speaks volumes about what has happened to one of America's most basic and troubled businesses. As the economy enters its third year of post-recession prosperity, steel has been left behind. While IBM and other high-technology companies prosper, U.S. steelmakers still can't operate at a consistent profit. Demand for their commodity inexorably dwindles.

Individual steel producers have tried to respond to this economic fact of life. But, as the industry braces for yet another round of restructuring, executives face a sobering prospect: that a recovery may never come and, worse still, that the problems they face have no textbook solutions. "Steel executives know they must act," says Thomas C. Jones, a consultant at Booz Allen & Hamilton Inc. "But it isn't clear what actions they can take."

Some options under consideration:

Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., suffocating under $514 million of debt it assumed to modernize, is weighing a bankruptcy-law petition, which could be filed as early as next week. If lenders and labor aren't willing to accept steep concessions, the company might achieve a more favorable reorganization of its liabilities in bankruptcy-law proceedings.

U.S. Steel Corp., still saddled with obsolete mills despite a more than 30% reduction in its capacity since 1979, is negotiating a partnership with South Korea's Pohang Iron & Steel Co. The talks could lead to Pohang's gaining an equity position in some U.S. Steel facilities and supplying raw steel to them.

Armco Inc., which tried to diversify into insurance and found more troubles than in steel, is investigating employee buyouts for certain plants as a way to get out of steel and lessen the exit costs. If Armco can't earn a reasonable profit in steel, its executives reason, maybe an employee-owned company can.

Bankruptcy-law filings, foreign partnerships, employee buyouts—all are likely to occur soon as the industry gropes for a more manageable configuration. "Every major company is thinking about something dramatic," asserts Eugene J. Keilin, a Lazard Freres & Co. investment banker and the chief architect of Weirton Steel Corp., formerly a National Steel Corp. unit and now the nation's largest employee-owned concern. In its first year, Weirton was one of the steel industry's few profitable companies, posting earnings of $61 million on sales of $1 billion.

Nevertheless, there is confusion over what measures will provide relief to the industry. What were considered sure-fire answers—mergers, for instance—aren't yielding the expected results. LTV Corp., which last year merged with Republic Steel Corp. to form the nation's second largest producer, now is one of the industry's most troubled companies.

DOMESTIC COMPETITION

Some question whether the industry still has the financial muscle to redirect itself. Balance sheets have been ravaged by more than $6 billion in losses over the past three years.

Bethlehem Steel Corp., one of the companies with the biggest losses, is trying to diversify. Last month a unit of the steelmaker agreed to buy J.M. Tull Industries Inc., a metals distributor that Bethlehem dwarfs in size, for $95 million. Bethlehem noted that it wants to be "a leading supplier of materials, equipment and services to industrial America." However, Bethlehem's goal strikes some as far-fetched. "They're dreaming," says one competitor.

At the same time, domestic competition appears to be accelerating instead of abating. U.S. producers, whose technology lags far behind world-class standards, have gotten a five-year reprieve from imports under President Reagan's trade restrictions. But competition from so-called minimills that recyle steel scrap is intensifying. And mills that had been abandoned are now being resurrected. Kaiser Steel Corp., for instance, closed its doors in 1983 but today is again operating under new foreign owners, supplying sheet and plate products to the West Coast market.

One factor propelling this restructuring is a powerful but all too often overlooked trend: As the economy matures, it needs less steel. This year, for instance, America will consume just under 97 million tons of steel, according to Chase Econometrics estimates. However, if steel were consumed at the same rate in 1985 as it was 20 years ago, consumption this year would be 175 million tons, Chase economist John E. Jacobson calculates.

This trend reflects many forces. Other materials replace steel—beer now comes in aluminum rather than tin cans, for example—while more money is spent for silicon chips and computers and less for steel-intensive items. Nor will the trend abate. "It's as relentless as growing older,'" says Mr. Jacobson, who estimates that the industry's "steel intensity"—an index of how much steel is consumed relative to the economy—has fallen 45% in the past 15 years. He expects an additional 35% decline by 2000.

Blaming the industry's troubles on imports obscures the real economic trends, Mr. Jacobson contends. Even if imports this year took the same U.S. market share as in 1975—a 13.5% slice rather than last year's 27% record-industry shipments would rise only about 10% to 83 million tons, he estimates. And 83 million tons still would be 17% less than 1979 shipments.

Experts disagree over how many more mills—and jobs—are likely to be eliminated. But no one disputes the reality that still more U.S. capacity will be discarded soon, despite a 13% reduction since 1979. U.S. Steel's own forecasts don't envision domestic steelmakers shipping as much as 80 million tons before 1988, if then. Its studies suggest that it could close 20% of its remaining capacity and still meet demand.

That's true for the entire industry. "There's still at least 20% too much," asserts R. Milton Deaner, president of McLouth Steel Products Corp. By 1990, he predicts, as much as 30 million of 135 million tons industrywide will have to be permanently taken off line. By some estimates, in fact, there is so much surplus steelmaking capacity world-wide that the entire U.S. industry could be eliminated and only then would supply equal consumption among non-Communist nations.

Not surprisingly, in this environment of world-wide overcapacity, prices have fallen. One of the industry's most important products, cold-rolled sheet, is widely available today for less than $400 a ton—or nearly 10% below the market prices of four years ago, estimates Peter F. Marcus, a steel analyst at Paine Webber Inc. And demand for cold-rolled sheet, used in automobiles, office furniture and appliances, is strong relative to many other carbon steel products.

PREDATORY TACTICS

Prices have been so low lately, in fact, that one executive, who calls the current situation "masochistic," suggests that the biggest producers are engaging in predatory tactics designed to force smaller steelmakers out of business. However, U.S. Steel's chairman, David M. Roderick, who blames desperate companies for the price warfare, counters, "Drowning people don't swim well."

Yet, in the current high seas, even the most competitive U.S. producers find it difficult to keep above water. For instance, McLouth emerged from bankruptcy-law reorganization in November 1982 with 25% lower costs, Mr. Deaner estimates. Today the closely held Trenton, Mich., company—controlled by Chicago industrialist Cyrus Tang—is said to be the U.S. industry's most efficient producer of cold-rolled sheet. The company's cost to make a ton of that product, including depreciation and interest, are at or below $400.

McLouth was able to achieve its low-cost status through a renegotiation of its raw material, energy and labor contracts—a process troubled competitors such as Wheeling-Pittsburgh, may try to duplicate. Still, bankruptcy-law reorganization doesn't guarantee profit; even with low costs, McLouth wasn't in the black in the first quarter, Mr. Deaner says.

Other producers are investigating alternative ways to lower costs. Some involve a more traditional approach: This month, for instance, Inland Steel Co. is expected to pass out pink slips to as many as 1,100 of its 5,500 salaried workers.

U.S. Steel, on the other hand, sees its salvation overseas. The South Koreans could provide investment capital—money that U.S. Steel might use to upgrade its production and thus concentrate on more sophisticated steels.

There also could be a source of semi-finished steel to replace higher-cost raw steel now produced at U.S. Steel plants. By buying steel overseas, U.S. Steel could eliminate the expensive front end of steelmaking at certain high-costs plants: the coke ovens, blast furnaces and other equipment used to reduce raw materials to make steel. Just the routine maintenance of a blast furnace, done every five years or so, now costs as much as $60 million. U.S. steelmakers have 100 blast furnaces, only 52 of which operated more than half the year in 1983.

Companies that cannot afford to make such investments "will be potential customers" of foreign steel, says Mr. Roderick, who flatly predicts, "There will be additional combinations" linking domestic and foreign producers.

Nearly every U.S. steelmaker has tried to find a foreign partner. But few have anything to offer. Northwest Industries Inc. was unable to find a buyer, foreign or domestic; for its Lone Star Steel Co. unit. So it chose to spin off the Dallas-based unit, as has Crane Co. with its CF&I Steel Corp. subsidiary. For other companies, employee ownership may be the only feasible exit.

There also are those who don't see any viable option. "I'd love to get out of the steel business," confesses one executive, "but who would buy it?"

MINIMILL REPORT: THE HONEYMOON IS OVER

(By George McManus)

Mini-mills are looking for technical solutions to marketing and financial problems.

The problems stem from saturation of traditional markets. Limited for the most part to bars and light structurals, the mini-mills have run out of growth.

"There is overcapacity in relation to current markets," said F. Kenneth Iverson, chairman of Nucor Corp. "There are still opportunities for additional growth in the mini-mill area (but) the rate of growth will be slower than we have seen in the last decade."

The overcapacity has resulted in depressed prices and reduced profits. In this setting, the smaller steel companies are working on processes that will accelerate growth by broadening product spans.

The most dramatic effort in this regard is Nucor's search for a way to make sheet in mini-mill quantities. At yearend, the company was close to a pilot program aimed at casting slabs about 1½ in. thick. The current minimum of 6 inches translates into too many tons for a mini-mill.

A second pilot program under consideration at Nucor calls for even more drastic innovations. "Some of these are way-out processes that go directly to 0.10 in. thick," said Mr. Iverson.

Already being scaled down is the hot rolling of sheet. There has been a general trend away from fully continuous strip mills. The new hot strip mill of Dofasco Inc. uses a single reversing mill for both slabbing and roughing. There is then a conventional finishing train.

At Interprovincial Steel & Pipe Co., Ltd., (IPSCO), a reversing Steckel mill takes slabs all the way down to sheet and plate thicknesses. "I think the Steckel mills have considerable potential for allowing the minimills to get into the flat rolled business," said Anthony Wilson, vice president, business planning and development, IPSCO.

In another product area, Chaparral Steel Co. is among those working on horizontal casting of billets. "We believe it will enable us to enhance our product mix through increased alloy grades," said Jeffry A. Werner, senior vice president, commercial, for Chaparral.

Chaparral is also enhancing quality through extensive use of electromagnetic stirring in the caster mold. "We expect to have that fully on line in the next couple of months," said Mr. Werner. "That would make us the first North American company using 100 pct electromagnetic stirring."

Chaparral's horizontal caster began operating in September and is still being debugged. Apart from quality, the process should bring a big slash in capital costs.

This is of special interest because recent advances in electric furnace technology have increased mini-mill capacities and capital costs. Chaparral, which calls itself a market mill, can produce 1.3 million tons with two electric furnaces.

"As the furnaces have become more high powered and sophisticated," said Mr. Werner, "the smallest size mini-mill seems to be 400,000 tons a year. The opportunities for a 400,000-ton mini-mill are few and far between."

He said the market would dictate future mini-mill size. If the market calls for a 100,000-ton ceiling, the trick will be to devise technology that can be scaled down without sacrificing efficiency. Horizontal casting will probably be helpful in getting down to micro-mill size.

ENERGY

New Jersey Steel Corp. would like to find a way of getting its power costs down. Operating on the East Coast, the company is subject to the area's high utility rates.

"We're very interested in Willy Korf's energy optimizer," said Robert J. Pasquarelli, president of New Jersey Steel.

An energy optimizing furnace began commercial operation in early 1983 at Companhio Siderurgical Pains in Brazil. Korf has indicated plans to use the process at Connecticut Steel, the mini-mill announced for Wallingford, Conn.

Instead of electric power, the energy optimizer uses oxygen and fuel injections to melt scrap. The process might be regarded as a cross between the bottom blown Q-BOP and the old cold metal openhearth. Distinctive features include full combustion of off-gases and pre-heating of scrap.

New Jersey Steel is an exception to many of the general comments about the current state of mini-mills. Producing rebars, the company has benefitted from brisk construction activity in the North East.

"Perhaps because of the regional effect, we've seen a good market in 1984," said Mr. Pasquarelli. He said his company was operating at 100 pct of capacity and looked for further business gains in 1985.

These comments were underlined when New Jersey recently announced it was expending capacity from 250,000 tons a year to 400,000 tons. This will be done by installing a larger transformer. This kind of electric furnace upgrading helps explain why there is a lot of mini-mill capacity.

There is one more important thing about New Jersey steel. It faces competition in the rebar market from an integrated steel company.

"Bethlehem has been, and still is, the biggest producer in the Northeast," said Mr. Pasquarelli. (Bethlehem's rebars come from the electric furnace plant at Steelton, Pa.).

MINI VERSUS MINI

For the most part, the integrated mills have gotten out of rebars and merchant bars. The advanced stage of this exodus is one of the reasons mini-mill growth has slowed.

"In the past," explained Mr. Iverson, "the primary competition for mini-mills was foreign suppliers and integrated producers. Over the last three or four years, this has changed so that the primary competitors today are other mini-mills—and I expect that to continue in the future."

The change in the competitive mix has reduced the potential market and it has made for a tougher kind of competition. In the old days, mini-mills were going against large companies with as many as 10 manhours per ton of product. The competition is now provided by other mini-mills with highly efficient facilities.

"To be competitive in the mini-mill area now, you have to be producing at two manhours per ton or less," said Mr. Iverson.

The new situation hasn't been fully recognized by the outside world. "I believe there is a misconception about mini-mills," said Robert A. Hageman, vice president, Kidder, Peabody & Co.

"While the general impression is that integrated mills are poor financially and mini-mills consistently profitable," said Mr. Hageman, "the actual record is quite different."

The misconception has had several negative effects. In the debate on steel imports, it has led free traders to cite mini-mill profits as evidence that efficient companies can compete successfully with foreign producers.

A second effect of the profit image has been to attract new entries. Mr. Werner of Chaparral spoke of a "proliferation of mini-mills . . . Everybody sort of discovered mini-mills in the last five years. They've created an oversupply." He placed the mini-mill capacity at 20 to 25 million tons.

The true state of affairs was noted by Mr. Hageman. "Mini-mills can go bankrupt," he said. "They file dumping suits. They are finding it more difficult to cover their costs by raising prices. They face slower growth."

Some of the problems may be corrected by attrition. "I don't think there's any question that you're going to see some kind of a restructuring of the mini-mills," said Mr. Iverson. "There are all sorts of rumors in the industry about this one being for sale, the other one being for sale . . . There has to be some shake-out."

ONE GOOD APPLE

Mr. Iverson and Nucor have been credited with, or blamed for, creating the mini-mills' prosperous appearance. Through bad times and good, Nucor has been the world's most profitable producer of carbon steel. Mr. Hageman has pointed out that Nucor's earnings haven't been representative of the overall mini-mill situation.

Mr. Iverson and his associates have done a brilliant job of building and operating steel plants. In addition, they have had the advantage of a large captive market.

"We'll produce roughly 1.5 million tons and we'll use about 500,000 tons internally," said Mr. Iverson. "A little over 400,000 in joists and about 100,000 in cold finished bars.

"That's very important to our success," he said of the captive tonnage, "because we can do a better job of scheduling the mills." The internal volume didn't provide any price cushion, he emphasized, because the joist and cold finished markets are highly competitive.

Nucor is unique in many ways but it isn't the only profitable mini-mill. "IPSCO has made profits and does make profits in today's very adverse conditions," said Mr. Wilson of that company.

After two losing years, Florida Steel Corp. earned over $6.6 million in 1984. The company is reasonably optimistic about the future.

"As far as the volume is concerned, it's still fairly stable out there," said Frank E. Weise, president of Florida Steel. "You're still in that compression between your manufacturing cost and your selling price," Mr. Weise added.
